The thunder-storm is one of the great instances of tone-painting and was an epoch-making movement when it appeared. Wagner, St. Saens, Berlioz, Rossini, Verdi, and a host of others have since tried their hand at tempest-making without having surpassed this spell of bad weather. Some may object that the lightning comes after the thunder in this, or that there is not even an umbrella-motive in its measures, but it remains one of the strong pictures in the musical art-gallery.

If Dr. Muck did not attain the standard in the Bach Suite which Boston has had in past performances, he certainly excelled in this storm movement. It was, all in all, the best performance of this number that we can recall. The wind piped on the piccolo, the rain fell on the violins, the tumult grew on the trombones, and it was in every way an exciting bit of modern music executed in a modern manner.

Per contra the Thanksgiving at the end fell off a trifle, and was, like the beginning of the concert, somewhat rough, with poor ensemble and tone-quality. We repeat that this is to be condoned in a first concert of the season, and that the conductor ought to be allowed time to get his new material into shape; for our orchestra is fast becoming like the boy's jack-knife, which first received a new blade and afterwards a new handle. Is it our old orchestra?

Louis C. Elson.

[26]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AGREEABLE BEGINNING OF THE NEW SEASON

Bach, Mozart and Beethoven Make the First Programme and the Performance Renews and Confirms Some of the Best Traits of the Orchestra and the Conductor—The "Pastoral" Symphony Dramatized—A Warm Welcome for Dr. Muck and an Untoward Incident — Concerts Next Week—The Kneisel Series—Other Musical News

The twenty-seventh series of Symphony Concerts and the second year of Dr. Muck's conductorship began yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall; while for the first time within recent memory there had been a considerable change in the personnel of the orchestra. The audience, as usual, filled the hall to the last seat, and rustled with pleasant interest in itself and its own whereabouts, as the way is at the first concert of a new season. It amused itself also with a scrutiny of the new faces in the front rank of the band (and perhaps with recollections of the old), and it received the conductor warmly, as warmth goes at an afternoon concert, when he came first to his place. Its applause was much less hearty as one item on the programme followed another, and towards the end came unexpected signs of the presence of a new public impatient under a succession of suite, symphony, and symphony, and plainly unaccustomed to the unwritten code of the afternoon concerts. All who frequent them know that departures are sometimes many at each pause toward the end of the concerts. They were unusually so yesterday, and for the first time in two years of experience, they continued while the orchestra was actually playing. The departing brushed through long rows of occupied seats, rustled down the aisles, swung the doors audibly. Such an incident, with its disregard of the rest of the audience, is novel at the Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck did not hide his just irritation, and resentful looks and words were many. The concert was indeed long—a full two hours; the pieces were familiar classics, but the performance of all three was stimulating pleasure, and through it all played some of the most admirable qualities of Dr. Muck's conducting. The three pieces were:

Bach: Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra.
Mozart: Symphony in G minor (K. 550).
Beethoven: Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," Op. 68.

It is a new and a stirring sensation to hear the orchestra again after its five months of silence. The ear of memory is not the ear of the body, and the liveliest recollection may not summon the full measure of the splendors and the subtleties of which the band is capable. Subtleties were fewer, yesterday, than they sometimes are; but splendors were many. From beginning to end of the concert, from the new first violins through the new double-basses, the orchestra was alertly alive. It sprang to its work, to its music, to its conductor's will. So far as a single concert may disclose, the new players—or, perhaps, the causes that have brought some of them to their new posts—are a distinctly animating force. The new fire, elasticity and responsiveness, the larger intensity and the larger power that Dr. Muck has been cultivating in the orchestra were in full and free, but never uncontrolled or unproportioned, play. The rich sonority of tone at the beginning of Bach's suite was thrilling. The glorified dance-tunes with which it ends went in lusty life. The brightness of the tone in the first and the last movements of Mozart's symphony flashed on the ear as warm, clear light upon the eye. The pulsing voice of the orchestra in Mozart's and equally in Beethoven's andante lifted either to pure song, seemingly upspringing from itself. Beethoven's symphony began in a warm sonority that was orchestral tone spontaneous, alive, elastic. At the end the band sang with full-throated breadth. Throughout the string choir played with a glowing vivacity and responsiveness that gave its brilliance new animation and suppleness. The voices of the wind choir kept their familiar, pure and sensitive beauty, and their old artistry in the weaving of instrumental detail. The band has played with a more chiselled smoothness, and a more edgeless euphony. It has been in rehearsal only a week, and the fulness of some of its qualities only time and association may bring. The pleasure of yesterday was the new or the seemingly new vivacity and elasticity of its tone, the songful quality with which it intensified it, and the ordered and responsive power with which it gave it eloquence. Clearly Dr. Muck is printing himself upon the orchestra. It plays now in his image and in the image of no other conductor.

The subtlety of the afternoon—and it was not a subtlety so clear and keen was the impression of it—was the distinctive and sympathetic quality of tone that Dr. Muck and his men brought to each of the three pieces. Their voice with Bach's suite was not their voice with Mozart's symphony. Their voice with Beethoven was not their voice with either of the other two. They spoke in the "overture" that begins the suite, with a sturdy, square-toed pomp of tone; they sang the succeeding air with a large and easy simplicity; and lusty and hearty were the succeeding dances. The suite was indeed the music of the robust old Cantor—a large two-fisted man in spite of all the pedants and the idealists—as Cothen and Leipzig and other German towns knew him when he walked their streets. The conductor and the band passed to Mozart's symphony and straightway the lusty largeness of their striding tone vanished. Through all the symphony it was of a lighter body and of a finer suppleness. [illegible] clear brightness through the [illegible] flowed serenely fluttered in the fragments of it. Elegance was its trait in the graces of the scherzo, and it was vivacity itself in the finale. Again it had taken body, shape, color, voice, from the intrinsic and distinctive qualities of the music and so expressed and differentiated it. Then Beethoven, and with him, as Dr. Muck and his men played the "Pastoral" symphony, came a larger, deeper, richer, warmer-colored tone. It was eloquent in itself; it was emotionally expressive; a touch of exaltation amplified it. Once more the tone was of the matter and the manner of the music. Once again Dr. Muck had confirmed one of the most admirable and unobtrusive of his abilities —that by which he differentiates each piece from all the rest, isolates its essentials, like a musical chemist, and plays it, so to say, in itself and its own kind.

Throughout, indeed, in another respect this same quality had been in notable play. The rediscovery of Bach is a pastime that is now nearly two hundred years old, and each rediscoverer in the joy of his "find" will have it that Bach always and everywhere is emotional in the modern sense. Yet he did much sturdy music-making for no other purpose than to exercise his calling and make his living. No doubt a man of his lusty temperament got some emotions out of the process and the feeling that was in him for his work went into the fruit of it. All that, however, does not make this particular suite in D and much other of Bach's music emotional as we of 1907 understand the word, and it is stupid to try to twist it so. Dr. Muck's poised intelligence easily avoided this pitfall. He played the suite no less sturdily than, with any modern orchestra, it seems to have been written. Almost as many will have Mozart emotional in the modern sense as well; but if ever there was a child of his time it was he, and the eighteenth century was not emotional as the nineteenth and the twentieth are. Mozart had a temperament, as the sedate and the sprightly of Vienna and Salzburg have recorded of him in many another thing than music. When he wrote, he had feeling for his work and presumably the process stirred him. But try to clothe his music with our self-conscious, sharp-edged, uneasy emotions and forthwith it is distorted, dulled, stiffened. Again Dr. Muck's keen responsiveness to the underlying spirit, the essential and peculiar characteristics kept Mozart's symphony Mozart's.

Then, when the conductor came to Beethoven and the "Pastoral" symphony, he could be as eloquent, as emotional, as dramatic even, as he would. The music invites it, the response of his audience is equally quick and full. And yesterday Dr. Muck did more than make the symphony musically eloquent. He fairly dramatized it. The dramatic thrill, the emotional vivacity that he gave the first movement were like a new sensation. Perhaps he gained it by a brisk and sharp pace and accent at which some purists will quarrel, as they will with the slow pace and long accents of the succeeding andante, but it gave an irresistible animation to the one, and the voice of mounting human song to the other. The same dramatizing quality in conducting and in performance made the scherzo humanly and humorously alive. The storm was more vivid than many an overwrought "tone picture" of yesterday, and the finale, again with the appropriate dramatic sense, swelled richly and deeply to its close. "The Pastoral" is the most human of Beethoven's symphonies; Dr. Muck and his men dramatized its humanity, and at every turn the music seemed to justify them. It is hard to recall when it has seemed so to sound with its own voice. H. T. P.

Concerts Next Week

For the second pair of Symphony concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, at Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck has put the first new composition of the season on his programme—d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein." The music is new to Boston, but in itself it is twenty or thirty years old. Mr. d'Indy wrote the second part of it in 1874, and ten years later revised it and made it a section of the trilogy. Schiller's three classic Germany plays, "Wallenstein's Camp," "Die Piccolomini," and "Wallenstein's Death," suggested the music; for d'Indy was more a romancist in those days than he is now. The first and the third parts of the music bear Schiller's titles; the second part is labelled "Max and Thecla," with "Die Piccolomini" for a sub-title. The three pieces are opulently and amply scored and representative melodies bind them together against the background of Schiller's plays which the composer assumes in the minds of his hearers. The other numbers of the programme are Wagner's thunderous "Kaisermarsch" in its orchestral arrangement and Liszt's concerto in A major for piano and orchestra—the less familiar of the composer's two concerts, and the one that Mr. Apthorp once happily characterized as "The Life and Adventures of a Melody." Next week Mr. Rudolph Ganz, one of the most interesting and distinctive of the younger pianists, will play the piano part, appearing for the first times with the Symphony Orchestra.

The annual series of six concerts by the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge will begin on Thursday evening, Oct. 24, and continue through the Thursday evenings of Nov. 14, Dec. 19, Jan. 23, March 12 and April 23. The programme as usual will be made from those of recent concerts in Boston; Dr. Muck will conduct; and the assisting singers and virtuosi will be Mrs. Helen Allen Hunt, the excellent contralto; Mme. Samaroff, the familiar pianist; Mr. Wendling, the first violin of the orchestra; and Louis Bachner for another pianist. Subscribers to the similar concerts of last season may retain their seats by application at Kent's book shop in Cambridge until Wednesday next, Oct. 16. On the following Saturday, Oct. 19, seats not so taken will be sold at the same place.

[27]

SUNDAY HERALD — BOSTON.
OCTOBER 13, 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT BELOW STANDARD

First Programme of 27th Season Made up of Familiar Compositions.

By PHILIP HALE.

The first concert of the 27th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Suite in D major, No. 3, for orchestra....Bach
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
"Pastoral" symphony, No. 6.....Beethoven

Dr. Muck was welcomed heartily and there was liberal applause after various movements of the three familiar compositions. It may also be said that the applause was at times generous, for the performance as a whole was below the standard of the orchestra in the matter of euphony and also of precision.

It is not necessary at this time to inquire too anxiously into the causes of the falling off in quality of tone, in decision of attack and in finesse of ensemble. There are several new players; the former members have been scattered through the summer; there has been little time for rigorous rehearsal. The compositions by Bach and Mozart are admirably suited to the purpose of exhibiting as in white light any shortcomings in essentals of perfect ensemble.

That there was too often an absence of precision might perhaps have been expected in view of the circumstances, but that there should have been so often a lack of the delightful tonal quality, the euphony that has made this orchestra distinguished above other orchestras, was indeed a surprise. It is enough to repeat that the concert was the first of the season, and that there had not been sufficient rehearsal.

New Members Men of Pith.

For, however desirous Dr. Muck may be to obtain dramatic contrasts, however zealous he may be in his striving after forcible accentuation, he has shown in the past his care for quality and proportion of tone. The new members of the orchestra are said to be men of pith, and as soon as all the players are accustomed to each other and earnest individualities are blended in ensemble, there will be no doubt a full display of the qualities that have long set this orchestra apart from others and won for it the highest praise.

The works chosen for performance are familiar to all. A certain rigidity in the singing of the Bach aria arose probably from fear of falling into the slough of sentimentalism. The feature of Mozart's symphony last night was Dr. Muck's interpretation of the minuet, which was unusually effective, as was in a little less degree his reading of the andante. His conception of the "Pastoral" was sane and fresh, but in all the works performed, as I have said, the orchestra was not heard in its old-time tonal beauty or splendor.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: "Wallenstein," triology, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, Vincent d'Indy; Liszt's concerto in A major for pianoforte (Mr. Rudolph Ganz, pianist); Wagner's "Emperor's" march. The triology of d'Indy is one of the early works of this distinguished composer. It was begun in 1873 and completed about 1881. One of the movements was played in Paris as early as 1874, but the triology as a whole was not performed till 1885. The three movements are entitled: "Wallenstein's Camp"; "Max and Thekla"; "The Death of Wallenstein." Mr. Seidl brought out the triology in New York in 1888.

BOSTON TRAVELER, FRIDAY.
OCTOBER 18, 1907

THE management of the Boston Symphony orchestra has devised a scheme by which speculators have little chance to do business at the Symphony concerts. All the seats in Symphony Hall for Friday afternoon rehearsals and Saturday evening concerts are sold at auction at the beginning of the season, with the exception of the 505 seats in the second balcony on Friday afternoons. These have been used for admissions at 25 cents each since the beginning of the concerts in 1881. It long ago became evident that the purpose of Mr. H. L. Higginson to provide cheap seats for students and the like would be defeated if tickets for them were sold in the ordinary fashion. It was decided some years ago to sell no tickets, but to have the people pay cash for the seats as they enter. Only 505 persons are admitted, and each of them pays his quarter as he enters the hall. Every Friday afternoon there is a long line two or three hours before the doors open at 1:30, and it is very seldom, indeed, that there are not many more waiting than can be admitted.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1907
BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A NOTE ON D'INDY'S "WALLENSTEIN"

The Music of His Youth That Is to Be Played for the First Times Here at the Next Symphony Concerts—A Romantic d'Indy—Wisdom as It Flies—Mr. Belasco Opens His New Theatre in New York —Augustus Thomas Writes a New Play for John Mason—Antoine's Blow at a Cherished Tradition—Musical News of the Hour

Mr. d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein," which Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra are to play for the first times in Boston at the concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, belongs to an earlier time than does most of his music that our audiences have heard, and to an unfamiliar aspect of his temperament and talents. The composer was a mature youth of twenty-three when he began the music in 1874; he was barely thirty when he completed it in 1880; and for much of the intervening time he was still pursuing his studies at the Conservatory and with César Franck. In those days, too, he journeyed much into Germany; sought the acquaintance of Liszt and of Brahms; heard Wagner's operas at Bayreuth, when they were new and strange; pondered long over Schumann; read and reread the romantic, fateful and shadowy tragedies and tales of Schiller and his kind; and gazed intently at the pictures of the German artists of the middle ages. Mr. d'Indy's temperament was deeply and soberly romantic in those years, as it is, with an added austerity even now. Schumann and Wagner stirred him musically. Schiller and Goethe penetrated and seized his imagination. He loved exaltation and mystery, as he loves them still; but he courted as well a romantic vigor and picturesqueness that have turned graver with the advancing years. Comparatively concrete ideas and impressions kindled him then as abstract moods and imaginins wake in him now in his music.

With d'Indy so minded and so occupied, it is easy to see how Schiller's three plays of "Wallenstein's Camp," "Die Piccolomini," and "Wallenstein's Death" stirred his imagination to music. His first composition to come to actual performance was an overture to "Die Piccolomini," which he afterwards remodelled generally and rewrote minutely to make the second part of the troligy. There it is re-named "Max and Thecla," after the son of Octavio Piccolomini and the daughter of Wallenstein, whose hapless love—since they are the children of bitter and pursuing enemies—makes the lyric and the gentle episode in Schiller's plays. In the same fashion, Mr. d'Indy has made it the contrasting portion of his musical trilogy, between his "tone-picturing" of "Wallenstein's Camp"—the first part—and the tragic close in "Wallenstein's Death." Max is young, high-hearted, ardent, alike in his devotion to Thecla, to Wallenstein and to his father. From the father he learns Wallenstein's treachery, struggles not to believe; and when he must believe, struggles again with Wallenstein's appeals for silence. To and fro in this tragedy goes his love for Thecla, and it is easy to believe that behind d'Indy's music lies the scene in "Die Piccolomini" in which they open their tortured hearts to each other.

For the tragic aspect of his symphonic drama, Mr. d'Indy has sought, seemingly, the march of destiny upon Wallenstein to his ruin, and he would put into his music something of the might of the man, as Schiller conceives him, and of the fateful mystery of his fall. The third part of the music runs in such mood of oncoming and irresistible fate. Equally over against it and the lyric episode of Max and Thecla stands the richly colored, changeful and animated music that would catch the atmosphere of "Wallenstein's Camp." It is romantic, almost chivalrous, writing and in it Mr. d'Indy is already imaginative and resourceful in illusive instrumental colors. In the scene of Max and Thecla play the characteristic depth and sincerity of pure emotion that were to flower in his later work; while in the final episode is not a little of the large and austere power, the deep and mysterious voice, of the second symphony or of "The Stranger," his music-drama that we in America have still to know. "Wallenstein," however, belongs to the seventies, and then even for Mr. d'Indy, Wagner was near, new and overshadowing. No wonder that sometimes he has written in the idiom of Baireuth.

From NEW YORK MAIL
Address
Date OCT 19 1907

The Boston Symphony orchestra has reduced materially the number of concerts to be given this season, following a policy to cut down the smaller concerts outside of Boston. Dr. Muck learned as much about "one-night stands" as he cares to, and, believing that one hundred concerts are enough for any organization, this decision was upheld. Outside of the regular series in Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Worcester, Providence and Cambridge, the orchestra will give one concert in Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford, and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these, the two regular pension fund concerts will be given in Boston.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

[illegible] ...ished
...dress
...te OCT 19 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Public Sale For Concerts Will Open On Monday.

The public sale of seats for the Baltimore concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street, on Monday morning next at 9 o'clock. The usual quota of five concerts will be given, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18, the place being as usual, the Lyric.

OCTOBER 19, 1907.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES 'WALLENSTEIN'

The second rehersal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon introduced an interesting novelty "Wallenstein," a trilogy after Schiller, by Vincent D'Indy, a work which has been performed in other American cities, but never in Boston. Rudolph Ganz, who is pleasantly remembered as soloist at these concerts the season before last, was heard in the Liszt concerto in A major no 2, for pianforte. The program closed with the ponderous "Kaisermarsch" of Wagner.

D'Indy conducted the Boston Symphony at a series of concerts two seasons ago and it is rather remarkable that he did not perform the "Wallenstein" trilogy of that time. It is tone painting of high order, especially the second movement, "Max and Thekla," depicting love and death. The first movement describing camp life, faithfully depicts the wild jollity, savageness, and general confusion of the German encampment, while the last number typifying the "Death of Wallenstein" is merely a solemn dirge behind a scurrying of conspirators.

Ganz was given a gratifying reception and played the intricate and dazzling concerto with a brilliancy which was enhanced by the superb orchestral setting.

Dr. Muck conducted in a manner to bring out and emphasize every shade and color of the D'Indy tone poem, while he led the band in the "Emperor's March" with all the enthusiasm of the ardent Wagnerite. The playing of the orchestra was all that could be desired.

1 ... NEW YORK MAIL

ess ...

OCT 15 1907

Dr. Muck's propensities are again shown in the arrangement of programmes for the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in its home city October 11. The first included the Bach suite in D major, the Mozart symphony in G minor and the Beethoven pastoral, No. 6. While this is superb in its fitness, there will be those who, in the face of such a programme, will long for a bit of tabasco. On the other hand, the programme of this week opens with the symphony trilogy, "Wallenstein," by D'Indy, played for the first time in this country, and the Wagner kaisermarsch, between which Rudolph Ganz will play Liszt's concerto in A major for piano. It is evident that Dr. Muck prefers to draw a dividing line between classic and modern. While these are Boston programmes, it is safe to believe that "coming events cast their shadows before."

...

From ... N...G SUN

Address ...

Date ...

Ticket speculators are always with us thanks to mere man, who wants the best seat at the latest popular attraction, and always wants it late. The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has devised a scheme by which speculators have little chance to do business at the symphony concerts in that town.

As is generally known, all the seats in Symphony Hall for Friday afternoon rehearsals and Saturday evening concerts are sold at auction at the beginning of the season, with the exception of the 505 seats in the second balcony on Friday afternoons. These have been used for admissions at 25 cents each since the beginning of the concerts in 1881. It long ago became evident that the purpose of Mr. H. L. Higginson to provide cheap seats for students and the like would be defeated if tickets for them were sold in the ordinary fashion, for as seats go in Symphony Hall for the Boston Symphony concerts the second balcony could easily be sold out at the rate of $1 or $1.50, as they are among the best seats in the hall.

To defeat the speculators, therefore, it was decided some years ago to sell no tickets, but to have the people pay cash for the seats as they enter. There are 505 seats and only 505 persons are admitted, and each of them pays his quarter as he enters the hall. Every Friday afternoon during the season, no matter what the weather may be, there is a long queue two or three hours before the doors open at 1:30, and it is very seldom indeed that there are not many more waiting than can be admitted.

When a popular soloist like Melba or Paderewski is to appear, the "waiters" begin to arrive as early as 8 o'clock in the morning, bring their camp stools, their books and their lunches, and make themselves as comfortable as possible, to the great edification of the rubber neck wagons.

Frankly, here in New York, where grand opera has the stage centre, our orchestras would rather see the ticket speculators at their door than the "S. R. O." sign. They do not precede, they rather follow, prosperity.

...

AMERICAN

OCT 20 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The public sales of the Baltimore concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street, tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 21, at 9 o'clock. The usual quota of five concerts will be given, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 18, the place being, as usual, the Lyric. The season 1906-1907 was the most successful the orchestra has ever had in Baltimore, and there is every reason to believe that the coming winter will be even more so.

The advent of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, added much to the interest of the concerts, and now that he has become familiar with his orchestra and with his audience, even more may be expected from the artistic point of view. Much to the gratification of all music lovers, Dr. Muck has been allowed by the German Emperor an additional leave of absence of one year, which assures his presence during 1907-1908, at any rate, and, perhaps, here is a proper place to say that absolutely no plans have been made regarding the conductorship of the orchestra for 1908-1909. It is the hope of the management that Dr. Muck may be retained for one or more additional seasons, and nothing will be done until this is settled finally one way or another.

The orchestra will return to Baltimore slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being 98, instead of 96, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had but six. But a sixth of its membership is new this season, and various shifts have been made among the other members. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new double bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death and resignation of old members. The others have been made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to its high standard.

Following last year's plan, there will be no soloist at the first and fifth concerts—in November and March. For the other three concerts the solo material is extraordinarily strong. At the December concert Paderewski will play with the orchestra, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in Baltimore during his tour of America. Teresa Carreno will play with the orchestra at the January concert, and in February the soloist will be Mme. Melba, who will then make her only appearance of the year in this city.

The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony; Reger's variations; Bossi's intermezzo, "Goldoniani;" a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphony poem by Ertel; another by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen;" Cesar Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's overture, "Christelflein." It is likely that this list will be added to before the end of the season.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

OCT 20 1907

The public sales of the Baltimore concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's tomorrow morning. The usual quota of five concerts will be given, the dates being November 6, December 4, January 8, February 19 and March 13. They will be given at the Lyric as usual.

The season 1906-1907 was the most successful the orchestra has ever had in Baltimore, and there is every reason to believe that the coming winter will be even more so.

The advent of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, added much to the interest of the concerts here last winter, and now that he has become familiar with his orchestra and with his audiences, even more may be expected from an artistic point of view. Much to the gratification of all music lovers, Dr. Muck has been allowed by the German Emperor an additional leave of absence of one year which assures his presence during 1907-1908 at any rate.

The orchestra will return to Baltimore slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being 98 instead of 96.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

HER OCT 20 1907

Address ...

Date ...

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one-night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York,

[28]

...ished: D...

Institute Announces Five Boston Symphony Concerts

David Bispham and Bessie Bell Collier Are on This Week's Music Programme—Hofmann Coming.

Probably the most interesting musical function this week will be a recital by David Bispham, baritone, and Miss Bessie Bell Collier, violinist, accompanied by Harold O. Smith and Miss Grace Collier.

The recital will be given in Association Hall, Bond and Fulton streets, on Thursday evening.

On Thursday evening, October 31, the opening piano recital of the season will be given in the Baptist Temple by Josef Hofmann.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute announce five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck as director. The dates selected are, November 8, December 3, January 10, February 21, and March 20.

Many Changes in Orchestra.

The orchestra will return to Brooklyn slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninty-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns. Hitherto the orchestra has had six. But a sixth of its membership is new this season and various shifts have been made among other members.

There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and [illegible] new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes have been made necessary by the death and resignation of old members. The others have been made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to its high standard and the Pension Fund of the orchestra is now making retirements of older members possible with a minimum of hardship to them.

Since last spring death has deprived the orchestra of the services of Arnold Moldauer, for many years one of its best first violins, and of Otto Frietsche, its bass clarinet. Professor Willy Hess, for three years the concert master, is spending the Winter abroad on a year's leave of absence. Timothee Adamowski and his brother, Josef Adamowski, resigned in order to give more time to their work in chamber music, and Max Zach, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Perir, resigned to become the conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The other changes were made according to the wishes and advice of Dr. Muck, who personally selected all the new members.

...newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1 ...

...ress ...

OCT 19 1907

e ...

...rld Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 21 1907

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has devised a scheme by which speculators have little chance to do business at the symphony concerts in that city. As is generally known, all the seats in Symphony Hall for Friday afternoon rehearsals and Saturday evening concerts are sold at auction at the beginning of the season, with the exception of the 505 seats in the second balcony on Friday afternoons. These have been used for admissions at 25 cents each, since the beginning of the concerts in 1881. It long ago became evident that the purpose of H. L. Higginson to provide cheap seats for students and the like, would be defeated if tickets for them were sold in the ordinary fashion, for as seats go in Symphony Hall for the Boston Symphony concerts, the second balcony could easily be sold out at the rate of $1 or $1.50, as they are among the best seats in the hall. To defeat the speculators, therefore, it was decided some years ago to sell no tickets, but to have the people pay cash for the seats as they enter. There are 505 seats and only 505 persons are admitted, and each of them pays his quarter as he enters the hall. Every Friday afternoon during the season, no matter what the weather may be, there is a long queue two or three hours before the doors open at 1:30, and it is seldom indeed that there are not many more waiting than can be admitted. When a popular soloist like Melba or Paderewski is to appear, the waiters begin to arrive as early as 8 o'clock in the morning, bring their camp stools, their books, and their lunches, and make themselves as comfortable as possible, to the great edification of the rubberneck wagons.

...m ...

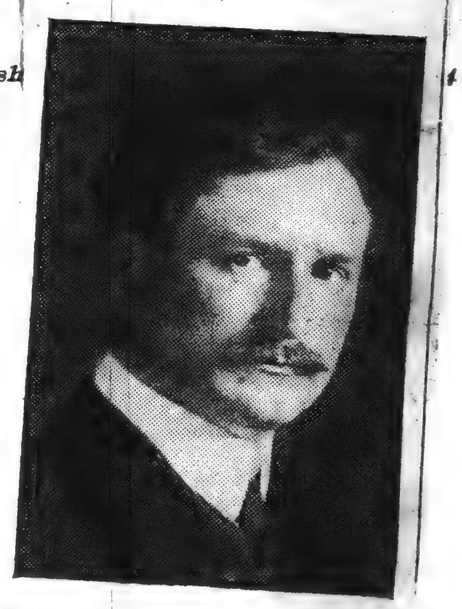
...ress Cost Washington D.C.

...e Oct. 20, 1907.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that the orchestra will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one-night stands" entails more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore, and Washington at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England, for which the orchestra had to make special trips, has been cut out entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford, and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these concerts, the usual two "pension fund" concerts will be given in Boston.

A New Concert-Master

...ablish...



Mr. Carl Wendling, who succeeds Prof. Willy Hess with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Wendling comes from Stuttgart, where for four years he has been the concert-master at the Court Theatre. Although he is but 32 years old, he has been for four years concert-master under Steinbach, in addition to his services in Stuttgart. He has been concert-master at Bayreuth for the last three festivals, and for three seasons held that position in the German performances at Covent Garden under Richter.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ...

Address ...

...te ...

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of smaller concerts given outside of Boston.

This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter.

This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips has been cut down entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford, and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these regular concerts the usual two Pension Fund concerts

From ...

Address ...

Date OCT 19 1907

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips has been cut out entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these regular concerts the usual two Pension Fund concerts will be given in Boston.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 19 1907

The opening sale of the seats for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held next week. There will be five concerts on Friday evenings at the Baptist Temple. Dr. Karl Muck conducts the ninety-eight musicians and the soloists are artists of the highest rank. M. Paderewski, the world famous pianist, appears in December, Mme. Teresa Carreno on January 10 and Fritz Kreisler on February 21. The orchestra will present many novelties—new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony, Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Pfitzler's overture "Christelflwin," as well as other numbers. The first concert will be Friday evening, November 8. The series is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

From RECORD
Address PHILADELPHIA
Date OCT 20 1907

—The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has devised a plan by which speculators have little chance to do business at the symphony concerts in that city. It long ago became evident that the purpose to provide cheap seats for students and others would be defeated if tickets were sold in the ordinary fashion. To defeat the speculators, therefore, it was decided some years ago to sell no tickets, but to have the people pay cash as they enter. There are 505 seats, and only 505 persons are admitted, and each of them pays his quarter as he enters the hall.

Boston Symphony

Adr. Télégrap. COUPURES PARIS
TÉLÉPHONE 101.50
ASCENSEUR
Fondé en 1889

Le COURRIER de la P
A. GALLOIS & CH. DEMO
21, BOULEVARD MONTMARTRE. PARIS
FOURNIT COUPURES DE JOURNAUX & DE REVUES SUR TOUS SUJETS & PERSONNALITÉS

VOIR AU DOS

Journal Le Menestral
Date : Fevrier
Adresse : Cours Vincennes
Signé :

— De New-York : M. Hammerstein, directeur du Manhattan Opera, a l'intention de créer des établissements similaires dans toutes les grandes villes des États-Unis : Philadelphie, Chicago, Boston, Washington, Cincinnati et Saint-Louis. Dans toutes ces villes, M. Hammerstein a entamé, pour l'acquisition de terrains, des négociations qui sont sur le point d'aboutir. L'ouverture de l'Opéra de Philadelphie est même assurée déjà pour le mois de novembre de l'année prochaine. Tous ces opéras ne seront pas exclusivement des succursales de celui de New-York. Il va sans dire que les « stars » de l'ensemble de New-York y donneront des représentations, mais les établissements seront indépendants les uns des autres et chacun aura sa troupe à lui.

— Les New-Yorkais vont, au courant de la saison qui commence, être littéralement gavés de musique. Les directeurs des deux Opéras, MM. Conried et Hammerstein, qui se font une concurrence acharnée, non seulement augmenteront le nombre de leurs représentations hebdomadaires, mais joueront pendant vingt semaines, au lieu de dix-huit. D'autre part, il y aura des concerts à n'en plus finir : la Philharmonie de New-York, sous la direction de M. Wassili Safonow, en annonce provisoirement seize; l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, que dirige M. Karl Muck, en donnera dix; l'Orchestre symphonique de M. Walter Damrosch, vingt-huit; l'Orchestre russe de M. Modeste Altschuler, six, et celui de M. Volpe, trois. Et l'on annonce des tournées de violonistes, de pianistes et d'enfants prodiges par douzaines.

From ...

Address ...

Date OCT 19 1907

The opening sale of the seats for the Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held next week. There will be five concerts on Sunday evenings at the Baptist Temple. Dr. Karl Muck conducts the ninety-eight musicians and the soloists are artists of the highest rank. M. Paderewski, the world-famous pianist, appears in December, Mme. Teresa Carreno on January 10, and Mr. Fritz Kreisler, February 21.

The orchestra will present many novelties: New symphonies by Henry H. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony; Cesar Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's Christelflwin," as well as other numbers. The first concert will be Friday evening, November 8. The series is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

New York Times

From ...

Address ...

Date OCT 20 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Thursdays, Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 29, evenings, while the matinées will be given on the following Sat-man Emperor an additional leave of absence of one year, which assures his presence during 1907-08. No plans have been made concerning the conductorship of the orchestra for 1908-09. It is the hope of the management that Dr. Muck may be retained for one or more additional seasons, and nothing will be done until this is neteled finally one way or the other.

The orchestra will return to New York slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns.

In Prof. Hess's place as concert master will be found Carl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart. His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothée Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky of Berlin. In place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra, and for the last several years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet.

Following last year's plan there will be no soloist at the first and fifth pairs of concerts—in November and March. In December the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy in the evening and Paderewski in the afternoon. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York.

The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony; Reger's Variations; Bossi's "Intermezzo Goldoniania;" a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another "Taormina" by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture to "Heirat wider Willen;" César Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's overture "Christelflein." It is likely that this list will be added to before the end of the season.

From ...

Address ...

Date OCT 19 1907

The opening sale of seats for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held this week. There will be five concerts on Friday evenings at the Baptist Temple. Dr. Karl Muck conducts the ninety-eight musicians, and the soloists are artists of the highest rank. M. Paderewski, the world-famous pianist, appears in December. Mme. Teresa Carreno on Jan. 10, and Fritz Kreisler Feb. 21. The orchestra will present many novelties, new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony, Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Pfitzner's overture "Christelflwin," as well as other numbers. The first concert will be Friday evening, Nov. 8. The series is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH

From ...

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
OCT 19 1907

Date ...

Mr. S. Behrens announces that Paderewski will appear in recital at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 11. This will be in addition to his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great pianist is booked for seventy-five concerts in America this season, including those of the various orchestras.

PUBLIC LEDGER

From ...

Address ...

Date OCT 20 1907

In the future a new policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will cut down the out-of-town concerts of that celebrated organization. The annual route book recently published schedules an even hundred concerts, considerably less than in previous years. The belief that the hardship of travel entailed by the one-night stands more than offsets the financial benefit to be derived from isolated concerts is responsible for the new ruling. It has heretofore been the orchestra's custom to give two concerts on the way home from the monthly visits to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, in which, of course, there will be no change. This year only one concert will be given and concerts in smaller New England cities which require special trips will be cut out entirely. The orchestra will continue, however, to make short trips to the cities of the Middle West.

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give 100 concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. The policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from the monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. This year only one concert will be given, and the concerts in smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips have been eliminated.

From TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE
Date OCT 13 1907

When Dr. Karl Muck reached Boston last week he brought with him a stout packing case, so heavy that it required the strength of two husky porters to handle it. Dr. Muck remarked apologetically that the weight was due to a new score by Max Regor, which it contained, among other things. In all, Dr. Muck has brought over 14 new works which he is to present during the coming season. In the list of composers is one American, Henry Hadley, one adopted American, Charles Martin Loeffler and several names which are new to this country.

The list of novelties is as follows: H. Bischoff, Symphony; Henry Hadley, Symphony; Max Reger, variations; Bossi, "Intermezo Goldoniani;" Loeffler, Orchesterstuck; Schjelderup, Orchesterstuck; Ertel, Symphonie Poem; Boehe, Symphonie Poem; Reznicek, "Suite;" Hugo Kaun, "Suite;" Szekles, "Serenade;" d'Indy-Wallenstein, Symphony; Humperdinck, overtures, "Heirat wider Willen;" Franck, "Redemption;" Pfitzner, overture "Christelflein." In addition to these will doubtless be played some novelties which Dr. Muck had sent to Boston during the summer.

From STAR.
Address ...
Date OCT 20 06

The public subscription sale for the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at the new ticket office of Mr. T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, Tuesday morning last, and the sale of seats has been something unprecedented. The usual quota of five afternoon concerts will be given, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 17, and they will occur at the National Theater at 4:30 in the afternoon. Dr. Muck, who was to conduct the orchestra again during the present season, has brought over a number of new compositions, some of which, it is expected, will be presented at the Washington concerts. Among them is a symphony by Henry Hadley, a symphony by Hermann Bischoff; "Intermezzo Goldoniani," by Bossi; "Orchesterstueck," by Charles Martin Loeffler; "Variations," by Max Reger; two symphonic poems, one by Ertel, the other by Boehe; "Redemption," Caesar Franck; "Symphony," Reznick; overture, "Heirat wider Willen," by Humperdinck, and overture, "Christelflein," by Pfitzner. Mr. Henry Hadley is the American composer who won the Paderewski prize for his symphony, "The Seasons," and residents of this city ought to have an opportunity of hearing at least one of his works played by the orchestra. There will be no soloists at the first and fifth concerts, but Paderewski will assist at the December concert, it being his only appearance with orchestra in this city during the present season. At the concert in January the soloist will be Teresa Carreno, the female Rubinstein, and unquestionably the greatest of woman pianists. For the fourth concert, in February, Fritz Kreisler, the violin virtuoso, has been engaged.

ess Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 19 1907

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips has been cut out entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these regular concerts the usual two Pension Fund concerts will be given in Boston.

EAGLE
[illegible], N. Y.
OCT 19 1907

The opening sale of the seats for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held next week. There will be five concerts on Friday evenings at the Baptist Temple. Dr. Karl Muck conducts the ninety-eight musicians and the soloists are artists of the highest rank. M. Paderewski, the world famous pianist, appears in December, Mme. Teresa Carreno on January 10 and Fritz Kreisler on February 21. The orchestra will present many novelties—new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony, Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Pfitzler's overture "Christelflwin," as well as other numbers. The first concert will be Friday evening, November 8. The series is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

—The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has devised a plan by which speculators have little chance to do business at the symphony concerts in that city. It long ago became evident that the purpose to provide cheap seats for students and others would be defeated if tickets were sold in the ordinary fashion. To defeat the speculators, therefore, it was decided some years ago to sell no tickets, but to have the people pay cash as they enter. There are 505 seats, and only 505 persons are admitted, and each of them pays his quarter as he enters the hall.

Es ... 1884

M Boston Symphony

Adr. Télégrap. COUPURES PARIS
TÉLÉPHONE 101.50
ASCENSEUR
Fondé en 1889

Le COURRIER de la Pl
A. GALLOIS & CH. DEMO
21, BOULEVARD MONTMARTRE. PARIS
FOURNIT COUPURES DE JOURNAUX & DE REVUES SUR TOUS SUJETS & PERSONNALITÉS

VOIR AU DOS

Journal Le Menestral
Date : Fevrier
Adresse : Rue Vivienne
Signé :

TS

— De New-York : M. Hammerstein, directeur du Manhattan Opera, a l'intention de créer des établissements similaires dans toutes les grandes villes des États-Unis : Philadelphie, Chicago, Boston, Washington, Cincinnati et Saint-Louis. Dans toutes ces villes, M. Hammerstein a entamé, pour l'acquisition de terrains, des négociations qui sont sur le point d'aboutir. L'ouverture de l'Opéra de Philadelphie est même assurée déjà pour le mois de novembre de l'année prochaine. Tous ces opéras ne seront pas exclusivement des succursales de celui de New-York. Il va sans dire que les « stars » de l'ensemble de New-York y donneront des représentations, mais les établissements seront indépendants les uns des autres et chacun aura sa troupe à lui.

— Les New-Yorkais vont, au courant de la saison qui commence, être littéralement gavés de musique. Les directeurs des deux Opéras, MM. Conried et Hammerstein, qui se font une concurrence acharnée, non seulement augmenteront le nombre de leurs représentations hebdomadaires, mais joueront pendant vingt semaines, au lieu de dix-huit. D'autre part, il y aura des concerts à n'en plus finir ; la Philharmonie de New-York, sous la direction de M. Wassili Safonow, en annonce provisoirement seize; l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, que dirige M. Karl Muck, en donnera dix; l'Orchestre symphonique de M. Walter Damrosch, vingt-huit; l'Orchestre russe de M. Modeste Altschuler, six, et celui de M. Volpe, trois. Et l'on annonce des tournées de violonistes, de pianistes et d'enfants prodiges par douzaines.

From .....
Address .....
Date OCT 19 1907

The opening sale of the seats for the Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held next week. There will be five concerts on Sunday evenings at the Baptist Temple. Dr. Karl Muck conducts the ninety-eight musicians and the soloists are artists of the highest rank. M. Paderewski, the world-famous pianist, appears in December, Mme. Teresa Carreno on January 10, and Mr. Fritz Kreisler, February 21.

The orchestra will present many novelties: New symphonies by Henry H. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony; Cesar Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's Christelflwin," as well as other numbers. The first concert will be Friday evening, November 8. The series is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From New York Times
Address .....
Date OCT 20 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Thursdays, Nov. 7, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, Feb. 20, and March 29, evenings, while the matinées will be given on the following Saturday afternoons: Nov. 9, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 22, and March 28.

Dr. Karl Muck has been engaged as conductor for the season of 1907-08, and Mr. Wendell Heinemann will be the assistant conductor. Dr. Muck has been granted by the German Emperor an additional leave of absence of one year, which assures his presence during 1907-08. No plans have been made concerning the conductorship of the orchestra for 1908-09. It is the hope of the management that Dr. Muck may be retained for one or more additional seasons, and nothing will be done until this is settled finally one way or the other.

The orchestra will return to New York slightly larger than it was last year, its total membership now being ninety-eight instead of ninety-six, the additional members completing the two quartets of horns.

In Prof. Hess's place as concert master will be found Carl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart. His colleague at the first desk, the successor of Timothée Adamowski, is Richard Czerwonky of Berlin. In place of Mr. Moldauer is Julius Theodorowicz, formerly a member of the orchestra, and for the last several years the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet.

Following last year's plan there will be no soloist at the first and fifth pairs of concerts—in November and March. In December the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy in the evening and Paderewski in the afternoon. This will be Paderewski's only appearance with orchestra in New York.

The novelties to be presented will be chosen from the following list: New symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff; d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony, Reger's Variations; Bossi's "Intermezzo Goldoniania;" a new work for piano and orchestra by Loeffler; a symphonic poem by Ertel; another "Taormina" by Boehe; an orchestral piece by Schjelderup; suites by Reznicek and Hugo Kaun; a serenade by Szekles; Humperdinck's overture to "Heirat wider Willen;" César Franck's "Redemption," and Pfitzner's overture "Christelflein." It is likely that this list will be added to before the end of the season.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The opening sale of seats for the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held this week. There will be five concerts on Friday evenings at the Baptist Temple. Dr. Karl Muck conducts the ninety-eight musicians, and the soloists are artists of the highest rank. M. Paderewski, the world-famous pianist, appears in December. Mme. Teresa Carreno on Jan. 10, and Fritz Kreisler Feb. 21. The orchestra will present many novelties, new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's Wallenstein symphony, Cesar Franck's "Redemption" and Pfitzner's overture "Christelflwin," as well as other numbers. The first concert will be Friday evening, Nov. 8. The series is under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH

From .....
Address PHILADELPHIA.
OCT 19 1907
Date .....

Mr. S. Behrens announces that Paderewski will appear in recital at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 11. This will be in addition to his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great pianist is booked for seventy-five concerts in America this season, including those of the various orchestras.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

In the future a new policy of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will cut down the out-of-town concerts of that celebrated organization. The annual route book recently published schedules an even hundred concerts, considerably less than in previous years. The belief that the hardship of travel entailed by the one-night stands more than offsets the financial benefit to be derived from isolated concerts is responsible for the new ruling. It has heretofore been the orchestra's custom to give two concerts on the way home from the monthly visits to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, in which, of course, there will be no change. This year only one concert will be given and concerts in smaller New England cities which require special trips will be cut out entirely. The orchestra will continue, however, to make short trips to the cities of the Middle West.

Est ... 1884

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give 100 concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. The policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from the monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. This year only one concert will be given, and the concerts in smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips have been eliminated.

...York, 1884

From .....
Address .....
Date OCT 19 1907

When Dr. Karl Muck reached Boston last week he brought with him a stout packing case, so heavy that it required the strength of two husky porters to handle it. Dr. Muck remarked apologetically that the weight was due to a new score by Max Regor, which it contained, among other things. In all, Dr. Muck has brought over 14 new works which he is to present during the coming season. In the list of composers is one American, Henry Hadley, one adopted American, Charles Martin Loeffler and several names which are new to this country.

The list of novelties is as follows: H. Bischoff, Symphony; Henry Hadley, Symphony; Max Reger, variations; Bossi, "Intermezo Goldoniani;" Loeffler, Orchesterstuck; Schjelderup, Orchesterstuck; Ertel, Symphonie Poem; Boehe, Symphonie Poem; Reznicek, "Suite;" Hugo Kaun, "Suite;" Szekles, "Serenade;" d'Indy-Wallenstein, Symphony; Humperdinck, overtures, "Heirat wider Willen;" Franck, "Redemption;" Pfitzner, overture "Christelflein." In addition to these will doubtless be played some novelties which Dr. Muck had sent to Boston during the summer.

Establish

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The public spbscription sale for the Washington concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened at the new ticket office of Mr. T. Arthur Smith, 1411 F street, Tuesday morning last, and the sale of seats has been something unprecedented. The usual quota of five afternoon concerts will be given, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 18 and March 17, and they will occur at the National Theater at 4:30 in the afternoon. Dr. Muck, who was to conduct the orchestra again during the present season, has brought over a number of new compositions, some of which, it is expected, will be presented at the Washington concerts. Among them is a symphony by Henry Hadley, a symphony by Hermann Bischoff; "Intermezzo Goldoniani," by Bossi; "Orchesterstueck," by Charles Martin Loeffler; "Variations," by Max Reger; two symphonic poems, one by Ertel, the other by Boehe; "Redemption," Caesar Franck; "Symphony," Reznick; overture, "Heirat wider Willen," by Humperdinck, and overture, "Christelflein," by Pfitzner. Mr. Henry Hadley is the American composer who won the Paderewski prize for his symphony, "The Seasons," and residents of this city ought to have an opportunity of hearing at least one of his works played by the orchestra. There will be so soloists at the first and fifth concerts, but Paderewski will assist at the December concert, it being his only appearance with orchestra in this city during the present season. At the concert in January the soloist will be Teresa Carreno, the female Rubinstein, and unquestionably the greatest of women pianists. For the fourth concert, in February, Fritz Kreisler, the violin virtuoso, has been engaged.

Es ... 1884

[29]

From ..... OCT 20 19

Address ..... PEA... Ont. PA

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail, more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the Winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips, has been cut down entirely.

...ork, 1884

From ..... HARLEM LOC

Address ..... NEW YORK CITY

Date ..... OCT 19 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with many new faces in its ranks and conducted by Dr. Carl Muck, will appear this year on the following dates: Nov. 7-9, Dec. 5-7, Jan. 9-11, Feb. 20-22, March 19-21. Many new and interesting works are promised, including a new symphony by the American, Henry Hadley.

The dates of the Philharmonic Society's concerts are: Nov. 15-16, Nov. 29-30, Dec. 13-14, Jan. 3-4, Jan. 24-25, Feb. 7-8, Feb. 28-29, March 13-14. Wassili Safonoff will again be the conductor.

Josef Hofman, the great pianist, will appear in recital at Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 26. His program is a highly interesting one, including Beethoven's last Sonata Op. 111, twenty-five of Chopin's preludes, the great Schumann Fantasia, and a group of Liszt pieces.

Established ...

From ..... TIMES

Address ..... BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date ..... OCT 19 1907

The opening sale of seats for the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which have been duly heralded, will be held next week. The first concert will be on the evening of Friday, November 8, with an exclusive orchestral programme. Paderewski, Mme. Teresa Carreno and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloists at the second, third and fourth concerts, respectively.

...ork, 1884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address ..... PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date ..... OCT 20 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one-night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England, for which the orchestra had to make special trips, has been cut down entirely.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... BULLETIN

Address ..... PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date ..... OCT 19 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual five concerts in the Academy of Music, on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17, and March 16. Three soloists are announced, Paderewski, whose only appearance here with orchestra it will be; Melba, who, it is said, will make no other appearance in Philadelphia this season, and Teresa Carenna, the pianist. There will be no soloist at the first and fifth concerts.

Established ...

OCTOBER 19, 1907

Symphony Draws Large Gathering

Society Leaders Turn Out in Force at Rehearsal—Mme. Calve to Sing Today.

A large and handsome gathering turned out for the Symphony rehearsal yesterday, the scene to be duplicated today, when Calve sings. Noted in the throng were Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, a picture in smart fall attire; Mrs. F. Gordon Dexter, just home from abroad; Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson, Sr., Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson, Jr., the Misses Julia and Barbara Higginson, Mrs. James Jackson, her daughter, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. Frederic Converse, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Henry Howard Fay, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. G. H. Francis, Miss Alice Gardiner, Mrs. Roger Wolcott and daughter Cornelia, Mrs. Hugh Whitney, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Karl Muck, Mrs. Franz Zerrahn, Mrs. F. R. Nourse, Mrs. Henry Parker Quincy, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. George Stoddard, Mrs. Nason Hamlin, Mrs. George Mumford, Mrs. S. Reed Anthony, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and daughter, Miss Forbes, Mrs. De Ford Bigelow, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Jr., Mrs. R. D. Whittier, Mrs. Cabot Morse, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. Horatio Lamb, Mrs. William Whitman, Mrs. James L. Storrow, Mrs. S. J. Mixter, Mrs. Curtis Guild, Miss Leslie Lindsay, Mrs. Albert Nickerson, Mrs. Frederic Richardson, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Miss MacNichol, Mrs. S. Henry Hooper, Mrs. William Gaston, Mrs. Auster Potter and Mrs. William T. Councilman. Many men attended.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY

OCTOBER 19, 1907

WENDLING SYMPHONY SOLOIST NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck has placed three familiar works on his program for next week's concerts, and the novelty will be found in the first appearance as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Wendling was a pupil of Joachim, and has brought to this country an enviable reputation as a virtuoso. He has chosen for his introductory work one of the most difficult of the violin concertos, that by Brahms. The first number of the program will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva," and the last will be Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, a work which has not appeared on the symphony program for some years.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, OCTOBER

THE LONGY CLUB

The membership of the Longy Club of accomplished virtuosi on wind instruments is unchanged—it is pleasant to announce—for the new season. The flutes are Mr. Daniel Maquarre and Mr. Brooks; the oboes, Mr. Longy himself and Mr. Lenom; the clarinets, Mr. Grisez and Mr. Mimart; the horns, Mr. Hain and Mr. Lorbeer; the bassoons, Mr. Sadony and Mr. Helleberg; while Mr. de Voto remains the pianist. Again, too, the club will give three concerts in Potter Hall on the evenings of Mondays, Nov. 18, Dec. 30 and Feb. 10. As usual, too, Mr. Longy has made his interesting discoveries in music, old and new, for wind instruments, and his programmes will consist almost wholly of pieces not hitherto heard here. Among them are a quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano by Alberic Magnard, the French composer, whose high reputation in Paris is at last making its way across the Atlantic; a "dix-tuor" for the full club—two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons by Georges Enesco, the young Roumanian composer, who has made his way swiftly and deservedly in Paris—a piece that Mr. Longy finds a little masterpiece in its kind; a "chamber symphony" for a small orchestra of piano, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, violins, viola, 'cello and double bass, by another interesting and rising young composer, Wolf Ferrari; a quintet by Mr. Dolmetsch in the delicate archaic manner that he loves for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; a suite for the full club by Jules Monquet; a sextet for piano, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn by Alfonso Falconi; a little piece for clarinet and piano by Mr. Messager, a composer still with all his work as director of the Opéra in Paris; a set of waltzes for piano, flute, oboe and clarinet by Jacques Ehrhart; and what seems a curious piece by Gustav Bumcke—"Der Spaziergang" for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bassett horn, waldhorn, bassoons and harp. So much for the newer composers. From their elders and from the classics Mr. Longy has chosen Glinka's "Trio Pathétique" for piano, clarinet and bassoon, and Mozart's "Quartetto Concertante" for oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. He is planning also to revive Mr. Loeffler's rhapsodies for oboe, viola and piano; Huré's "Pastoral" for flutes, oboe, English horn, clarinets, horn and bassoons, and Pierné's "Pastoral Variations in the Antique Style" flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and trumpet. In every respect a notable list, with the flavor of things rare and delicate that has been characteristic of the Longy Club from its beginning.

Concerts Next Week

The novel interest in the third pair of Symphony Concerts, at Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, lies in the first appearance here as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Hitherto only the brief passages for solo violin in Bach's suite in D major, played at the first pair of concerts, have given any hint of Mr. Wendling's individual qualities. They promise well and his high reputation in Germany and elsewhere in Europe has already preceded him. He has worked at Covent Garden under Richter—a keen chooser of able men; he has been the concert master of the orchestra at Beireuth; and he came to Boston from the orchestra of the Court Opera and the Court Concerts at Stuttgart. As a virtuoso, he has played as well in many German cities. Clearly Mr. Wendling has not hesitated to test his powers to the utmost before his new public; for he has chosen Brahms's concerto for violin and orchestra as his solo piece—music that exacts not only the amplest technical resources, but deep understanding and large and lofty expression from the players. The other numbers of the programme are Schumann's overture to his romantic opera, "Genoveva," familiar by many repetitions at the Symphony Concerts, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. For the first time in it, since Dr. Muck came to Boston, he will be conducting a symphony by Mendelssohn, and it is some years since this particular symphony has been played here.

The Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its series of concerts in Cambridge, on Thursday evening next, at eight o'clock, in the Sanders Theatre. Dr. Muck will conduct; there will be no assisting soloist; and the programme is slightly abridged from that of the first pair of concerts in Boston—the overture from Bach's suite in D major, Mozart's symphony in G minor; and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

From ..... JOURNAL

Address ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date ..... OCT 20 1907

Usual Series of Symphony Concerts to be Given.—Other Announcements.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of three concerts in Providence this season. The dates are Tuesday, Nov. 19; Tuesday, Dec. 31, and Wednesday, Feb. 12. The management of the orchestra has decided to cut down the number of out-of-town concerts this year and in the future, and for some time it was a question whether Hartford or Providence should lose two of the three concerts in the past allotted to these cities, but it was finally decided to give Providence its usual three and give Hartford but one. The soloist at the first concert in Providence will be Olga Samaroff. The other soloists will be announced in due time, likewise the particulars regarding the renewals of subscriptions to the sale of seats for the winter.

...ork, 1884

BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1907

SUNDAY HERALD---BOSTON, OCTOBER 20, 1907.

SYMPHONY PLAYS D'INDY WORK WELL

"Wallenstein's Camp," an Early Trilogy, in Orchestra's Best Manner.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall was as follows:

"Wallenstein," Trilogy.....D'Indy
Concerto in A major for piano.....Liszt
The Emperor's March.....Wagner

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" was played for the first time in this city, yet it is one of the composer's earliest compositions, and Mr. Seidl brought out the whole trilogy in New York nearly 20 years ago.

When d'Indy began to compose his tribute to Schiller—this was in 1873—he was under the influence of German masters. When his overture to "The Piccolomini" now in a greatly revised form, the second movement of the trilogy, was first played in Paris, it was thought to be too Schumannesque, and it may interest some to know that in 1873 d'Indy became acquainted with Brahms' "German Requiem," which impressed him so deeply that he made a pilgrimage and finally found Brahms who happened to be in a churlish mood, as though "No Frenchmen need apply" were his vacation motto. (Later Brahms was a warm admirer of Bizet.)

D'Indy was then, perhaps, Germanized rather than d'Indyized. He was an eager reader of Goethe, Schiller, Uhland, E. T. A. Hoffman, but especially of Schiller, whose "Song of the Bell" tempted him to the composition that took the prize offered by the city of Paris. He felt the quality in Schiller that Coleridge described as "hearty." And in the "Wallenstein" dramas he saw at once the material for three symphonic poems. "Wallenstein's Camp" naturally suggested descriptive music, which might serve as a contrast to the love music of Max and Thekla and to the death and the apotheosis of the hero.

"The Camp" Most Popular.

"Wallenstein's Camp" is the movement that has evidently been the most popular of the three, but in poetic and dramatic matter and also in the form of expression it is inferior to the other two movements. It is plausibly animated, there are sharply contrasted episodes, but the themes themselves are not salient. The development is generally conventional and the pages are not always firmly knit together. The Capuchin's Sermon is only solemnly humorous, humorous in answer to expectation. Yet there are interesting moments in the movement, and [illegible]

The music for Max and Thekla might be music for any lovers whose passion is cooled by death. If the chief themes be, as some say, typical of the two characters, it would seem as though d'Indy had been more fortunate in his portraiture of Thekla, though her theme is still more effectively used in the final movement, where the "thought of Thekla" is the episode in which emotion rises to its height, as far as this composition is concerned. D'Indy is almost never sensuous, and even in his comparatively youthful music there is meditative devotion rather than sensuous rhapsody. The close of this movement is beautiful in its simplicity, in its tragic reserve.

The opening of "The Death of Wallenstein" may or may not have the astrological import that Imbert attributed to it—"strange chords characterize the influence of the stars on human destiny." We all know that Wallenstein was a devout astrologer, but whether these chords are astrological or not, does not matter; they are wondrously impressive and they prepare the hearer for the tragic ending. Let each reader of Schiller's tragedy find what he can in d'Indy's music, which is without a programme: as absolute music, the movement would be equally eloquent. As I have said, the reappearance of Thekla's theme is finely imagined. The apotheosis is unusually stirring, and the ending is dignified, heroic, without vulgar pomp and ceremony.

Performance Creditable.

It is a pleasure to add that the performance was generally worthy of the orchestra in its best estate, in matters of technical detail, in euphony, in rhetorical spirit. The music was evidently appreciated and enjoyed. The applause was hearty after each movement; and at the end Dr. Muck was recalled.

Dr. Muck is to be thanked for making us acqainted with the chief work of d'Indy's earlier period. The trilogy does not reveal the great master who wrote the superb second symphony or the dazzling "Istar" variations, though there are occasional hints at his coming; but it is a serious composition that shows the purity and nobility of his artistic aim, an aim from which he has never swerved either in concert hall or opera house. It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will soon let us hear d'Indy's latest works, "The Summer Day on the Mountain" and "Souvenirs."

The other feature of the concert was the excellent performance of Liszt's concerto, the second one, which was long a stumbling block both to pianists and hearers. But that which in Liszt's lifetime was to his contemporaries foolishness is now accepted as a corner-stone and many have built on it. The performance of Mr. Ganz was fleet and brilliant. His force was sufficient and sound did not degenerate into noise. The one phrase that is often sentimentalized was played with true sentiment. The whole performance was that of a virtuoso-musician.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: Schumann's overture to "Genoveva"; Brahm's violin concerto; Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, "Scotch." Mr. [illegible] the new concert master of the [illegible] will make his [illegible] soloist in the [illegible]

D'INDY'S "WALLENSTEIN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two things made Saturday night's Symphony concert memorable. One was the first performance here of the trilogy, "Wallenstein," by D'Indy. The other was the splendid example of piano playing given by Rudolph Ganz in Liszt's Concerto in A major, No. 2.

It shows the conservatism, if you please, of Symphony programme makers that the "Wallenstein" should have taken nearly twenty years to reach Boston. In its complete form, the trilogy was played in Paris, and also in New York, in 1888. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," had also been heard in the West before we heard it here last week. The work is based on Schiller's tragedy, dealing with the career of the Duke of Friedland, most famous of the imperial generals in the Thirty Years' War, who dreamt of resuscitating the Byzantine empire and who was assassinated after the Emperor of whom he wished to make another Alexander the Great had jealously deposed him on the charge of treason.

Impressive Performance.

The "Camp" movement is a vivid picture of soldiery made boisterous by success and confidence. The second movement, "Max and Thekla," being largely a description of a love scene, is softer in mood, and, though D'Indy carefully eschews all sentimental outbursts, nevertheless the result, as a whole, is quite entrancing. The third movement, "The Death of Wallenstein," brings back the camp, with its restlessness and wildness, and the death of the hero is rather suggested than described.

The performance by the orchestra of the trilogy was impressive throughout; whether in the din of the camp or in the calmer, sweeter passages of the romantic second movement, fine style and keen sympathy were always present. At the close of the work the players, as well as Dr. Muck himself, were compelled to bow to the enthusiasm of the audience.

"Riotous" Liszt Concerto.

The concerto that Mr. Ganz chose for the evening abounds in almost insurmountable difficulties; it is one long brilliant improvization or rhapsody, demanding perfect mastery of rhythm and technique, and, at the same time, an imagination equal to giving color to the constantly shifting themes. "Never," has been said of the concerto, "has ever Liszt rioted more unreservedly in fitful orgies of flashing color. Mr. Ganz's performance was worthy of the work. Not only did the young Swiss artist meet every demand, but he gave signs of a reserve that was hardly less impressive than the actual performance itself. His was a brilliant feat in every respect.

To close the concert the orchestra gave Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" in perfect form. It was a glorious night for both soloist and orchestra.

The program of this week's concert is as follows: Schumann's [illegible] "Genoveva," Brahms' [illegible]

[30]

From ..... BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1907.

Address ..... OCT 20 1907

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the Winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips, has been cut down entirely.

ork, 1884

From ..... MARLEE. LOC

Address ..... NEW YORK CIT

Date .....

Established

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with many new faces in its ranks and conducted by Dr. Carl Muck, will appear this year on the following dates: Nov. 7-9. Dec. 5-7. Jan. 9-11. Feb. 20-22. March 19-21. Many new and interesting works are promised, including a new symphony by the American, Henry Hadley.

The dates of the Philharmonic Society's concerts are: Nov. 15-16, Nov. 29-30. Dec. 13-14. Jan. 3-4. Jan. 24-25. Feb. 7-8. Feb. 28-29. March 13-14. Wassili Safonoff will again be the conductor.

Josef Hofman, the great pianist, will appear in recital at Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 26. His program is a doubly interesting one, including Beethoven's last Sonata Op. 111, twenty-five of Chopin's preludes, the great Schumann Fantasia, and a number of his own pieces.

From ..... TIMES

Address ..... [illegible] N. Y.

Date ..... OCT 19 1907

Symphony Draws Large Gathering

Society Leaders Turn Out in Force at Rehearsal—Mme. Calve to Sing Today.

A large and handsome gathering turned out for the Symphony rehearsal yesterday, the scene to be duplicated today, when Calve sings. Noted in the throng were Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, a picture in smart fall attire; Mrs. F. Gordon Dexter, just home from abroad; Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson, Sr., Mrs. Francis Lee Higginson, Jr., the Misses Julia and Barbara Higginson, Mrs. James Jackson, her daughter, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. Frederic Converse, Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. Charles H. Greenleaf, Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Henry Howard Fay, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. G. H. Francis, Miss Alice Gardiner, Mrs. Roger Wolcott and daughter Cornelia, Mrs. Hugh Whitney, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Karl Muck, Mrs. Franz Zeerahn, Mrs. F. R. Nourse, Mrs. Henry Parker Quincy, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Mrs. George Stoddard, Mrs. Nason Hamlin, Mrs. George Mumford, Mrs. S. Reed Anthony, Mrs. Walter Scott Fitz, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and daughter, Miss Forbes, Mrs. De Ford Bigelow, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Jr., Mrs. R. D. Whittier, Mrs. Cabot Morse, Miss Grace Edwards, Mrs. Horatio Lamb, Mrs. William Whitman, Mrs. James L. Storrow, Mrs. S. J. Mixter, Mrs. Curtis Guild, Miss Leslie Lindsay, Mrs. Albert Nickerson, Mrs. Frederic Richardson, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Mrs. A. Forbes Conant, Miss MacNichol, Mrs. S. Henry Hooper, Mrs. William Gaston, Mrs. Auster Potter and Mrs. William T. Councilman. Many men attended.

THE LONGY CLUB.

The membership of the Longy Club of accomplished virtuosi on wind instruments is unchanged—it is pleasant to announce—for the new season. The flutes are Mr. Daniel Maquarre and Mr. Brooks; the oboes, Mr. Longy himself and Mr. Lenom; the clarinets, Mr. Grisez and Mr. Mimart; the horns, Mr. Hain and Mr. Lorbeer; the bassoons, Mr. Sadony and Mr. Helleberg; while Mr. de Voto remains the pianist. Again, too, the club will give three concerts in Potter Hall on the evenings of Mondays, Nov. 18, Dec. 30 and Feb. 10. As usual, too, Mr. Longy has made his interesting discoveries in music, old and new, for wind instruments, and his programmes will consist almost wholly of pieces not hitherto heard here. Among them are a quintet for flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and piano by Alberic Magnard, the French composer, whose high reputation in Paris is at last making its way across the Atlantic; a "dixtuor" for the full club—two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons by Georges Enesco, the young Roumanian composer, who has made his way swiftly and deservedly in Paris—a piece that Mr. Longy finds a little masterpiece in its kind; a "chamber symphony" for a small orchestra of piano, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon, violins, viola, 'cello and double bass, by another interesting and rising young composer, Wolf Ferrari; a quintet by Mr. Dolmetsch in the delicate archaic manner that he loves for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon; a suite for the full club by Jules Monquet; a sextet for piano, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn by Alfonso Falconi; a little piece for clarinet and piano by Mr. Messager, a composer still with all his work as director of the Opéra in Paris; a set of waltzes for piano, flute, oboe and clarinet by Jacques Ehrhart; and what seems a curious piece by Gustav Bumcke—"Der Spaziergang" for flute, oboe, English horn, clarinet, bassett horn, waldhorn, bassoons and harp. So much for the newer composers. From their elders and from the classics Mr. Longy has chosen Glinka's "Trio Pathétique" for piano, clarinet and bassoon, and Mozart's "Quartetto Concertante" for oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. He is planning also to revive Mr. Loeffler's rhapsodies for oboe, viola and piano; Huré's "Pastoral" for flutes, oboe, English horn, clarinets, horn and bassoons, and Pierné's "Pastoral Variations in the Antique Style" flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, bassoon and trumpet. In every respect a notable list, with the flavor of things rare and delicate that has been characteristic of the Longy Club from its beginning.

Concerts Next Week

The novel interest in the third pair of Symphony Concerts, at Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, lies in the first appearance here as a soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Hitherto only the brief passages for solo violin in Bach's suite in D major, played at the first pair of concerts, have given any hint of Mr. Wendling's individual qualities. They promised well and his high reputation in Germany and elsewhere in Europe has already preceded him. He has worked at Covent Garden under Richter—a keen chooser of able men; he has been the concert master of the orchestra at Beireuth; and he came to Boston from the orchestra of the Court Opera and the Court Concerts at Stuttgart. As a virtuoso, he has played as well in many German cities. Clearly Mr. Wendling has not hesitated to test his powers to the utmost before his new public; for he has chosen Brahms's concerto for violin and orchestra as his solo piece—music that exacts not only the amplest technical resources, but deep understanding and large and lofty expression from the players. The other numbers of the programme are Schumann's overture to his romantic opera, "Genoveva," familiar by many repetitions at the Symphony Concerts, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. For the first time in it, since Dr. Muck came to Boston, he will be conducting a symphony by Mendelssohn, and it is some years since this particular symphony has been played here.

The Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its series of concerts in Cambridge, on Thursday evening next, at eight o'clock, in the Sanders Theatre. Dr. Muck will conduct; there will be no assisting soloist; and the programme is slightly abridged from that of the first pair of concerts in Boston—the overture from Bach's suite in D major, Mozart's symphony in G minor; and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

OCT 20 1907

Usual Series of Symphony Concerts to be Given.—Other Announcements.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of three concerts in Providence this season. The dates are Tuesday, Nov. 19; Tuesday, Dec. 31, and Wednesday, Feb. 12. The management of the orchestra has decided to cut down the number of out-of-town concerts this year and in the future, and for some time it was a question whether Hartford or Providence should lose two of the three concerts in the past allotted to these cities, but it was finally decided to give Providence its usual three and give Hartford but one. The soloist at the first concert in Providence will be Olga Samaroff. The other soloists will be announced in due time, likewise the particulars regarding the renewals of subscriptions to the sale of seats for the winter.

188

BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1907

WENDLING SYMPHONY SOLOIST NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck has placed three familiar works on his program for next week's concerts, and the novelty will be found in the first appearance as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Wendling was a pupil of Joachim, and has brought to this country an enviable reputation as a virtuoso. He has chosen for his introductory work one of the most difficult of the violin concertos, that by Brahms. The first number of the program will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva," and the last will be Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, a work which has not appeared [illegible] phony program for some years.

E. The opening sale of seats for the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which have been duly heralded, will be held next week. The first concert will be on the evening of Friday, November 8, with an exclusive orchestral programme. Paderewski, Mme. Teresa Carreno and Fritz Kreisler will be the soloists at the second, third and fourth concerts, respectively.

, 1884

The Largest Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one-night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England, for which the orchestra had to make special trips, has been cut down entirely.

ork, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... BULLETIN

Address ..... PHILADELPHIA, PA

Date ..... OCT 19 1907

Establis

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will this winter give its usual five concerts in the Academy of Music, on Monday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 17, and March 16. Three soloists are announced, Paderewski, whose only appearance here with orchestra it will be; Melba, who, it is said, will make no other appearance in Philadelphia this season, and Teresa Carenna, the pianist. There will be no soloist at the first and fifth concerts.

BOSTON JOURNAL—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1907

WENDLING SYMPHONY SOLOIST NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck has placed three familiar works on his program for next week's concerts, and the novelty will be found in the first appearance as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Wendling was a pupil of Joachim, and has brought to this country an enviable reputation as a virtuoso. He has chosen for his introductory work one of the most difficult of the violin concertos, that by Brahms. The first number of the program will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva," and the last will be Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, a work which has not appeared [illegible] phony program for some years.

BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1907.

SUNDAY HERALD---BOSTON, OCTOBER 20, 1907.

SYMPHONY PLAYS D'INDY WORK WELL

"Wallenstein's Camp," an Early Trilogy, in Orchestra's Best Manner.

BY PHILIP HALE

The programme of the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall was as follows:

"Wallenstein," Trilogy.....D'Indy
Concerto in A major for piano.....Liszt
The Emperor's March.....Wagner

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" was played for the first time in this city, yet it is one of the composer's earliest compositions, and Mr. Seidl brought out the whole trilogy in New York nearly 20 years ago.

When d'Indy began to compose his tribute to Schiller—this was in 1873—he was under the influence of German masters. When his overture to "The Piccolomini" now in a greatly revised form, the second movement of the trilogy, was first played in Paris, it was thought to be too Schumannesque, and it may interest some to know that in 1873 d'Indy became acquainted with Brahms' "German Requiem," which impressed him so deeply that he made a pilgrimage and finally found Brahms who happened to be in a churlish mood, as though "No Frenchmen need apply" were his vacation motto. (Later Brahms was a warm admirer of Bizet.)

D'Indy was then, perhaps, Germanized rather than d'Indyized. He was an eager reader of Goethe, Schiller, Uhland, E. T. A. Hoffman, but especially of Schiller, whose "Song of the Bell" tempted him to the composition that took the prize offered by the city of Paris. He felt the quality in Schiller that Coleridge described as "hearty." And in the "Wallenstein" dramas he saw at once the material for three symphonic poems. "Wallenstein's Camp" naturally suggested descriptive music, which might serve as a contrast to the love music of Max and Thekla and to the death and the apotheosis of the hero.

"The Camp" Most Popular.

"Wallenstein's Camp" is the movement that has evidently been the most popular of the three, but in poetic and dramatic matter and also in the form of expression it is inferior to the other two movements. It is plausibly animated, there are sharply contrasted episodes, but the themes themselves are not salient. The development is generally conventional and the pages are not always firmly knit together. The Capuchin's Sermon is only solemnly humorous, humorous in answer to expectation. Yet there are interesting moments in the movement, and there are instances of ingenious and brilliant instrumen[illegible]

The music for Max and Thekla might be music for any lovers whose passion is cooled by death. If the chief themes be, as some say, typical of the two characters, it would seem as though d'Indy had been more fortunate in his portraiture of Thekla, though her theme is still more effectively used in the final movement, where the "thought of Thekla", is the episode in which emotion rises to its height, as far as this composition is concerned. D'Indy is almost never sensuous, and even in his comparatively youthful music there is meditative devotion rather than sensuous rhapsody. The close of this movement is beautiful in its simplicity, in its tragic reserve.

The opening of "The Death of Wallenstein" may or may not have the astrological import that Imbert attributed to it—"strange chords characterize the influence of the stars on human destiny." We all know that Wallenstein was a devout astrologer, but whether these chords are astrological or not, does not matter; they are wondrously impressive and they prepare the hearer for the tragic ending. Let each reader of Schiller's tragedy find what he can in d'Indy's music, which is without a programme: as absolute music, the movement would be equally eloquent. As I have said, the reappearance of Thekla's theme is finely imagined. The apotheosis is unusually stirring, and the ending is dignified, heroic, without vulgar pomp and ceremony.

Performance Creditable.

It is a pleasure to add that the performance was generally worthy of the orchestra in its best estate, in matters of technical detail, in euphony, in rhetorical spirit. The music was evidently appreciated and enjoyed. The applause was hearty after each movement; and at the end Dr. Muck was recalled.

Dr. Muck is to be thanked for making us acquainted with the chief work of d'Indy's earlier period. The trilogy does not reveal the great master who wrote the superb second symphony or the dazzling "Istar" variations, though there are occasional hints at his coming, but it is a serious composition that shows the purity and nobility of his artistic aim, an aim from which he has never swerved either in concert hall or opera house. It is to be hoped that Dr. Muck will soon let us hear d'Indy's latest works, "The Summer Day on the Mountain" and "Souvenirs."

The other feature of the concert was the excellent performance of Liszt's concerto, the second one, which was long a stumbling block, both to pianists and hearers. But that which in Liszt's lifetime was to his contemporaries foolishness is now accepted as a corner-stone and many have built on it. The performance of Mr. Ganz was fleet and brilliant. His force was sufficient and sound did not degenerate into noise. The one phrase that is often sentimentalized was played with true sentiment. The whole performance was that of a virtuoso-musician.

The programme of the concert this week will be as follows: Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Brahm's violin concerto; Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, "Scotch." Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his first appearance as a soloist in the United States.

[30]

D'INDY'S "WALLENSTEIN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two things made Saturday night's Symphony concert memorable. One was the first performance here of the trilogy, "Wallenstein," by D'Indy. The other was the splendid example of piano playing given by Rudolph Ganz in Liszt's Concerto in A major, No. 2.

It shows the conservatism, if you please, of Symphony program-makers that the "Wallenstein" should have taken nearly twenty years to reach Boston. In its complete form, the trilogy was played in Paris, and also in New York, in 1888. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," had also been heard in the West before we heard it here last week. The work is based on Schiller's tragedy, dealing with the career of the Duke of Friedland, most famous of the Imperial generals in the Thirty Years' War, who dreamt of resuscitating the Byzantine empire and who was assassinated after the Emperor of whom he wished to make another Alexander the Great had jealously deposed him on the charge of treason.

Impressive Performance.

The "Camp" movement is a vivid picture of soldiery made boisterous by success and confidence. The second movement, "Max and Thekla," being largely a description of a love scene, is softer in mood, and, though D'Indy carefully eschews all sentimental outbursts, nevertheless the result, as a whole, is quite entrancing. The third movement, "The Death of Wallenstein," brings back the camp, with its restlessness and wildness, and the death of the hero is rather suggested than described.

The performance by the orchestra of the trilogy was impressive throughout; whether in the din of the camp or in the calmer, sweeter passages of the romantic second movement, fine style and keen sympathy were always present. At the close of the work the players, as well as Dr. Muck himself, were compelled to bow to the enthusiasm of the audience.

"Riotous" Liszt Concerto.

The concerto that Mr. Ganz chose for the evening abounds in almost insurmountable difficulties; it is one long, brilliant improvization or rhapsody, demanding perfect mastery of rhythm and technique, and, at the same time, an imagination equal to giving color to the constantly shifting themes. "Never," it has been said of the concerto, "has even Liszt rioted more unreservedly in fitful orgies of flashing color. Mr. Ganz's performance was worthy of the work. Not only did the young Swiss artist meet every demand, but he gave signs of a reserve that was hardly less impressive than the actual performance itself. His was a brilliant feat in every respect.

To close the concert the orchestra gave Wagner's "Kaisermarsch" in perfect form. It was a glorious night for both soloist and orchestra.

The program of this week's concert is as follows: Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," Brahms' Concerto in D major, for violin and orchestra; and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. Mr. Wendling, the new concert master, will

...at the Symphony

...Recitals by Sembrich, Samaroff, Kreisler and Others.

...Events of the Near Future—Gossip.

The program for the second of the season's Symphony concerts included the D'Indy trilogy "Wallenstein," after Schiller's dramatic poem; Liszt's A major piano concerto, Rudolph Ganz, soloist, and Wagner's "Emperor's March." The trilogy, which was performed in New York some nine years ago, was given for the first time in this city and it would have been welcome at this, for it is a work of splendid contrasts, the instrumentation is elaborate and suggests vividly incidents in Schiller's poem. The thematic material is abundant and in many instances a single instrument is used with marked effect in illustrating episodes that later on are developed in larger musical form. The first movement is supposed to depict life in camp and in the ever-changing keys are found lively dance tunes, here and there a whiff of "Venusberg" airs; satirical measures by woodwinds, the beautiful "Wallenstein" motif and a musical riot by the full orchestra. This part was given with fine animation and brilliancy, the strange modulations and key variations being managed smoothly and the parts allotted the woodwinds showing up in good rhythm and harmony.

In the second part the premonitions of the tragedy are admirably worked out, and the horn playing was very beautiful and then came a fine bit of work between the violin and cello, followed by strings and clarinet in a love motif. The somber finale dwindling to pianissimo, was very effective The confusion of camp and Wallenstein's death made up the last movement, which, from the continuously abrupt deviations from the key, is hardly as satisfying as the earlier movements, although colored and orchestrated in a masterly manner. The whole work was intensely interesting, and in the interpretation there were but few moments when the orchestra displayed any lack of unanimity in ensemble playing.

Mr Ganz, who appeared as soloist in the Liszt A major concerto for piano, won high favor last season with the orchestra and at his several recitals. His performance of the Liszt piece was admirable throughout. He showed a thorough understanding and an evident sympathy for his work, and with the prime object to give a faithful interpretation of the master's composition. His display of technical ability was sufficient to make the cadenza and supplementary measures brilliant and dashing, and with the exception of a bit of uncertainty twixt piano and orchestra at the close of the movement the soloist and associate players were in perfect accord Mr Ganz was very cordially received. Later in the season he will be heard here in recital and concert. The "Emperor's March" was performed by Dr Muck's men in the proper spirit, as was to be expected. The novelty of this week's concert will be the appearance as soloist of Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Mr Wendling will play Brahms' concerto for the violin. The other two works on the program are Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

OCTOBER 19, 1907

Dr. Muck has placed three familiar works on his programme for next week's concerts, and the novelty will be found in the first appearance as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the

BOSTON TRAVELER,

OCTOBER 19, 1907.

DR. MUCK has placed three familiar works on his programme for next week's concerts, and the novelty will be found in the first appearance as soloist of Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Wendling was a pupil of Joachim, and has brought to this country an enviable reputation as a virtuoso. He has chosen for his introductory work one of the most difficult of the violin concertos, that by Brahms. The first number on the programme will be Schumann's overture, Genoveva, and the last will be Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, a work which has not appeared on our programmes for

OCTOBER 20, 1907

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the second Symphony concert consisted of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, after Schiller's dramatic poem; Liszt's A major piano concerto, and Wagner's "Kaiser March." Rudolph Ganz was soloist.

It might well be asked why Dr. Muck, in his zealous search for novelties during the past summer, should elect to give us a specimen of D'Indy's early and immature period in preference to such a work as the "Jour d'ete dans La Montaine." The latter composition has not been heard in this city; it represents the composer's latest development, and would go farther toward gratifying the curiosity of many interested ones who heard the B flat symphony two years ago than the "Wallenstein" Trilogy.

As might be expected, there is weakness of invention, development that is often labored and thin spun. We hear the voices of other gods with remarkable frequency. Wagner and Schumann predominate, especially the first, from the "Dutchman" to the "Ring des Niblungen." There is occasional sensuousness that, strangely enough, reminds one of Tschaikowsky.

With all its deficiencies, however, this music has some vital qualities. A certain freshness of treatment, an original point of view exists throughout. It is unquestionably the work of one saturated with thoughts of Schiller's great drama. The composer displays an acute feeling for the sonorities and bewildering tone refractions of the modern orchestra.

The opening section, "Wallenstein's Camp," is more freely and spontaneously sketched than the others. There is more of what is called, in the drama, action. The themes are well contrasted and the rhythms are exciting. The thematic material is commonplace at times, but it is a breezy picture.

The music of Max and Thecla ("The Piccolomini") hardly breathes passion, or, when it does, is not the voice of D'Indy. One thinks more of the underlying motifs of the plot, of the fate that shall soon overtake the pair. In this movement there is some very beautiful scoring for the woodwind.

The last section, "The Death of Wallenstein," is effective, pompous, and rather theatrical. One wishes here, however, that the composer, who writes in rather conventional strains, had, instead, endeavored to portray the last tremendous moments of Schiller's drama. Here, and in the preceding movement, it is as though he were constrained by a too definite programme in mind.

Mr. Ganz deserves thanks for giving the unique A major concerto. One cannot help feeling that to the audiences of tomorrow this concerto will appeal even more than its universally popular companion in E flat. Those who so readily join the hue and cry concerning Liszt's lack of creative originality should carefully scan this score, which fairly bristles with extraordinary conceptions. They will find ideas, both melodic and orchestral, which are the germs of the most potent forces in the music of today. What magic in the endless transformations of that languorous opening theme, what sweeping, cyclonic power in the working up of the climaxes, and what superb deviltry in the finale! A fiery imagination, an untamable fantasy, and things undreamt of in the philosophy of any but Franz Liszt! More than any biography is this music a revelation of its author's perky.

Ganz gave such an interpretation of the work as we have grown to expect from him. Few pianists of today uphold a higher standard to the rising generation. It was not always the rhapsodic Hungarian we listened to; the improvisatory character of the music was sometimes formalized. But if there was less of oratory, of swooning passion, of exotic color, the work, on the other hand, was presented in a strongly coherent manner, in well defined outlines. One readily grasped the tenor of its ways, and that is no small thing to say of a performance of the A major concerto. Mr. Ganz's tempi were his own, but they were always consistent. He commenced the finale with extreme rapidity, but broadened out considerably at the last. He was deservedly applauded and repeatedly recalled.

There is an inexorable logic in the operation of the law of demand and supply, and therefore there must be some justice in the regular turning up of the Kaiser Marsch on our programmes. It is no doubt convenient padding, but we could well spare it. The performance was appropriately noisy, drastic, obstreperous.

The performances, as a whole, were brilliant and far superior to last week's. The augmented brass choir showed to advantage in D'Indy's work, as indeed did the whole orchestra, though its tone was often rough.

MUSIC NOTES

The novelty of this week's Symphony concert will be the appearance as soloist of Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Wendling will play Brahms' concerto for the violin. The other two works on the programme are familiar, and will be welcomed all the more as they have not been heard in some time. The first is Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and the last in Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

The announcement of a recital at Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, Nov. 4, by Rudolph Ganz, has been received with great interest. This Swiss pianist holds a well-recognized position with the Boston musical public, and this occasion will be his last appearance in this city before his return to Europe.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Moral of the Incidents of Last Week—D'Indy's "Wallenstein" for the First Time—Interesting and Significant Music—Mr. Ganz's Playing

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon seemed the moral of those of last week and of their incidents. Not within recollection have departures from an afternoon concert been so few, and they were noiseless. Nearly the whole audience stayed to the end, and all of it listened with steady interest. Throughout, indeed, it seemed highly pleased. Rarely has unfamiliar music received more applause at an afternoon performance than did Mr. d'Indy's "Wallenstein." The vivid "tone-picture" of Wallenstein's camp in the first movement gave easy pleasure in its brightness, variety and animation; but there were equal interest and applause for the graver episodes of the loves of Max and Thecla and of Wallenstein's death that followed. Indeed, the audience was warmer toward Mr. d'Indy's trilogy than it was to Rudolph Ganz, the pianist of the day and to Liszt's second concerto—"The Life and Adventures of a Melody." Mr. Ganz played it with an unusually just mingling of delicacy and brilliance. He did not refine away the kaleidoscopic brightness and changefulness of the music, nor did he harden it into the metallic glint of a mere show piece. The beauty and the smoothness of his tone saved him from the one pitfall, and the air of magical improvisation that he gave to his playing saved him from the other. He tempered the unabateable brilliance of the concerto with truly poetic imagination, and the result seemed close to the matter and the manner of Liszt's music. Yet the applause might have been heartier.

As for the orchestra, the strange mischances of last Saturday had seemingly left little trace behind. True, such music as Mr. d'Indy's or Liszt's might often hide many of the shortcomings that Mozart's a week ago had left naked to the world. But, time and again, in both the trilogy and the concerto, the orchestra recalled its familiar beauty, mellowness and delicacy of tone, its fineness of shading and its nicety of euphony. Clearly, Dr. Muck had been watchful of quality and adjustment of tone, and as clearly his men were suror of themselves and of the new conditions of their playing. In the main the band renewed its finer qualities and kept its new largeness and elasticity of eloquent voice. In detail the programme was:

D'Indy: "Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, op. 12. First time in Boston.
Liszt: Concerto in A major, No. 2, for Pianoforte. (Mr. Ganz.)
Wagner: The Emperor's March.

It was hard to listen to Mr. d'Indy's "Wallenstein"—the youthful d'Indy of the seventies—and not try to find in it appropriate tokens of the d'Indy of today. They were not lacking, and they were interesting to discover and to hear. Even in those days of mature youth he toiled incessantly at his music until he had brought it as closely to his ideal as he might, and he spent seven years in the writing of "Wallenstein." So early he had begun to be resourceful and imaginative in the development and the transformation of melodies, making them serve his poetic or dramatic purpose, yet respecting them musically. Already he was skilled in the use of the orchestra and sensitive to the expressive possibilities of each group of instruments. He had begun to make form primarily the vehicle for the ideas, the emotions, the imaginings that he would convey; yet nowhere is the structure or the substance of "Wallenstein" uncertain or vague. Youthful music, as the trilogy is, it is also music of a mature and reflective youth, and often in it are tokens of the large eloquence, the grave intensity of idea and expressioon, the characteristic exaltation of the d'Indy that we know in his music today. The depth of feeling and of expression that was to come speaks in the second part of the trilogy; and the sombre fatefulness and mystrilogy; the sombre fatefulness and mystery of the music of "Wallenstein's Death" is almost of the d'Indy of full maturity. In those days, however, he looked more willingly, perhaps more sympathetically, on the lightness, brightness and even the rudeness of life, and in the same mood he made "tone-pictures," as the musical dialect runs nowadays, of them.

From beginning to end, "Wallenstein" is programme music in its larger and more imaginative sense. It implies in its hearers some acquaintance with the three plays of Schiller on which it is based, and some sympathy with the mood of them. Musically, sundry characterizing motives, like that which figures the might of Wallenstein himself, binds them together, while out of their transformations, interplay and contrast spring equally the musical and the dramatic content of the trilogy. The first part, "Wallenstein's Camp," is tone-picturing and nothing else. The soldiers and the camp-followers are in rude play or in rude dance. The Capuchin monk preaches his sermon on the bassoons and in fugue. In other instruments the soldiers mock and confound him. They sweep into their tumult. Enter Wallenstein and the motive that typifies his might and power subdues al the rest. The camp bows to his master. Throughout it is elastic, highly colored, warmly pictorial, genuinely romantic music. The second part of the trilogy sings the traits ad the loves of Max, the son f Piccolimini, and Thecla, the daughter f Wallenstein. Nw the music has the ardr f the youth,, and now the tenderness of the girl. Again the note of oncoming and oppressing fate, struck even in the scene of the camp overshadows it. Or again through it struggles the characteristic melody of Wallerstein weighing down an dembittering the passion of the lovers. The end is piteous, lamenting. The fate that pursues Wallenstein has caught and slain the lovers as well. The music is searching and poignant; the fire and prue intensity of Mr. d'Indy is in it. It makes the passionate sang and the [illegible] the note of fate. Each resonance of the composer—melody, instrumentation, transformation, modulation serves single-heartedly his poetic and ramatic ends. In the final part fate strides. It rises out of ominous orchestral forebodings; it cuts its way through orchestral tumults; it recalls haunting memories; it descends upon Wallenstein and chushes him. Again the music goes out in piteous lament as into darkness. And steadily it has held its sombre and mysterious eloquence. H. T. P.

From ..... YOGUE

Address ..... NEW YORK CITY

Date ..... OCT 24 1907

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's personnel has undergone many changes since last year, while the total membership has been increased from ninety-six to ninety-eight. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba, and some new men in the percussion section.

Prof. Willy Hess, former concert master, is abroad on a year's leave of absence. The two Adamowskis resigned in order to give more time to their Chamber Music work and Max Zach, of the first violas, resigned to become conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The new concert master of the Boston orchestra is Carl Wendling, a pupil of Joachim, who comes to this country on a year's leave of absence from Stuttgart where he holds a similar position. Wendling was also concert master at Meiningen for four years under Steinbach, and filled the same post at Covent Garden under Richter from 1903—1905 and at the festival performances in Bayreuth since 1903. Julius Theodorowicz, formerly one of the first violins of the orchestra, and for several years past the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, has returned to his old place.

In accordance with last season's plan there will be no soloists at the first and fifth pairs of concerts in November and March. In December the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy, in the evening and Paderewski in the afternoon.

Estab... rk, 1884

From ..... PROVIDENCE, R. I

Address .....

Date ..... OCT 20 1907

CALVARY BAPTIST CHURCH.

The musical portion of the services at the Calvary Baptist Church to-day will be as follows: 10:45 a. m.—Prelude, selected; anthem, "Out of the Deep," Lansing; response, "When Morning Gilds the Skies," Barnby; offertory, in E-flat, Mozart; contralto solo, selected; postlude, Grand Choeur, in D, Bossi. Evening, 7:15, Organ Recital—(a) "Wedding Music," West; (b) Larghetta, Buck; anthem, "O Taste and See," Marston; response, "There Is Resting Bye and Bye," Havens; offertory, Pastoral in A, Reinberger; soprano and bass duet, selected; postlude, Largo, Lachner. Helen L. Ames, soprano; Bessie Hanna, contralto; Ernest Ruether, tenor; Charles H. Everett, bass and director; C. LeRoy Grinnell, organist.

Estab... , 1884

The orchestra of sixty gathered by Henry W. Savage for his production of Puccini's "Madam Butterfly" at the Providence Opera House early in November is notable for a number of new features. The Puccini score calls for much that was not required in old grand opera orchestration and Mr. Savage has endeavored to reach this impressionistic touch of the Goliath of the modern Italian school of grand opera, by employing many new instruments not generally known in this country.

To produce much of the Japanese and other effects, Mr. Savage has imported a new instrument called the celeste, to be used for the first time in America. This is made by Muestral, of London, and consists of a series of bells in two octaves of the chromatic scale, tuned to normal pitch with a keyboard similar to that of a piano and played like it.

Another new instrument—purely Japanese—is a set of gongs tuned to intone a diminished G. This is used in the accentuated passages of the Buddhist marriage rite and in the hari-kari scene. There is also a double set of tympani in sets of three tambours—quite unusual.

A viola di gamba and a viol d'amore was employed not long ago by Charles Loeffler of Boston Symphony fame, in his symphonic poem, The Death of Tintagiles." He used it in an obligato with the orchestra. Both of these instruments are obsolete as far as general use is concerned, but Puccini has revived them in order to catch a Japanese flavor.

There is said to be only two vola d'amores in America. The celeste is strictly a modern instrument and was used first in Tschaikowsky's "Cause Voisette" ("The Nutcracker"), a series of six character dances of old France. An orchestra of sixty players is necessary for the "Madam Butterfly" performances.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... GLOBE COMMERCIAL INTELL...

Address .....

Date .....

SOMETHING rare and strange is always to be expected of Dr. Muck in the way of a programme and he is true to his colors in the programme for the first pair of local concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which take place Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, in Carnegie Hall. For the evening concert he will revert to his liking for Bruckner by presenting the ninth (unfinished) symphony of the Viennese pedagogue, after which he will lead Bach's B minor suite for flute and strings, and Beethoven's neglected overture "Leonore No. 1." The afternoon programme will consist of two symphonies—Mozart's in [illegible] and Beethoven's

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
OCTOBER 20, 1907

Rudolph Ganz, Soloist at the Symphony

Recitals by Sembrich, Samaroff, Kreisler and Others.

Other Events of the Near Future—Gossip.

The program for the second of the season's Symphony concerts included the D'Indy trilogy "Wallenstein," after Schiller's dramatic poem; Liszt's a major piano concerto, Rudolph Ganz, soloist, and Wagner's "Emperor's March." The trilogy, which was performed in New York some nine years ago, was given for the first time in this city and it would have been welcome ere this, for it is a work of splendid contrasts, the instrumentation is elaborate and suggests vividly incidents in Schiller's poem. The thematic material is abundant and in many instances a single instrument is used with marked effect in illustrating episodes that later on are developed in larger musical form. The first movement is supposed to depict life in camp and in the ever-changing keys are found lively dance tunes, with here and there a whiff of "Venusburg" airs; satirical measures by woodwinds, the beautiful "Wallenstein" motif and a musical riot by the full orchestra. This part was given with fine animation and brilliancy, the strange modulations and key variations being managed smoothly and the parts allotted the woodwinds showing up in good rhythm and harmony.

In the second part the premonitions of the tragedy are admirably worked out, and the horn playing was very beautiful and then came a fine bit of work between the violin and cello, followed by strings and clarinet in a love motif. The somber finale dwindling to pianissimo, was very effective The confusion of camp and Wallenstein's death made up the last movement, which, from the continuously abrupt deviations from the key, is hardly as satisfying as the earlier movements, although colored and orchestrated in a masterly manner. The whole work was intensely interesting, and in the interpretation there were but few moments when the orchestra displayed any lack of unanimity in ensemble playing.

Mr Ganz, who appeared as soloist in the Liszt A major concerto for piano, won high favor last season with the orchestra and at his several recitals. His performance of the Liszt piece was admirable throughout. He showed a thorough understanding and an evident sympathy for his work, and with the prime object to give a faithful interpretation of the master's composition. His dispay of technical ability was sufficient to make the cadenza and supplementary measures brilliant and dashing, and with the exception of a bit of uncertainty twixt piano and orchestra at the close of the movement the soloist and associate players were in perfect accord Mr Ganz was very cordially received. Later in the season he will be heard here in recital and concert. The "Emperor's March" was performed by Dr Muck's men in the proper spirit, as was to be expected.

The novelty of this week's concert will be the appearance as soloist of Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra. Mr Wendling will play Brahms' concerto for the violin. The other two works on the program are Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and Mendessohn's "Scotch" symphony.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
OCTOBER 20, 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the second Symphony concert consisted of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, after Schiller's dramatic poem; Liszt's A major piano concerto, and Wagner's "Kaiser March." Rudolph Ganz was soloist.

It might well be asked why Dr. Muck, in his zealous search for novelties during the past summer, should elect to give us a specimen of D'Indy's early and immature period in preference to such a work as the "Jour d'ete dans La Montaine." The latter composition has not been heard in this city; it represents the composer's latest development, and would go farther toward gratifying the curiosity of many interested ones who heard the B flat symphony two years ago than the "Wallenstein" Trilogy.

As might be expected, there is weakness of invention, development that is often labored and thin spun. We hear the voices of other gods with remarkable frequency. Wagner and Schumann predominate, especially the first, from the "Dutchman" to the "Ring des Niblungen." There is occasional sensuousness that, strangely enough, reminds one of Tschaikowsky.

With all its deficiencies, however, this music has some vital qualities. A certain freshness of treatment, an original point of view exists throughout. It is unquestionably the work of one saturated with thoughts of Schiller's great drama. The composer displays an acute feeling for the sonorities and bewildering tone refractions of the modern orchestra.

The opening section, "Wallenstein's Camp," is more freely and spontaneously sketched than the others. There is more of what is called, in the drama, action. The themes are well contrasted and the rhythms are exciting. The thematic material is commonplace at times, but it is a breezy picture.

The music of Max and Thecla ("The Piccolomini") hardly breathes passion, or, when it does, is not the voice of D'Indy. One thinks more of the underlying motifs of the plot, of the fate that shall soon overtake the pair. In this movement there is some very beautiful scoring for the woodwind.

The last section, "The Death of Wallenstein," is effective, pompous, and rather theatrical. One wishes here, however, that the composer, who writes in rather conventional strains, had, instead, endeavored to portray the last tremendous moments of Schiller's drama. Here, and in the preceding movement, it is as though he were constrained by a too definite programme in mind.

Mr. Ganz deserves thanks for giving the unique A major concerto. One cannot help feeling that to the audiences of tomorrow this concerto will appeal even more than its universally popular companion in E flat. Those who so readily join the hue and cry concerning Liszt's lack of creative originality should carefully scan this score, which fairly bristles with extraordinary conceptions. They will find ideas, both melodic and orchestral, which are the germs of the most potent forces in the music of today. What magic in the endless transformations of that languorous opening theme; what sweeping, cyclonic power in the working up of the climaxes, and what superb deviltry in the finale! A fiery imagination, an untamable fantasy, and things undreamt of in the philosophy of any but Franz Liszt! More than any biography is this music a revelation of its author's personality.

Ganz gave such an interpretation of the work as we have grown to expect from him. Few pianists of today uphold a higher standard to the rising generation. It was not always the rhapsodic Hungarian we listened to; the improvisatory character of the music was sometimes formalized. But if there was less of oratory, of swooning passion, of exotic color, the work, on the other hand, was presented in a strongly coherent manner, in well defined outlines. One readily grasped the tenor of its ways, and that is no small thing to say of a performance of the A major concerto. Mr. Ganz's tempi were his own, but they were always consistent. He commenced the finale with extreme rapidity, but broadened out considerably at the last. He was deservedly applauded and repeatedly recalled.

There is an inexorable logic in the operation of the law of demand and supply, and therefore there must be some justice in the regular turning up of the Kaiser Marsch on our programmes. It is no doubt convenient padding, but we could well spare it. The performance was appropriately noisy, drastic, obstreperous.

The performances, as a whole, were brilliant and far superior to last week's. The augmented brass choir showed to advantage in D'Indy's work, as indeed did the whole orchestra, though its tone was often rough.

MUSIC NOTES

The novelty of this week's Symphony concert will be the appearance as soloist of Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Wendling will play Brahms' concerto for the violin. The other two works on the programme are familiar, and will be welcomed all the more as they have not been heard in some time. The first is Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," and the last in Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

The announcement of a recital at Chickering Hall on Monday afternoon, Nov. 4, by Rudolph Ganz, has been received with great interest. This Swiss pianist holds a well-recognized position with the Boston musical public, and this occasion will be his last appearance in this city before his return to Europe.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
OCTOBER 19, 1907

Dr. Muck has placed three familiar works on his programme for next week's concerts, and the novelty will be found in the first appearance as soloist of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
OCTOBER 19, 1907.

DR. MUCK has placed three familiar works on his programme for next week's concerts, and the novelty will be found in the first appearance as soloist of Carl Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra. Mr. Wendling was a pupil of Joachim, and has brought to this country an enviable reputation as a virtuoso. He has chosen for his introductory work one of the most difficult of the violin concertos, that by Brahms. The first number on the programme will be Schumann's overture, Genoveva, and the last will be Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, a work which has not appeared on our programmes for some years.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Moral of the Incidents of Last Week —D'Indy's "Wallenstein" for the First Time—Interesting and Significant Music —Mr. Ganz's Playing

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon seemed the moral of those of last week and of their incidents. Not within recollection have departures from an afternoon concert been so few, and they were noiseless. Nearly the whole audience stayed to the end, and all of it listened with steady interest. Throughout, indeed, it seemed highly pleased. Rarely has unfamiliar music received more applause at an afternoon performance than did Mr. d'Indy's "Wallenstein." The vivid "tone-picture" of Wallenstein's camp in the first movement gave easy pleasure in its brightness, variety and animation; but there were equal interest and applause for the graver episodes of the loves of Max and Thecla and of Wallenstein's death that followed. Indeed, the audience was warmer toward Mr. d'Indy's trilogy than it was to Rudolph Ganz, the pianist of the day and to Liszt's second concerto—"The Life and Adventures of a Melody." Mr. Ganz played it with an unusually just mingling of delicacy and brilliance. He did not refine away the kaleidoscopic brightness and changefulness of the music, nor did he harden it into the metallic glint of a mere show piece. The beauty and the smoothness of his tone saved him from the one pitfall, and the air of magical improvisation that he gave to his playing saved him from the other. He tempered the unabateable brilliance of the concerto with truly poetic imagination, and the result seemed close to the matter and the manner of Liszt's music. Yet the applause might have been heartier.

As for the orchestra, the strange mischances of last Saturday had seemingly left little trace behind. True, such music as Mr. d'Indy's or Liszt's might often hide many of the shortcomings that Mozart's a week ago had left naked to the world. But, time and again, in both the trilogy and the concerto, the orchestra recalled its familiar beauty, mellowness and delicacy of tone, its fineness of shading and its nicety of euphony. Clearly, Dr. Muck had been watchful of quality and adjustment of tone, and as clearly his men were surer of themselves and of the new conditions of their playing. In the main the band renewed its finer qualities and kept its new largeness and elasticity of eloquent voice. In detail the programme was:

D'Indy: "Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, op. 12. First time in Boston.
Liszt: Concerto in A major, No. 2, for Pianoforte. (Mr. Ganz.)
Wagner: The Emperor's March.

It was hard to listen to Mr. d'Indy's "Wallenstein"—the youthful d'Indy of the seventies—and not try to find in it appropriate tokens of the d'Indy of today. They were not lacking, and they were interesting to discover and to hear. Even in those days of mature youth he toiled incessantly at his music until he had brought it as closely to his ideal as he might, and he spent seven years in the writing of "Wallenstein." So early he had begun to be resourceful and imaginative in the development and the transformation of melodies, making them serve his poetic or dramatic purpose, yet respecting them musically. Already he was skilled in the use of the orchestra and sensitive to the expressive possibilities of each group of instruments. He had begun to make form primarily the vehicle for the ideas, the emotions, the imaginings that he would convey; yet nowhere is the structure or the substance of "Wallenstein" uncertain or vague. Youthful music, as the trilogy is, it is also music of a mature and reflective youth, and often in it are tokens of the large eloquence, the grave intensity of idea and expressioon, the characteristic exaltation of the d'Indy that we know in his music today. The depth of feeling and of expression that was to come speaks in the second part of the trilogy; and the sombre fatefulness and mystrilogy; the sombre fatefulness and mystery of the music of "Wallenstein's Death" is almost of the d'Indy of full maturity. In those days, however, he looked more willingly, perhaps more sympathetically, on the lightness, brightness and even the rudeness of life, and in the same mood he made "tone-pictures," as the musical dialect runs nowadays, of them.

From beginning to end, "Wallenstein" is programme music in its larger and more imaginative sense. It implies in its hearers some acquaintance with the three plays of Schiller on which it is based, and some sympathy with the mood of them. Musically, sundry characterizing motives, like that which figures the might of Wallenstein himself, binds them together, while out of their transformations, interplay and contrast spring equally the musical and the dramatic content of the trilogy. The first part, "Wallenstein's Camp," is tone-picturing and nothing else. The soldiers and the camp-followers are in rude play or in rude dance. The Capuchin monk preaches his sermon on the bassoons and in fugue. In other instruments the soldiers mock and confound him. They sweep into their tumult. Enter Wallenstein and the motive that typifies his might and power subdues al the rest. The camp bows to his master. Throughout it is elastic, highly colored, warmly pictorial, genuinely romantic music. The second part of the trilogy sings the traits ad the loves of Max, the sn f Picclimini, and Thecla, the daughter f Wallenstein. Nw the music has the ardr f the youth,, and now the tenderness of the girl. Again the note of oncoming and oppressing fate, struck even in the scene of the camp overshadows it. Or again through it struggles the characteristic melody of Wallerstein weighing down an dembittering the passion of the lovers. The end is piteous, lamenting. The fate that pursues Wallenstein has caught and slain the lovers as well. The music is searching and poignant; the fire and prue intensity of Mr. d'Indy is in it. It makes the passionate sang and the piteous dirge of the lovers. It continues the note of fate. Each resonance of the composer—melody, instrumentation, transformation, modulation serves single-heartedly his poetic and ramatic ends. In the final part fate strides. It rises out of ominous orchestral forebodings; it cuts its way through orchestral tumults; it recalls haunting memories; it descends upon Wallenstein and chushes him. Again the music goes out in piteous lament as into darkness. And steadily it has held its sombre and mysterious eloquence.

H. T. P.

From ..... YOGUE, NEW YORK

Address .....

Date ..... OCT 26 1907

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's personnel has undergone many changes since last year, while the total membership has been increased from ninety-six to ninety-eight. There will be five new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba, and some new men in the percussion section.

Prof. Willy Hess, former concert master, is abroad on a year's leave of absence. The two Adamowskis resigned in order to give more time to their Chamber Music work and Max Zach, of the first violas, resigned to become conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. The new concert master of the Boston orchestra is Carl Wendling, a pupil of Joachim, who comes to this country on a year's leave of absence from Stuttgart where he holds a similar position. Wendling was also concert master at Meiningen for four years under Steinbach, and filled the same post at Covent Garden under Richter from 1903—1905 and at the festival performances in Bayreuth since 1903. Emil Theodorowicz, formerly one of the first violins of the orchestra, and for several years past the second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, has returned to his old place.

In accordance with last season's plan there will be no soloists at the first and fifth pairs of concerts in November and March. In December the soloists will be Anton Van Rooy, in the evening and Paderewski in the afternoon.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

CALVARY BAPTIST CHURCH.

The musical portion of the services at the Calvary Baptist Church to-day will be as follows: 10:45 a. m.—Prelude, selected; anthem, "Out of the Deep," Lansing; response, "When Morning Gilds the Skies," Barnby; offertory, in E-flat, Mozart; contralto solo, selected; postlude, Grand Choeur, in D, Bossi. Evening, 7:15, Organ Recital—(a) "Wedding Music," West; (b) Larghetta, Buck; anthem, "O Taste and See," Marston; response, "There is Resting Bye and Bye," Havens; offertory, Pastoral in A, Reinberger; soprano and bass duet, selected; postlude, Largo, Lachner. Helen L. Ames, soprano; Bessie Hanna, contralto; Ernest Ruether, tenor; Charles H. Everett, bass and director; C. LeRoy Grinnell, organist.

The orchestra of sixty gathered by Henry W. Savage for his production of Puccini's "Madam Butterfly" at the Providence Opera House early in November is notable for a number of new features. The Puccini score calls for much that was not required in old grand opera orchestration and Mr. Savage has endeavored to reach this impressionistic touch of the Goliath of the modern Italian school of grand opera, by employing many new instruments not generally known in this country.

To produce much of the Japanese and other effects, Mr. Savage has imported a new instrument called the celeste, to be used for the first time in America. This is made by Muestral, of London, and consists of a series of bells in two octaves of the chromatic scale, tuned to normal pitch with a keyboard similar to that of a piano and played like it.

Another new instrument—purely Japanese—is a set of gongs tuned to intone a diminished G. This is used in the accentuated passages of the Buddhist marriage rite and in the hari-kari scent. There is also a double set of tympani in sets of three tambours—quite unusual.

A viola di gamba and a viol d'amore was employed not long ago by Charles Loeffler of Boston Symphony fame, in his symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles." He used it in an obligato with the orchestra. Both of these instruments are obsolete as far as general use is concerned, but Puccini has revived them in order to catch a Japanese flavor.

There is said to be only two vola d'amores in America. The celeste is strictly a modern instrument and was used first in Tschaikowsky's "Cause Voisette" ("The Nutcracker"), a series of six character dances of old France. An orchestra of sixty players is necessary for the "Madam Butterfly" performances.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... GLOBE

Address ..... COMMERCIAL ST.

Date .....

SOMETHING rare and strange is always to be expected of Dr. Muck in the way of a programme, and he is true to his colors in the programmes for the first pair of local concerts of the Boston Sympony Orchestra, to take place Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, in Cymegie Hall. For the evening concert he will revert to his liking for Bruckner by presenting the ninth (unfinished) symphony of the Viennese pedagogue, after which he will lead Bach's B minor suite for flute and strings, and Beethoven's neglected overture "Leonore No. 1." The afternoon programme will consist of two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's Sixth ("Pastoral").

[31]

From INDIANAPOLIS, IND

Address

Date OCT 20

Schumann-Heink's American Home

Mme. Schumann-Heink's home at Stamac, N. J., is built on the heights of Cauldwell Mountain, overlooking the Passaic valley. The rich green valley lies below and before the house, and the Passaic River passes like a silver thread through the trees. Off on the distant mountain opposite lies Boonton and to the right back between two hills is the "Silk City" Paterson.

The house is constructed of field stone and shingles. It is in L shape and the light passes through the broad windows, from both sides of the rooms. There are fifteen rooms and three baths, electric lights and beautiful fixtures, parquet floors and wide wood fireplaces. There is an air of cheerfulness, of big heartedness, as of the woman who presides over it all, and on all sides one is aware that an artist has been selected and placed the various objects to make her home comfortable, pleasant and restful for herself from the turmoil of her professional necessities. The location is one of wonderful beauty and the panoramic changes taking place with the movement of the sun and the moon over the crest above and through the valley below offer food for the eye both day and night. The early morn finds the sun peeping into the house and in the evening it bursts its last parting rays into the windows in changing daily glory.

The entrance leads into a large, high room, upon which the dining room adjoins, and it is fitted with easy chairs, lounges and cushioned window benches. The music room is chiefly adorned with Mme. Schumann-Heink's grand piano, and upon the walls hang paintings, golden laurel wreaths and precious mementoes. Everywhere are reminders of past triumphs, photographs of crowned heads and men and women eminent in art, politics, science and medicine, all with their autographs and complimentary sentiments. Such men as Hans von Bulow and Johannes Brahms, who coached the young artist and studied with her, are here represented. A framed letter of the former written March 10, 1887, on the occasion of a public protest appearing in one of the Hamburg, Germany, papers of the time in which "Many opera-goers in the name of true art," demanded a more frequent appearance of Frau Schumann-Heink, "who possesses so glorious a voice," hangs on the wall. Von Bulow wrote: "Yes, it is as the inclosed clipping states. In the interest of Mozart (underlined), I shall request Herr Director Pollini to intrust with you as many as possible in the operas for which I have directly and especially contracted next season. You may always depend upon the just and worthy ears of yours respectfully in highest esteem.

"HANS VON BULOW."

A Beethoven engraving, recently brought from Bayreuth, Wagner, Siegfried Wagner, signed "not the worst among the thousands of admirers of the glorious Schumann-Heink." Hans Richter, a photograph with a broad-brimmed hat, signed: "Kindly excuse me for retaining my hat on my head, for before an artist such as you are, the word is 'Hats off.'" Here also hang photographs of President Roosevelt and Mrs. Roosevelt; in a cabinet may be seen a little silver cup, the gift of President Roosevelt, "To his little friend, George Washington Schumann-Heink." Other photographs are of Carl Schurz, Theodore Thomas, Mancenilli, Maurice Grau, Edwin Booth, Ernst von Possart, Jean and Edward De Reszke, the Pittsburg Orchestra, with complete autographs of the members, and the same of the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, the New York Symphony, the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago and others. A most valuable one is a photograph of Frau Cosima Wagner, indorsed: "Bayreuth's Erda, Waltraute, Norne, Magdalena, with heartiest good wishes, Cosima Wagner." Royalty is represented by the duke of Hessen, the grand duke of Baden, grand duchess of Mecklenberg, the prince and princess of Wales, now King and Queen of England, and one from the late Queen Victoria.

Her pets are all outside the house and they comprise some 300 fancy chickens, a pair of coach horses, which won the blue ribbon in a show last fall; a pony for the children is called "Pudgy," and there is a donkey for young George Washington called "Buster Brown." Five dogs accompany madame on her walks through her extensive grounds, which cover several hundred acres, her favorite one of the bulldog type called "Irish Mike."

The family group in the picture accompanying is composed of Mme. Schumann-Heink, Henry, who is now nearly 21, and who is a student in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston; Hans, 18, who is in the watch and clock manufacturing in Ansonia, Conn.; Walter, 19 years of age, an artist, with the firm of Baumgarten, in New York; Ferdinand, now 14, who is a student in the Montclair Military Academy, while the child nearest Mme Schumann-Heink is Mitsie, and next to her is George Washington, who was born in New York shortly after Mme. Schumann-Heink made a first visit to America with the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From JOURNAL

Address

Date OCT 20 1907

The Boston Symphony is announced for Jan. 20. Here is one of the great treats of the musical season. The other is Marcella Sembrich.

More musicians in the already musical family of the Homers. Tuesday [illegible] were added to the family of Mme. Louise Homer, the opera contralto, and Sydney Homer, composer.

Carl Gantvoor, baritone of Cincinnati, who has sung in Columbus several times, is again singing leading baritone roles with the Savage Opera company. He opens this week in New York with "Madame Butterfly," singing the role of Sharpless in that opera.

[32]

From PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Address

Date OCT 20 1907

Some Coming Musical Events.

Providence to Have Its Usual Three Symphony Concerts.—Other Local Announcements.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of three concerts in Providence this year. The dates are Tuesday, Nov. 19, Tuesday, Dec. 31, and Wednesday, Feb. 12. The management of the orchestra has decided to cut down the number of out of town concerts this year and in the future, and for some time it was a question whether Hartford or Providence should lose two of the three concerts in the past allotted to these citis, but it was finally decided to give Providence its usual three and give Hartford but one.

The soloist at the first concert in Providence will be Olga Samaroff. The other soloists will be announced in due time, likewise the particulars regarding the renewals of subscriptions to the sale of seats for the winter.

From [illegible] EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 26 1907

HOFMANN WILL PLAY HERE NEXT WEEK

Promises of a Fine Series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

OPERA ONLY ONE WEEK AWAY,

At Hammerstein's Manhattan House. Sembrich to Sing Here November 14.

The Brooklyn Institute is particularly fortunate in its musical star for the coming week, and as it is to be the only appearance of Joseph Hofmann in Brooklyn this season, the concert at the Baptist Temple next Thursday evening will be of more than ordinary interest. Mr. Hofmann will play several of Chopin's including his Mazurka, B flat minor, and Scherzo, in the same key. Another number is the overture from "Tannhaeuser."

In full the programme comprises:

Sonata, Opus 3	Beethoven
Scherzo, B minor	Mendelssohn
Variations	Raff
Fantasie Impromptu	Chopin
Mazurka, B flat minor	Chopin
Scherzo, B flat minor	Chopin
Barcarole	Rachmaninoff
Prelude, G minor	Rachmaninoff
Etude, C sharp minor, Opus 42	Scriabine
Poeme d'Amour	Scriabine
Overture, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner-Liszt

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its twentieth season in Brooklyn on Friday evening, November 8, at the Baptist Temple. There will be five concerts given in November, December, January, Feburary and March. The first and last will be devoted solely to orchestral work; the soloists at the others being, M. Paderewski, Mme. Carreno and Fritz Kreisler. The orchestra consists of ninety-eight members, an increase of two over last year and there are several changes in the membership, notably that of Carl Wendling, who has assumed the position of concert master in the place of Professor Hess, who is abroad on a year's leave. Mr. Wendling, though only 32 years of age, ranks among the great concert masters abroad. He has been concert master at the three last Wagner festivals at Bayreuth, for three seasons at Convent Garden under Richter, four years at Meiningen under Stuttgart and concert master at the Court Theater of Stuttgart. Another acquisition is Julius Theodorowicz, well known for his fine work as second violin with the Kneisel Quartet. Many new works will be presented under the admirable directorship of Karl Muck. An orchestral piece by Schjelderup new symphonies by Henry Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's Wallenstein Symphony and symphonic poems by Ertel and Beehe. The advance sale for these concerts is unusually large this year, Brooklyn people liking Karl Muck and being cheered on by the thought of having him lead the orchestra in the new Academy next year.

Saturday afternoons will be set aside for the New York Symphony Orchestra, which as usual is under the fine leadership of Walter Damrosch. The first concert will be given November 23, and four others will follow, one each month, excepting February. The soloists are Josef Hofmann, Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler, M. Emilio de Gogorza, David Mannes, and there will be one all Wagner programme.

The announcement of a song recital by Mme. Sembrich, at the Baptist Temple, on the evening of November 14, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, adds another famous artist to [illegible] for the year. The full

From NEW YORK

Address

Date OCT 11

DAMROSCH'S FIRST CONC[illegible] OF HIS LONG SEAS[illegible]

It Will Be Given Next Saturday Evening, with Fritz Kreisler [illegible] Soloist—Sale of Seats for the Boston Symphony Thurs[illegible] Series Larger Than Ever—Paderewski's Arrival.

Confronted by so many orchestral concerts we find ourselves wondering where the conductors will find works that have not been "done to death" without duplicating other programmes. It seems, however, that programme making shows the same individuality that is to be found in everything else related to real art. For instance the first programme to be given by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony orchestra is absolutely typical of Mr. Damrosch, and shows the study he has given the situation.

From past seasons we know the attractiveness and the interest surrounding every offering, and this season he promises as well. His organization will be first on the platform, opening next Saturday evening. Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will make his first appearance in the Brahms concerto, while the orchestral offerings will be Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin, Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Andante and Scherzo from Debussy's string quartet, for string orchestra and Chabrier's Espana. This orchestra opens the longest season of orchestral concerts ever given in New York, and there is little doubt that the public appreciates this fact judging from the subscriptions already received for the series.

* * *

The following Tuesday New York will have the opportunity to measure the ability of Carl Pohlig, whose reception in Philadelphia was most flattering. This will be a concert of "first appearances," as in addition to Herr Pohlig we will hear for the first time Richard Buhlig, who also selects Brahms as a medium in which to present himself in his American debut.

Buhlig will play the second concerto as his only number. Karl Klein, another young American, will appear for the first time in his home city in Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. The orchestral numbers to be given by the Philadelphia orchestra will be Heirath wieder willen, a new overture, by Humperdinck, and the Beethoven fifth symphony.

* * *

The sale of Boston Symphony seats for Thursday nights is larger than it was last year and for Saturday afternoons it is about the same. The first pair of concerts to be given in Carnegie hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will have no soloists, but will trust to the programme and to their presentation to satisfy the audience. Thursday night's offering will include Bruckner's ninth (unfinished) symphony; Bach's Suite [illegible] minor for flute and string orchestra and Beethoven's overture Leonore, No. 1. The programme of Saturday will consist of two symphonies: Mozart's in C minor and Beethoven's Pastoral.

Paderewski is on the Augusta Victoria due to-day. He will play his first recital at Carnegie hall next Saturday afternoon. The programme has not yet been announced, but as his general scheme of programme making is well known, the public are willing to take him on trust. In this particular America is different from Europe. There, the importance lies in what work is to be performed, here, in who is to perform it. Paderewski will give another recital at Carnegie hall November 23, and his only appearance with orchestra in New York will be on Saturday afternoon, December 7, with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

* * *

Jan Kubelik will sail from Bremen next Tuesday (October 29), arriving in New York November 6. He will be accompanied by his wife, the Countess Czaky-Szell, who, not dreading a long and hard trip, will go with her husband, who is due to play one hundred and twenty-five concerts. In the party to arrive will be Ludwig Schwab, who was his accompanist last season and who will again act in this capacity. The opening concert will be given at the Hippodrome Sunday evening, November 10, with the assistance of the Russian Symphony orchestra and Modest Altschuler.

* * *

Anna M. Schirmer has returned from Europe, where she spent all summer in Switzerland, at the villa of her former teacher, Mme. L. Cappiani, in Rodi Fiesso. She has been taking a supplementary course of this well known teacher in the development of voice and the art of singing. Her New York studio is at 147 West Seventy-first street.

* * *

Victor Herbert will open his series of popular concerts to-morrow night at the Broadway theatre. His programme will include the Carnival Romain by Berlioz and a number of his own compositions.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

From [illegible] SUN

Address

Date

Here's Music for Comfort.

The music season is here. Mr. BISPHAM was in Brooklyn last night, JOSEF HOFMANN comes to Manhattan to-morrow. Mr. PADEREWSKI, due ashore even now, will play just seven days later to one of the great, tumultuous assemblies of the year, with Mme. SEMBRICH to follow.

One week away, are symphony and opera, under the initiatory auspices of Mr. WALTER DAMROSCH'S orchestra, Saturday nights and Sundays, and Mr. OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN'S second annual "first Monday." Twenty-four box holders, named to-day for the New Manhattan season, indicate that New York's opera war is not without its social following on either side. It is made clear that the golden horseshoe of five-and-three stockholders in the Metropolitan establishment, reopening a fortnight hence, is more than ever solid in allegiance to the returned impresario, Mr. HEINRICH CONRIED.

The day brings a curious word of comfortable assurance on one point. "The present disastrous slump in the stock market seems to have had no effect whatever on the subscription of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie hall. At sea for the moment is Mr. SAPONOFF of the Philharmonic, which with the Russian and other societies will make up last of all. There are substantial grounds for optimism in the box offices. But the temples of art are no far from Wall Street wires to-day that [illegible] were in the consulship of [illegible] leon of the telephone, that [illegible] drew the lightning of [illegible] from a single wire.

From [illegible]

Address BALTIMORE, MD.

Date OCT 23 1907

MUSIC

Current Happenings And Comments On Matters Of Interest—Artists Who Are To Appear At The Peabody.

The approaching season promises a repletion of musical provision for Baltimore. Dr. Muck will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to us for five evenings; the Philadelphia organization, under its new conductor (Herr Pohlig from Stuttgart, who, if we may credit his European reputation, will blend that admirable body of artists into a real orchestra), will give five concerts; Mr. Randolph has extended the Peabody series to fifteen performances; the Bach Choir will continue its fruitful career; the Oratorio Society will sing large choral works; the newly organized Kneisel Quartette will give us five afternoons, and we are promised numerous visits from solo artists of good repute. The Peabody series, together with the Kneisels, occupy each and every Friday afternoon from November 1 to March 20, inclusive, omitting only the Friday in the Christmas holidays.

EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 26 1907

The season of Boston symphony concerts will open on Friday evening, November 8, when the first concert will be given in the Baptist Temple. Dr. Muck has arranged a most catholic programme, as the three works to be played represent three great periods of music, the ultra-classical, the neo-romantic and the modern. Brooklyn will hear for the first time Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein," which had its first performances in Boston on the 18th and 19th, when it won the enthusiastic approval of all that heard it. The second number will be Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra and the last number will be Schumann's

From INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

Address

Date OCT 20 1907

Schumann-Heink's American Home

Mme. Schumann-Heink's home at Signac, N. J., is built on the heights of Cauldwell Mountain, overlooking the Passaic valley. The rich green valley lies below and before the house, and the Passaic River passes like a silver thread through the trees. Off on the distant mountain opposite lies Boonton and to the right back between two hills is the "Silk City" Paterson.

The house is constructed of field stone and shingles. It is in L shape and the light passes through the broad windows, from both sides of the rooms. There are fifteen rooms and three baths, electric lights and beautiful fixtures, parquet floors and wide wood fireplaces. There is an air of cheerfulness, of big heartedness, as of the woman who presides over it all, and on all sides one is aware that an artist has been selected and placed the various objects to make her home comfortable, pleasant and restful for herself from the turmoil of her professional necessities. The location is one of wonderful beauty and the panoramic changes taking place with the movement of the sun and the moon over the crest above and through the valley below offer food for the eye both day and night. The early morn finds the sun peeping into the house and in the evening it bursts its last parting rays into the windows in changing daily glory.

The entrance leads into a large, high room, upon which the dining room adjoins, and it is fitted with easy chairs, lounges and cushioned window benches. The music room is chiefly adorned with Mme. Schumann-Heink's grand piano, and upon the walls hang paintings, golden laurel wreaths and precious mementoes. Everywhere are reminders of past triumphs, photographs of crowned heads and men and women eminent in art, politics, science and medicine, all with their autographs and complimentary sentiments. Such men as Hans von Bulow and Johannes Brahms, who coached the young artist and studied with her, are here represented. A framed letter of the former written March 10, 1887, on the occasion of a public protest appearing in one of the Hamburg, Germany, papers of the time in which "Many opera-goers in the name of true art," demanded a more frequent appearance of Frau Schumann-Heink, "who possesses so glorious a voice," hangs on the wall. Von Bulow wrote: "Yes, it is as the inclosed clipping states. In the interest of Mozart (underlined), I shall request Herr Director Pollini to intrust with you as many as possible in the operas for which I have directly and especially contracted next season. You may always depend upon the just and worthy cars of yours respectfully in highest esteem.

"HANS VON BULOW."

A Beethoven engraving, recently brought from Bayreuth, Wagner, Seigfried Wagner, signed "not the worst among the thousands of admirers of the glorious Schumann-Heink." Hans Richter, a photograph with a broad-brimmed hat, signed: "Kindly excuse me for retaining my hat on my head, for before an artist such as you are, the word is 'Hats off.'" Here also hang photographs of President Roosevelt and Mrs. Roosevelt; in a cabinet may be seen a little silver cup, the gift of President Roosevelt, "To his little friend, George Washington Schumann-Heink." Other photographs are of Carl Schurz, Theodore Thomas, Mancinilli, Maurice Grau, Edwin Booth, Ernst von Possart, Jean and Edward De Reszke, the Pittsburg Orchestra, with complete autographs of the members, and the same of the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, the New York Symphony, the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago and others. A most valuable one is a photograph of Frau Cosima Wagner, indorsed: "Bayreuth's Erda, Waltraute, Norne, Magdalena, with heartiest good wishes, Cosima Wagner." Royalty is represented by the duke of Hessen, the grand duke of Baden, grand duchess of Mecklenberg, the prince and princess of Wales, now King and Queen of England, and one from the late Queen Victoria.

Her pets are all outside the house and they comprise some 300 fancy chickens, a pair of coach horses, which won the blue ribbon in a show last fall; a pony for the children is called "Pudgy," and there is a donkey for young George Washington called "Buster Brown." Five dogs accompany madame on her walks through her extensive grounds, which cover several hundred acres, her favorite one of the bulldog type called "Irish Mike."

The family group in the picture accompanying is composed of Mme. Schumann-Heink, Henry, who is now nearly 21, and who is a student in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston; Hans, 18, who is in the watch and clock manufacturing in Ansonia, Conn.; Walter, 19 years of age, an artist, with the firm of Baumgarten, in New York; Ferdinand, now 14, who is a student in the Montclair Military Academy, while the child nearest Mme Schumann-Heink is Mitsie, and next to her is George Washington, who was born in New York shortly after Mme. Schumann-Heink made a first visit to America with the Metropolitan Opera Company.

From

Address

Date

The Boston Symphony is announced for Jan. 20. Here is one of the great treats of the musical season. The other is Marcella Sembrich.

More musicians in the already musical family of the Homers. Tuesday [illegible] were added to the family of Mme. Louise Homer, the opera contralto, and Sydney Homer, composer.

Carl Gantvoor, baritone of Cincinnati, who has sung in Columbus several times, is again singing leading baritone roles with the Savage Opera company. He opens this week in New York with "Madame Butterfly," singing the role of Sharpless in that opera.

[32]

From

Address

Date OCT 20 1907

Some Coming Musical Events.

Providence to Have Its Usual Three Symphony Concerts.—Other Local Announcements.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual quota of three concerts in Providence this year. The dates are Tuesday, Nov. 19, Tuesday, Dec. 31, and Wednesday, Feb. 12. The management of the orchestra has decided to cut down the number of out of town concerts this year and in the future, and for some time it was a question whether Hartford or Providence should lose two of the three concerts in the past allotted to these citis, but it was finally decided to give Providence its usual three and give Hartford but one.

The soloist at the first concert in Providence will be Olga Samaroff. The other soloists will be announced in due time, likewise the particulars regarding the renewals of subscriptions to the sale of seats for the winter.

From

Address

Date OCT

HOFMANN WILL PLAY HERE NEXT WEEK

Promises of a Fine Series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

OPERA ONLY ONE WEEK AWAY,

At Hammerstein's Manhattan House. Sembrich to Sing Here November 14.

The Brooklyn Institute is particularly fortunate in its musical star for the coming week, and as it is to be the only appearance of Joseph Hofmann in Brooklyn this season, the concert at the Baptist Temple next Thursday evening will be of more than ordinary interest. Mr. Hofmann will play several of Chopin's including his Mazurka, B flat minor, and Scherzo, in the same key. Another number is the overture from "Tannhaeuser."

In full the programme comprises:

Sonata, Opus 3	Beethoven
Scherzo, B minor	Mendelssohn
Variations	Raff
Fantasie Impromptu	Chopin
Mazurka, B flat minor	Chopin
Scherzo, B flat minor	Chopin
Barcarole	Rachmaninoff
Prelude, G minor	Rachmaninoff
Etude, C sharp minor, Opus 42	Scriabine
Poeme d'Amour	Scriabine
Overture, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner-Liszt

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its twentieth season in Brooklyn on Friday evening, November 8, at the Baptist Temple. There will be five concerts given in November, December, January, Feburary and March. The first and last will be devoted solely to orchestral work; the soloists at the others being, M. Paderewski, Mme. Carreno and Fritz Kreisler. The orchestra consists of ninety-eight members, an increase of two over last year and there are several changes in the membership, notably that of Carl Wendling, who has assumed the position of concert master in the place of Professor Hess, who is abroad on a year's leave. Mr. Wendling, though only 32 years of age, ranks among the great concert masters abroad. He has been concert master at the three last Wagner festivals at Bayreuth, for three seasons at Convent Garden under Richter, four years at Meiningen under Stuttgart and concert master at the Court Theater of Stuttgart. Another acquisition is Julius Theodorowicz, well known for his fine work as second violin with the Kneisel Quartet. Many new works will be presented under the admirable directorship of Karl Muck. An orchestral piece by Schjelderup new symphonies by Henry Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's Wallenstein Symphony and symphonic poems by Ertel and Beehe. The advance sale for these concerts is unusually large this year, Brooklyn people liking Karl Muck and being cheered on by the thought of having him lead the orchestra in the new Academy next year.

Saturday afternoons will be set aside for the New York Symphony Orchestra, which as usual is under the fine leadership of Walter Damrosch. The first concert will be given November 23, and four others will follow, one each month, excepting February. The soloists are Josef Hofmann, Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler, M. Emilio de Gogorza, David Mannes, and there will be one all Wagner programme.

The announcement of a song recital by Mme. Sembrich, at the Baptist Temple, on the evening of November 14, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, adds another famous artist to their list for the year. The full programme will be announced later.

From

Address

Date

MUSIC

Current Happenings And Comments On Matters Of Interest—Artists Who Are To Appear At The Peabody.

The approaching season promises a repletion of musical provision for Baltimore. Dr. Muck will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to us for five evenings; the Philadelphia organization, under its new conductor (Herr Pohlig from Stuttgart, who, if we may credit his European reputation, will blend that admirable body of artists into a real orchestra), will give five concerts; Mr. Randolph has extended the Peabody series to fifteen performances; the Bach Choir will continue its fruitful career; the Oratorio Society will sing large choral works; the newly organized Kneisel Quartette will give us five afternoons, and we are promised numerous visits from solo artists of good repute. The Peabody series, together with the Kneisels, occupy each and every Friday afternoon from November 1 to March 20, inclusive, omitting only the Friday in the Christmas holidays.

Address

Date OCT 26 1907

The season of Boston Symphony concerts will open on Friday evening, November 8, when the first concert will be given in the Baptist Temple. Dr. Muck has arranged a most catholic programme, as the three works to be played represent three great periods of music, the ultra-classical, the neo-romantic and the modern. Brooklyn will hear for the first time Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein," which had its first performances in Boston on the 18th and 19th, when it won the enthusiastic approval of all that heard it. The second number will be Bach's suite in D minor, for flute and string orchestra and the last number will be Schumann's overture "Gene-

From NEW YORK MAIL

Address

Date OCT 26 1907

DAMROSCH'S FIRST CONCERT OF HIS LONG SEASON

It Will Be Given Next Saturday Evening, with Fritz Kreisler as Soloist—Sale of Seats for the Boston Symphony Thursday Series Larger Than Ever—Paderewski's Arrival.

Confronted by so many orchestral concerts we find ourselves wondering where the conductors will find works that have not been "done to death" without duplicating other programmes. It seems, however, that programme making shows the same individuality that is to be found in everything else related to real art. For instance the first programme to be given by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony orchestra is absolutely typical of Mr. Damrosch, and shows the study he has given the situation.

From past seasons we know the attractiveness and the interest surrounding every offering, and this season he promises as well. His organization will be first on the platform, opening next Saturday evening. Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, will make his first appearance in the Brahms concerto, while the orchestral offerings will be Wagner's prelude to Lohengrin, Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Andante and Scherzo from Debussy's string quartet, for string orchestra and Chabrier's Espana. This orchestra opens the longest season of orchestral concerts ever given in New York, and there is little doubt that the public appreciates this fact judging from the subscriptions already received for the series.

* * *

The following Tuesday New York will have the opportunity to measure the ability of Carl Pohlig, whose reception in Philadelphia was most flattering. This will be a concert of "first appearances," as in addition to Herr Pohlig we will hear for the first time Richard Buhlig, who also selects Brahms as a medium in which to present himself in his American debut.

Buhlig will play the second concerto as his only number. Karl Klein, another young American, will appear for the first time in his home city in Tschaikowsky's violin concerto. The orchestral numbers to be given by the Philadelphia orchestra will be Heirath wieder willen, a new overture, by Humperdinck, and the Beethoven fifth symphony.

* * *

The sale of Boston Symphony seats for Thursday nights is larger than it was last year and for Saturday afternoons it is about the same. The first pair of concerts to be given in Carnegie hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon will have no soloists, but will trust to the programme and to their presentation to satisfy the audience. Thursday night's offering will include Bruckner's ninth (unfinished) symphony; Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra and Beethoven's overture Leonore, No. 1. The programme of Saturday will consist of two symphonies: Mozart's in C minor and Beethoven's Pastoral.

Paderewski is on the Augusta Victoria, due to-day. He will play his first recital at Carnegie hall next Saturday afternoon. The programme has not yet been announced, but as his general scheme for programme making is well known, his public are willing to take him on trust. In this particular America is different from Europe. There, the importance lies in what work is to be performed, here, in who is to perform it. Paderewski will give another recital at Carnegie hall November 23, and his only appearance with orchestra in New York will be on Saturday afternoon, December 7, with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

* * *

Jan Kubelik will sail from Bremen next Tuesday (October 29), arriving in New York November 6. He will be accompanied by his wife, the Countess Czaky-Szell, who, not dreading a long and hard trip, will go with her husband, who is due to play one hundred and twenty-five concerts. In the party to arrive will be Ludwig Schwab, who was his accompanist last season and who will again act in this capacity. The opening concert will be given at the Hippodrome Sunday evening, November 10, with the assistance of the Russian Symphony orchestra and Modest Altschuler.

* * *

Anna M. Schirmer has returned from Europe, where she spent all summer in Switzerland, at the villa of her former teacher, Mme. L. Cappiani, in Rodi Fiesso. She has been taking a supplementary course of this well known teacher in the development of voice and the art of singing. Her New York studio is at 147 West Seventy-first street.

* * *

Victor Herbert will open his series of popular concerts to-morrow night at the Broadway theatre. His programme will include the Carnival Romain by Berlioz and a number of his own compositions.

EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

From N. Y. EV'G SUN

Address

Date

Here's Music for Comfort.

The music season is here. Mr. BISPHAM was in Brooklyn last night, JOSEF HOFMANN comes to Manhattan to-morrow. Mr. PADEREWSKI, due ashore even now, will play just seven days later to one of the great, tumultuous assemblies of the year, with Mme. SEMBRICH to follow.

One week away are symphony and opera, under the initiatory auspices of Mr. WALTER DAMROSCH'S orchestral Saturday nights and Sundays, and Mr. OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN'S second annual "first Monday." Twenty-four bor[illegible]ers, named to-day for the New Manhattan season, indicate that New York's opera war is not without its social following on either side. It is made clear that the golden horseshoe of five-and-thirty stockholders in the Metropolitan establishment, reopening a fortnight later, is more than ever solid in allegiance to the returned impresario, Mr. HEINRICH CONRIED.

The day brings a curious word of comfortable assurance on one point: "The present disastrous slump in the stock market seems to have had no effect whatever on the subscription of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall." At sea for the moment is Mr. SAFONOFF of the Philharmonic, which with the Russian and other societies will start up last of all. There are substantial grounds for optimism in the box offices. But the temples of art are no further from Wall Street wires to-day than they were in the consulship of that Napoleon of the telephone, that Franklin who drew the lightning of stocks and [illegible] from a single wire. Mr. MAURICE [illegible]

NEW YORK MAIL
OCT 26 1907

Leading Conductors of an Important Musical Season

WALTER DAMROSCH.
New York Symphony Orchestra.

MODEST ALTSCHULER.
Russian Symphony Orchestra.

WASSILI SAFONOFF.
New York Philharmonic Society.

GUSTAV MAHLER.
The New Conductor for the Metropolitan.

THE development of orchestral music in this country has been one of the most interesting phases of its musical life, and it has taken time and personal effort as well as much financial consideration. There is a powerful dividing line between those who love music for itself, and those who love opera. The latter appeals to the senses and carries the hearer into a realm of music in which he may or may not feel at home, but the glamour will call forth enjoyment and interest whether the music does or not.

The love of orchestral music is more deeply seated, bringing into play entirely different emotions, and while the influence of orchestra may not be as widespread as that of opera, it makes for more serious musical atmosphere and the deepening of a national artistic culture.

The Philharmonic society has spent over sixty-five years trying to bring the masterpieces of the musical world before New York audiences. It has passed through all stages of success and failure. With the advent of Wassili Safonoff, the venerable old society took on fresh vigor, and through the sturdy Russian it pulsates not only with American spirit but with the sturdiness of the conductor's remarkable personality. "Scratch a Russian and you find a tartar," said Safonoff; "I am a Cossack without scratching." Born in the Cossack village of Itsyursk, in the Caucasus, Safonoff is a fine type of the power and temperament of the Russian. He is a perfectly healthy musician, and every note under his direction attests the truth of this.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, entering its twenty-second season in New York, has left its imprint upon the musical life of the city. This orchestra is synonymous with all that is greatest and best in the entire musical world. Dr. Karl Muck has come to us from Germany—a great man and a great conductor. He is almost ascetic in devotion to high ideals, and to this is added a desire to exclude the soloist, for the tendency of the latter is to throw a programme out of balance. This season the Boston organization will use but one-half the number of soloists that it has done heretofore, which means that Dr. Muck will come just half way to meet the supposed demand of the public.

Walter Damrosch is probably more nearly an American than any one wielding a great baton. Picking up the work begun by his illustrious father, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, he has forged to the front not only for himself but for the orchestra known as the New York Symphony, which, through his efforts, has been placed in an enviable position. Mr. Damrosch is a man of force and of determination, and these elements, in addition to genuine musicianship and artistic aims, have given New York a close approach to a permanent organization devoted exclusively to orchestral work.

The Russian Symphony orchestra began its work with about three dozen members from the New York and Philharmonic orchestras, who were graduates of Russian conservatories. These men, as a labor of love, organized for the purpose of playing music of their own country. Modest Altschuler, who had been a conductor in Russia, was elected to the same office here, and, strange to relate, the audiences grow at the rate of 50 per cent. advance yearly, the following, instead of being foreign, as might have been expected, being almost entirely American.

Gustav Mahler, who will come to the Metropolitan opera house early in December, is one of the most important musical forces that America has enjoyed in many years. Mahler is equally great as conductor of opera and symphony, and is no stranger as composer, having figured on the orchestral programmes as early as 1905. He is foremost not only among composers of to-day, but he has no rival at the baton in Europe.

Another stranger in this country is Carl Pohlig, who will direct the Philadelphia orchestra, first appearing under the direction of Steinway & Sons at Carnegie hall on the afternoon of Election day, in conjunction with the first American hearing of Richard Buhlig, a young American pianist. Pohlig is a man of standing and reputation in Europe, and is a valuable acquisition to the musical life of this country.

Walter Rothwell is a favorite in New York and throughout the country. It is interesting to note that this talented young conductor, who has proven himself a giant in his art, entered his career as assistant conductor and chorusmaster under Mahler in 1895 in Hamburg.

Campanini will again have the destiny of the Manhattan opera under his lead. His achievements of last year are sufficiently significant.

The season now just beginning will unquestionably be the most notable in the history of music in this country. Not only will the two opera organizations make more new productions than ever before, but in concert and orchestral work the winter will be a memorable one. The announcement that Victor Herbert's new opera, on which he is now engaged, will also be presented toward the close of the season should give an impetus to the movement for better things in musical composition by American composers, more especially of a lighter nature.

WALTER ROTHWELL.
Conductor for Mr. Savage.

CLEOFANTE CAMPANINI.
Musical Director at Manhattan Opera House.
Copyright by Mishkin.

DR. KARL MUCK.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARL POHLIG.
The Philadelphia Orchestra.

From AMERICAN
Address BALTIMORE, MD
Date
Seats for Symphony Orchestra.
The sale of seats for the five concerts to be given at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened at Albaugh's, North Charles street, yesterday morning. The demand for the choice seats was unusually large. The first of the concerts will be given on November 6, but there will be no soloists at the opening concert.
Estab 1884

From
Address
Date OCT 23 1907
Felix Weingartner has apparently at last really resigned from his post in Berlin, for he is booked as first conductor at the Vienna opera, to take the place of Mahler, who has been engaged by Hammerstein. Weingartner's path in Berlin was rendered thorny by Muck's greater success as a director of opera. After one of his repeated resignations the intendant relieved him of operatic duties and gave him full charge of the Royal Symphony Concerts. In these he has been eminently successful, but he evidently yearned for an opportunity to sway dramatic music as a supreme power. He has now attained this in Vienna. It will be interesting to watch
Estab 1884
[33]

From BULLETIN
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 26 1907
A number of new faces will be seen in the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. The year's leave of absence given the concert master, Willy Hess, and the resignation of Timothee Adamowski will bring two new men to the first desk of the violins. In Mr. Hess's place will be Karl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart and of the Beyreuth Festival Theatre. Mr. Adamowski's position will be filled by Mr. Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra several seasons ago to be second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The orchestra will give two its series of five this winter at Establis

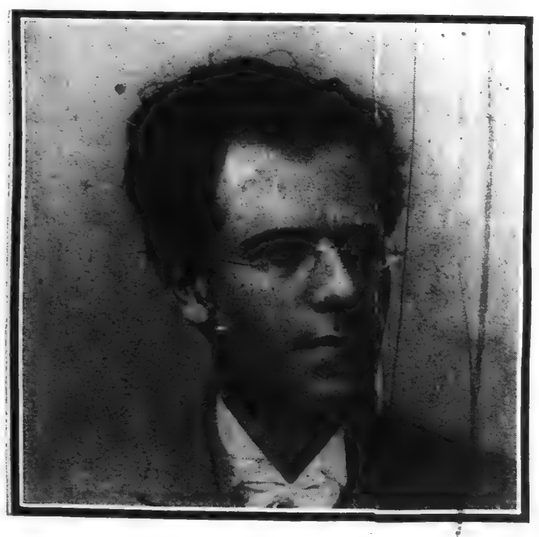
NEW YORK MAIL
OCT 26 1907

Leading Conductors of an Important Musical Season

WALTER DAMROSCH.
New York Symphony Orchestra

MODEST ALTSCHULER.
Russian Symphony Orchestra.

WASSILI SAFONOFF.
New York Philharmonic Society.



GUSTAV MAHLER.
The New Conductor for the Metropolitan.

THE development of orchestral music in this country has been one of the most interesting phases of its musical life, and it has taken time and personal effort as well as much financial consideration. There is a powerful dividing line between those who love music for itself, and those who love opera. The latter appeals to the senses and carries the hearer into a realm of music in which he may or may not feel at home, but the glamour will call forth enjoyment and interest whether the music does or not.

The love of orchestral music is more deeply seated, bringing into play entirely different emotions, and while the influence of orchestra may not be as widespread as that of opera, it makes for more serious musical atmosphere and the deepening of a national artistic culture.

The Philharmonic society has spent over sixty-five years trying to bring the masterpieces of the musical world before New York audiences. It has passed through all stages of success and failure. With the advent of Wassili Safonoff, the venerable old society took on fresh vigor, and through the sturdy Russian it pulsates not only with American spirit but with the sturdiness of the conductor's remarkable personality. "Scratch a Russian and you find a tartar," said Safonoff; "I am a Cossack without scratching." Born in the Cossack village of Itsyursk, in the Caucasus, Safonoff is a fine type of the power and temperament of the Russian. He is a perfectly healthy musician, and every note under his direction attests the truth of this.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, entering its twenty-second season in New York, has left its imprint upon the musical life of the city. This orchestra is synonymous with all that is greatest and best in the entire musical world. Dr. Karl Muck has come to us from Germany—a great man and a great conductor. He is almost ascetic in devotion to high ideals, and to this is added a desire to exclude the soloist, for the tendency of the latter is to throw a programme out of balance. This season the Boston organization will use but one-half the number of soloists that it has done heretofore, which means that Dr. Muck will come just half way to meet the supposed demand of the public.

Walter Damrosch is probably more nearly an American than any one wielding a great baton. Picking up the work begun by his illustrious father, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, he has forged to the front not only for himself but for the orchestra known as the New York Symphony, which, through his efforts, has been placed in an enviable position. Mr. Damrosch is a man of force and of determination, and these elements, in addition to genuine musicianship and artistic aims, have given New York a close approach to a permanent organization devoted exclusively to orchestral work.

The Russian Symphony orchestra began its work with about three dozen members from the New York and Philharmonic orchestras, who were graduates of Russian conservatories. These men, as a labor of love, organized for the purpose of playing music of their own country. Modest Altschuler, who had been a conductor in Russia, was elected to the same office here, and, strange to relate, the audiences grow at the rate of 50 per cent. advance yearly, the following, instead of being foreign, as might have been expected, being almost entirely American.

Gustav Mahler, who will come to the Metropolitan opera house early in December, is one of the most important musical forces that America has enjoyed in many years. Mahler is equally great as conductor of opera and symphony, and is no stranger as composer, having figured on the orchestral programmes as early as 1905. He is foremost not only among composers of to-day, but he has no rival at the baton in Europe.

Another stranger in this country is Carl Pohlig, who will direct the Philadelphia orchestra, first appearing under the direction of Steinway & Sons at Carnegie hall on the afternoon of Election day, in conjunction with the first American hearing of Richard Buhlig, a young American pianist. Pohlig is a man of standing and reputation in Europe, and is a valuable acquisition to the musical life of this country.

Walter Rothwell is a favorite in New York and throughout the country. It is interesting to note that this talented young conductor, who has proven himself a giant in his art, entered his career as assistant conductor and chorusmaster under Mahler in 1895 in Hamburg.

Campanini will again have the destiny of the Manhattan opera under his lead. His achievements of last year are sufficiently significant.

The season now just beginning will unquestionably be the most notable in the history of music in this country. Not only will the two opera organizations make more new productions than ever before, but in concert and orchestral work the winter will be a memorable one. The announcement that Victor Herbert's new opera, on which he is now engaged, will also be presented toward the close of the season should give an impetus to the movement for better things in musical composition by American composers, more especially of a lighter nature.

WALTER ROTHWELL.
Conductor for Mr. Savage.

CLEOFANTE CAMPANINI.
Musical Director at Manhattan Opera House.
Copyright by Mishkin.

DR. KARL MUCK.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARL POHLIG.
The Philadelphia Orchestra.

From .....
Address .....
Date .....
Seats for Symphony Orchestra.
The sale of seats for the five concerts to be given at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened at Albaugh's, North Charles street, yesterday morning. The demand for the choice seats was unusually large. The first of the concerts will be given on November 6, but there will be no soloists at the opening concert.
Esta ..., 1884

From .....
Address .....
Date ..... OCT 22 1907
Esta ... 1884
Felix Weingartner has apparently at last really resigned from his post in Berlin, for he is booked as first conductor at the Vienna opera, to take the place of Mahler, who has been engaged by Hammerstein. Weingartner's path in Berlin was rendered thorny by Muck's greater success as a director of opera. After one of his repeated resignations the intendant relieved him of operatic duties and gave him full charge of the Royal Symphony Concerts. In these he has been eminently successful, but he evidently yearned for an opportunity to sway dramatic music as a supreme power. He has now attained this in Vienna. It will be interesting to watch for his earliest [33]

From ... BULLETIN
Address ... PHILA. PA
Date ... OCT 26 1907
Establis
A number of new faces will be seen in the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. The year's leave of absence given the concert master, Willy Hess, and the resignation of Timothee Adamowski will bring two new men to the first desk of the violins. In Mr. Hess's place will be Karl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart and of the Beyreuth Festival Theatre. Mr. Adamowski's position will be filled by Mr. Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra several seasons ago to be second violin of the Kneisel Quartet. The orchestra will give the first of its series of five concerts in Philadelphia this winter at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, Nov... will be no soloist ...

From NEW YORK WORLD

Address

Date OCT 27 1907

COMING EVENTS IN MUSICAL WORLD.

Paderewski Gives His First Recital of Season Next Saturday at Carnegie Hall.

GREAT ORCHESTRAS PLAN BRILLIANT PROGRAMMES.

Manhattan Opera-House Box Subscribers Greatly Exceed Those of Last Year.

Paderewski's first New York recital will be given in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. There will be a typical Paderewski gathering, as the house will be entirely sold out. His second New York recital will be given in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 23.

Paderewski was due to arrive in Hoboken on the Kaiserin Auguste Victoria yesterday, and his first concert will be in Bridgeport, Conn., to-morrow evening. His first and only appearance with orchestra in New York will be on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, when he will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. His programme for next Saturday afternoon will be announced later.

The sixty-sixth season of the Philharmonic Society will, as usual, consist of eight afternoon and evening concerts, to be given at Carnegie Hall.

Wassily Safonoff, the conductor, has returned from Europe, bringing with him a number of interesting novelties which will be performed during the coming season. Among them are the "Easter" overture by Rimsky Korsakoff, "Das Meer" (The Sea), by Glazounow, and the symphonic poem, "The Sunken Bell," by Vladimir Metzi, grounded on Gerhart Hauptmann's play and performed last spring, under the direction of Mr. Safonoff by the London Symphony Orchestra, when it made a profound impression. The opening concert will be given Nov. 15.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, respectively. There will be no soloist. The programme on Thursday night will be Bruckner's Ninth Symphony (unfinished); Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Beethoven's Overture Leonore No. 1. The programme for Saturday afternoon will consist of two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor (K 550) and Beethoven's "Pastoral."

Symphony Society's Plans.

The New York Symphony Society will inaugurate the orchestral season next Saturday evening at Carnegie Hall under Walter Damrosch's direction. The occasion will be of double interest, for the opening concert will likewise be the beginning of the largest symphonic series ever provided for New York.

Fritz Kreisler, violin, as soloist, will make his first appearance of the year in the Brahms concerto. Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Chabiar's "Spanish Rhapsodie" and two numbers for string orchestra by Debussy will be the instrumental features of the programme.

The New York Symphony Orchestra starts upon its new season under significant circumstances. It is now New York's first "permanent orchestra," and it remains to be seen how far New York will support the society in its worthy aims.

There were only eight subscribers to the boxes of the Manhattan Opera-House last season. A most emphatic indorsement of the success of this opera-house consists in the fact that this season the subscribers number twenty-four.

The following is a list of the subscribers for the boxes to date: Clarence Mackay, E. H. Titus, Edwin H. Wetherbee, Isaac Guggenheim, F. Lancaster, Robert Graves, Frank Woolworth, F. G. Bourne, Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, Senator W. H. Reynolds, Mrs. Rutherford Stuyvesant, James Gayley, Daniel G. Reid, Frank Tilford, Dr. William T. Bull, Judge E. H. Gray, W. E. Corey, W. E. Reis, E. R. Thomas, W. S. P. Morosini, George C. Boldt, jr.; Edward Wickes, H. G. Campbell, W. B. Dickson.

How Oratorio Society Keeps Young.

Despite its thirty-four years of active work in New York's musical field, the Oratorio Society has managed to keep itself young. By admitting about seventy-five new members every autumn, to replace those who are retired from the chorus or who resign from it, the society has been able to keep its body of tone fresh and supple, and fit to cope with the difficult tasks imposed upon it.

Active work is not in progress on the music for the first concert, to take place Wednesday evening, Dec. 4, in Carnegie Hall. Two compositions new to the society's lists will be sung, and one of these, E. Wolf-Ferrari's cantata, "The New Life," based on Dante's text, will be new to the country. The other will be Brahm's beautiful "Song of Destiny."

The choice of "The New Life" is in line with the policy that has given New York, in the past five years, a chance to hear such novelties as Sir Edward Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius," "The Apostles" and "The Kingdom," Richard Strauss's "Taillefer" and Gabriel Pierne's, "The children's Crusade," which made so deep an impression last season.

The Volpe Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arnold D. Volpe conductor announces three concerts to be given at Carnegie Hall on the evenings of Nov. 21, Jan. 23 and March 26, with an orchestra of ninety-five. And an increased list of patronesses, including many prominent names. Soloists will be Gerardy, Rudolf Ganz, Jeanne Gourcil and Marie

---

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

Address Brooklyn Edit

Date OCT 27 1907

Although Mr. Volpe promises no orchestral novelties, the works announced for performance indicate a series of interesting programmes.

High praise had been bestowed upon Carl Pohlig, the new conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, who gave his first concerts with that organization last week. New York will have the opportunity to judge for itself about Herr Pohlig and measure his ability in comparison with the many other noted foreign conductors who have been heard here in recent seasons at a concert in Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Election Day, Nov. 5.

First appearances will be the order of the day, as in addition to Herr Pohlig's debut, Karl Klein, violinist, and Richard Buhlig, pianist, will make their initial American appearances. The programme will include Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the overture to Humperdink's recent operatic success, "Heirath wider Willen."

From Oard Union

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 27 1907

Musical Notes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its twentieth season in Brooklyn on Friday evening, Nov. 8, at the Baptist Temple. There will be five concerts given in November, December, January, February and March. The first and last will be devoted solely to orchestral work, the soloists at the others being M. Paderewski, Mme. Carreno, and Fritz Kreisler. The orchestra consists of ninety-eight members, an increase of two over last year, and there are several changes in the membership, notably that of Carl Wendling, who has assumed the position of concert master in the place of

FRITZ KREISLER,
Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARL WENDLING,
Concert Master With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Prof. Hess, who is abroad on a year's leave. Mr. Wendling, though only 32 years of age, ranks among the great concert masters abroad. He has been concert master at the three last Wagner festivals at Bayreuth; for three seasons at Covent Garden, under Richter; four years at Meiningen, under Stuttgart, and concert master at the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart. Another acquisition is Julius Thoedorowicz, well known for his fine work as second violin with the Kneisel Quartet. Many new works will be presented under the admirable directorship of Karl Muck. An orchestral piece by Schjelderup, new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's Wallenstein Symphony, and symphonic poems by Ertel and Boehe. The advance sale for these concerts is unusually large this year.

THERE is a representative list of women on the Women's Auxiliary Board of the Philharmonic concerts which are to be given at the Baptist Temple by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evenings of November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 20. On the Executive Committee are Mrs. Thomas Prosser, chairman; Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, secretary; Mrs. Camden C. Dike, ex officio; Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Mrs. Charles B. Hewitt, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. J. Elliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van B. Thayer and Mrs. George W. Wingate.

Other members, most of whom will attend the concert, are:—Mrs. George C. Adams, Miss Charlotte L. Affeld, Mrs. George A. Allin, Mrs. H. S. Anderson, Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Ross Appleton, Mrs. A. B. Ackins, Mrs. Frank Avery, Mrs. Henry D. Atwater, Mrs. Alexander S. Bacon, Mrs. F. Russell Baker, Miss C. Baldwin, Miss K. Baldwin, Miss M. Baldwin, Mrs. Ira Leo Bamberger, Mrs. C. W. Bangs, Mrs. Charles B. Bartram, Mrs. Edward E. Barr, Mrs. Julia E. Bates, Mrs. William H. Beardsley, Mrs. Joseph E. Becker, Mrs. H. D. Beeckman, Miss Minna Behr, Miss Anna Benedict, Miss Lydia Benedict, Mrs. William Berri, Mrs. Robert A. Black, Mrs. G. C. Blanke, Mrs. John Bleecker, Mrs. Wesley S. Block, Mrs. Sylvester L. Blood, Mrs. Edmund Blunt, Mrs. C. E. Bolles, Mrs. W. B. Boorum, Mrs. William Boughton, Miss A. E. Bowen, Mrs. John Hyatt Brewer, Mrs. H. M. Brigham, Miss A. Brinsmade, Mrs. Edward E. Britton, Mrs. Clotilde Browne, Mrs. Hersey Brown, Mrs. Joseph E. Brown, Mrs. Jonathan Buckley, Mrs. James S. Burke, Mrs. Fred. A. M. Burrell, Mrs. Clark Burnham, Mrs. Devine H. Burtis, Mrs. Rufus Bush, Mrs. G. R. Butler, Miss Mary E. Butterick, Mrs. Nelson G. Carman, Mrs. William J. Carr, Mrs. Isaac H. Cary, Miss Florence Chauncey, Mrs. George W. Chauncey and Mrs. S. B. Chittenden.

Mrs. Dwight P. Clapp, Miss Sara S. Clapp, Mrs. S. B. Clark, Mrs. Frederick C. Coche, Mrs. David H. Cochran, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. George S. Collins, Mrs. George H. Coutts, Mrs. Edward M. Cragin, Mrs. F. W. Crane, Mrs. Jeremiah Crowell, Mrs. Arnold G. Dana, Mrs. Carll H. De Silver, Mrs. Ethan Allen Doty, Mrs. J. H. Dougherty, Miss Dow, Miss D. Dreier, Mrs. H. E. Dreier, Mrs. F. A. Dwight, Mrs. Wm. P. Earle, Mrs. F. H. E. Ebstein, Miss M. Ellers, Mrs. Annie E. Emerson, Mrs. E. T. Everett, Miss Maria B. Fairbanks, Mrs. Charles M. Field, Miss Julia Avery Fish, Mrs. H. Latham Fish, Mrs. Frederick B. Fiske, Mrs. John P. Forbes, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. John Gibb, Mrs. Walter Gibb, Mrs. Carl Goepel, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. Charles H. Goodrich, Mrs. Percy R. Gray, Miss Mary A. Guild, Mrs. Crowell Hadden, Mrs. Howard S. Hadden, Miss Ella M. Hall, Mrs. J. B. F. Herreshoff, Mrs. John W. Hesse, Miss Anna S. Higgins, Mrs. William Burr Hill, Mrs. John Hills, Miss Jennie Hinman, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinrichs, Mrs. Edward H. Hobbs, Mrs. J. R. Hodgskin, Mrs. T. Ellett Hodgskin, Mrs. J. W. Hollenback, Mrs. J. S. Hollinshead, Mrs. Josiah P. Howell, Miss Eliza S. Hoxie, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Miss F. A. Hunter, Mrs. W. A. Hunter and Mrs. S. E. Huntington.

Mrs. William B. Hurd, Jr.; Mrs. Charles F. Iddings, Miss Sallie A. Ingalls, Mrs. Almet F. Jenks, Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mrs. Frank S. Jones, Mrs. Henry A. Jones, Mrs. Martin Joost, Miss Alice M. Judge, Mrs. Henry B. Ketcham, Mrs. Herbert F. Ketcham, Mrs. Robert J. Kimball, Mrs. F. B. Kinnard, Mrs. Alexander S. Kirkman, Mrs. Eben J. Knowlton, Mrs. Victor Koechl, Mrs. Emma R. Kuster, Mrs. John B. Ladd, Mrs. Albert E. Lamb, Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Emma B. Lewis, Mrs. Edward H. Litchfield, Mrs. Calvin B. Lockwood, Mrs. John B. Lord, Mrs. Jeremiah Lott, Mrs. Francis H. Ludlow, Mrs. William H. Lyon, Mrs. Marvin T. Lyon, Mrs. J. W. MacBride, Mrs. Charles Mallory, Mrs. Robert Mallory, Mrs. A. V. Marckwald, Mrs. Josiah T. Marean, Miss Matson, Miss Clara A. Matthews, Mrs. Charles McDermott, Mrs. James McMahon, Miss Matilda McLean, Mrs. Henry N. Meeker, Miss S. L. Meserole, Mrs. Francis L. Minton, Mrs. S. H. Moore, Mrs. W. B. Moore, Mrs. J. L. Morgan, Miss Alice Morse, Mrs. Wilhelmus Mynderse, Mrs. Frederick A. Neergaard, Mrs. A. M. Nesbitt, Mrs. L. Nicolovius, Mrs. Skeffington Norton, Mrs. George Notman, Mrs. James H. Oliphant, Mrs. Herman L. Ormsbee, Mrs. Charles H. Otis, Mrs. Theodore T. Ovington, Mrs. Edwin Packard, Mrs. William S. Packer, Mrs. Frank Page, Miss Ada Palmedo and Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Jr.

Mrs. Edwin L. Patterson, Mrs. Andrew J. Perry, Mrs. Frederick O. Pierce, Mrs. F. Eugene Pitkin, Mrs. Frederick B. Pratt, Mrs. George D. Pratt, Mrs. Russell Prentiss, Mrs. George A. Price, Mrs. Julius E. Prior, Miss Fay Randall, Mrs. William Ray, Mrs. Frederick Rawollo, Miss Sarah J. Read, Mrs. Lydia T. Redding, Mrs. William C. Redfield, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Clarence H. Riggs, Miss Rose, Mrs. Frederick Rose, Mrs. Gulian Ross, Mrs. Merwin Rushmore, Mrs. James T. Russell, Mrs. Philip Ruxton, Mrs. J. Sidney Sampson, Mrs. Charles A. Schieren, Mrs. C. W. Seamans, Mrs. J. P. Seymour, Mrs. Henry K. Sheldon, Mrs. Harry Rowe Shelley, Mrs. Charles Shepard, Mrs. George H. Southard, Mrs. William A. Spelman, Mrs. George A. Stanton, Mrs. Hiram R. Steele, Mrs. Arthur G. Stone, Mrs. Joseph Sutphin, Mrs. Stephen B. Sturges, Mrs. Alden S. Swan, Mrs. Edwin A. Sweet, Miss Margaret J. Thayer, Mrs. David Thornton, Mrs. John E. Tousey, Mrs. Alexander B. Trowbridge, Mrs. W. M. Tuttle, Mrs. Jerome P. Uptegrove, Mrs. J. P. Warbasse, Mrs. Mary B. Wardell, Mrs. Samuel R. Weed, Mrs. Henri Werlemann, Mrs. Frederick Wesson, Mrs. Alfred T. White, Mrs. C. C. Whitney, Mrs. John O. Williams, Mrs. Alfred F. Wise, Mrs. Henry Hayes Wood, Mrs. Walter C. Wood, Mrs. R. H. Woodman, Mrs. Richard Young and Mrs. William Ziegler.

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Date OCT 27 1907

Visiting pianist No. 2 will be Mark Hambourg, who will give his first recital at Mendelssohn Hall on the afternoon of November 1. He will play Beethoven's sonata, opus 55, the Brahms variations on a theme by that harmonious blacksmith, Handel, the usual entrée of Chopin delicatessen, a "Rhapsodie Etude" by Joseph Holbrooke, Hambourg's "Folkslied" and a paraphrase on themes from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin," by one Pabst.

Visiting pianist No. 3, Mr. Paderewski, will give his first New York recital at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. His second recital is announced for November 23, and his only appearance with orchestra for December 7, when he will be the soloist at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall. The house for the first recital is already nearly sold out.

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Date

Among the orchestras, that of Boston will follow New York's namesake at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 7, playing Bach, Beethoven and a Bruckner symphony No. 9. A double symphony matinée bill pairs Mozart's G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral." Mr. Altschuler's Russians on Nov. 14 play Glazunow's symphony No. 8, composed during the troubles in St. Petersburg. Mr. Safonoff has cabled to amend the opening Philharmonic bill that week by adding Grieg's "Peer Gynt." Later, the Volpe Orchestra of ninety-five men will open a fourth season on Nov. 21. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony give on Nov. 23 the first of five matinées in Brooklyn.

From

Address

Date OCT 27 1907

The stock market seems to have had no effect whatever on the subscription sale of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has been going on for the last two weeks at Carnegie Hall. The sale for Thursday nights is even larger than it was last year and for Saturday afternoon it is about the same. The first pair of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9, respectively. There will be no soloist. On Thursday night the programme will be Bruckner's Ninth Symphony (unfinished); Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Beethoven's Overture Leonore No. 1. The programme for Saturday afternoon will consist of two symphonies: Mozart's in G minor (K. 550) and Beethoven's Pastoral.

From NEW YORK EV'G POST

Address

Date OCT 26 1907

An interesting novelty, Bruckner's ninth symphony, which its composer did not live to finish, will be played at the first of the season's Carnegie Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A Bach suite and Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture will also be heard. The programme for the following Saturday afternoon will include a Mozart symphony and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

From

Address

Date OCT 26

As an indication of the steadily increasing interest in this city in music of the best, it is said that the subscription sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the largest in many years. The first concert will be on Monday evening, November 4. There will be no soloist. The feature of the programme will be d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein." Other numbers will be Bach's Suite in D Major and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 1.

[34]

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address Brooklyn Edit
Date OCT 7 1907

COMING EVENTS IN MUSICAL WORLD.

Paderewski Gives His First Recital of Season Next Saturday at Carnegie Hall.

GREAT ORCHESTRAS PLAN BRILLIANT PROGRAMMES.

Manhattan Opera-House Box Subscribers Greatly Exceed Those of Last Year.

Paderewski's first New York recital will be given in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. There will be a typical Paderewski gathering, as the house will be entirely sold out. His second New York recital will be given in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 23.

Paderewski was due to arrive in Hoboken on the Kaiserin Auguste Victoria yesterday, and his first concert will be in Bridgeport, Conn., to-morrow evening. His first and only appearance with orchestra in New York will be on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, when he will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. His programme for next Saturday afternoon will be announced later.

The sixty-sixth season of the Philharmonic Society will, as usual, consist of eight afternoon and evening concerts, to be given at Carnegie Hall.

Wassily Safonoff, the conductor, has returned from Europe, bringing with him a number of interesting novelties which will be performed during the coming season. Among them are the "Easter" overture by Rimsky Korsakoff, "Das Meer" (The Sea), by Glazounow, and the symphonic poem, "The Sunken Bell," by Vladimir Metzl, founded on Gerhart Hauptmann's play and performed last spring, under the direction of Mr. Safonoff by the London Symphony Orchestra, when it made a profound impression. The opening concert will be given Nov. 15.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, respectively. There will be no soloist. The programme on Thursday night will be Bruckner's Ninth Symphony (unfinished); Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Beethoven's Overture Leonore No. 1. The programme for Saturday afternoon will consist of two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor (K 550) and Beethoven's "Pastoral."

Symphony Society's Plans.

The New York Symphony Society will inaugurate the orchestral season next Saturday evening at Carnegie Hall under Walter Damrosch's direction. The occasion will be of double interest, for the opening concert will likewise be the beginning of the largest symphonic series ever provided for New York.

Fritz Kreisler, violin, as soloist, will make his first appearance of the year in the Brahms concerto. Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Chabiar's "Spanish Rhapsodie" and two numbers for string orchestra by Debussy will be the instrumental features of the programme.

The New York Symphony Orchestra starts upon its new season under significant circumstances. It is now New York's first "permanent orchestra," and it remains to be seen how far New York will support the society in its worthy aims.

There were only eight subscribers to the boxes of the Manhattan Opera-House last season. A most emphatic indorsement of the success of this opera-house consists in the fact that thi season the subscribers number twenty-four.

The following is a list of the subscribers for the boxes to date: Clarence Mackay, E. H. Titus, Edwin H. Wetherbee, Isaac Guggenheim, F. Lancaster, Robert Graves, Frank Woolworth, F. G. Bourne, Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, Senator W. H. Reynolds, Mrs. Rutherford Stuyvesant, James Gayley, Daniel G. Reid, Frank Tilford, Dr. William T. Bull, Judge E. H. Gray, W. E. Corey, W. E. Reis, E. R. Thomas, W. S. P. Morosini, George C. Boldt, jr.; Edward Wickes, H. G. Campbell, W. B. Dickson.

How Oratorio Society Keeps Young.

Despite its thirty-four years of active work in New York's musical field, the Oratorio Society has managed to keep itself young. By admitting about seventy-five new members every autumn, to replace those who are retired from the chorus or who resign from it, the society has been able to keep its body of tone fresh and supple, and fit to cope with the difficult tasks imposed upon it.

Active work is not in progress on the music for the first concert, to take place Wednesday evening, Dec. 4, in Carnegie Hall. Two compositions new to the society's lists will be sung, and one of these, E. Wolf-Ferrari's cantata, "The New Life," based on Dante's text, will be new to this country. The other will be Brahm's beautiful "Song of Destiny."

The choice of "The New Life" is in line with the policy that has given New York, in the past five years, a chance to hear such novelties as Sir Edward Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius," "The Apostles" and "The Kingdom," Richard Strauss's "Taillefer" and Gabriel Pierne's, "The children's Crusade," which made so deep an impression last season.

The Volpe Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arnold D. Volpe conductor, announces three concerts to be given at Carnegie Hall on the evenings of Nov. 21, Jan. 23 and March 26, with an orchestra of ninety-five and an increased list of patronesses, including many prominent names. Soloists will be Gerardy, Rudolf Ganz, Jeanne Gourelli and Marie

---

Although Mr. Volpe promises no orchestral novelties, the works announced for performance indicate a series of interesting programmes.

High praise has been bestowed upon Carl Pohlig, the new conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, who gave his first concerts with that organization last week. New York will have the opportunity to judge for itself about Herr Pohlig and measure his ability in comparison with the many other noted foreign conductors who have been heard here in recent seasons at a concert in Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Election Day, Nov. 5.

First appearances will be the order of the day, as in addition to Herr Pohlig's debut, Karl Klein, violinist, and Richard Buhlig, pianist, will make their initial American appearances. The programme will include Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and the overture to Humperdink's recent operatic success, "Heirath wider Willen."

From Standard Union
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 27 1907

Musical Notes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its twentieth season in Brooklyn on Friday evening, Nov. 8, at the Baptist Temple. There will be five concerts given in November, December, January, February and March. The first and last will be devoted solely to orchestral work, the soloists at the others being M. Paderewski, Mme. Carreno and Fritz Kreisler. The orchestra consists of ninety-eight members, an increase of two over last year, and there are several changes in the membership, notably that of Carl Wendling, who has assumed the position of concert master in the place of

FRITZ KREISLER,
Soloist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARL WENDLING,
Concert Master With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Prof. Hess, who is abroad on a year's leave. Mr. Wendling, though only 32 years of age, ranks among the great concert masters abroad. He has been concert master at the three last Wagner festivals at Bayreuth; for three seasons at Covent Garden, under Richter; four years at Meiningen, under Stuttgart, and concert master at the Court Theatre, of Stuttgart. Another acquisition is Julius Thoedorowicz, well known for his fine work as second violin with the Kneisel Quartet. Many new works will be presented under the admirable directorship of Karl Muck. An orchestral piece by Schjelderup, new symphonies by Henry K. Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's Wallenstein Symphony, and symphonic poems by Ertel and Boehe. The advance sale for these concerts is unusually large this year.

THERE is a representative list of women on the Women's Auxiliary Board of the Philharmonic concerts which are to be given at the Baptist Temple by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evenings of November 8, December 6, January 10, February 21 and March 20. On the Executive Committee are Mrs. Thomas Prosser, chairman; Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, secretary; Mrs. Camden C. Dike, ex officio; Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Mrs. Charles B. Hewitt, Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper, Mrs. Andrew Jacobs, Mrs. Henry L. Judson, Mrs. J. Elliott Langstaff, Mrs. Paul Lichtenstein, Mrs. Henry R. Mallory, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. Charles F. Pray, Mrs. George H. Prentiss, Miss Marion J. Terry, Mrs. John Van B. Thayer and Mrs. George W. Wingate.

Other members, most of whom will attend the concert, are:—Mrs. George C. Adams, Miss Charlotte L. Affeld, Mrs. George A. Allin, Mrs. H. S. Anderson, Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Ross Appleton, Mrs. A. B. Atkins, Mrs. Frank Avery, Mrs. Henry D. Atwater, Mrs. Alexander S. Bacon, Mrs. F. Russell Baker, Miss C. Baldwin, Miss K. Baldwin, Miss M. Baldwin, Mrs. Ira Leo Bamberger, Mrs. C. W. Bangs, Mrs. Charles B. Barnum, Mrs. Edward E. Barr, Mrs. Julia E. Bates, Mrs. William H. Beardsley, Mrs. Joseph E. Becker, Mrs. H. D. Beeckman, Miss Minna Behr, Miss Anna Benedict, Miss Lydia Benedict, Mrs. William Berri, Mrs. Robert A. Black, Mrs. G. C. Blanke, Mrs. John Bloecker, Mrs. Wesley S. Block, Mrs. Sylvester L. Blood, Mrs. Edmund Blunt, Mrs. C. E. Bolles, Mrs. W. B. Boorum, Mrs. William Bough-ton, Miss A. E. Bowen, Mrs. John Hyatt Brewer, Mrs. H. M. Brigham, Miss A. Brinsmade, Mrs. Edward E. Britton, Mrs. Clotilde Browne, Mrs. Hersey Brown, Mrs. Joseph E. Brown, Mrs. Jonathan Buckley, Mrs. James S. Burke, Mrs. Fred. A. M. Burrell, Mrs. Clark Burnham, Mrs. Devine H. Burtis, Mrs. Rufus Buss, Mrs. G. R. Butler, Miss Mary E. Butterick, Mrs. Nelson G. Carman, Mrs. William J. Carr, Mrs. Isaac H. Cary, Miss Florence Chapman, Mrs. George W. Chrimmey and Mrs. S. B. Chittenden.

Mrs. Dwight P. Clapp, Miss Sara S. Clapp, Mrs. S. B. Clark, Mrs. Frederick C. Coche, Mrs. David H. Cochran, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. George S. Collins, Mrs. George H. Coutts, Mrs. Edward M. Cragin, Mrs. F. W. Crane, Mrs. Jeremiah Crowell, Mrs. Arnold G. Dana, Mrs. Carll H. De Silver, Mrs. Ethan Allen Doty, Mrs. J. H. Dougherty, Miss Dow, Miss D. Dreier, Mrs. H. E. Dreier, Mrs. F. A. Dwight, Mrs. Wm. P. Earle, Mrs. F. H. E. Ebstein, Miss M. Ellers, Mrs. Annie E. Emerson, Mrs. E. T. Everett, Miss Maria B. Fairbanks, Mrs. Charles M. Field, Miss Julia Avery Fish, Mrs. H. Latham Fish, Mrs. Frederick B. Fiske, Mrs. John P. Forbes, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. Thomas R. French, Mrs. John Gibb, Mrs. Walter Gibb, Mrs. Carl Goepel, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. Charles H. Goodrich, Mrs. Percy R. Gray, Miss Mary A. Guild, Mrs. Crowell Hadden, Mrs. Howard S. Hadden, Miss Ella M. Hall, Mrs. J. B. F. Herreshoff, Mrs. John W. Hesse, Miss Anna S. Higgins, Mrs. William Burr Hill, Mrs. John Hills, Miss Jennie Hinman, Mrs. Frederick W. Hinrichs, Mrs. Edward H. Hobbs, Mrs. J. R. Hodgskin, Mrs. T. Ellett Hodgskin, Mrs. J. W. Hollenback, Mrs. J. S. Hollinshead, Mrs. Josiah P. Howell, Miss Eliza S. Hoxie, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Miss F. A. Hunter, Mrs. W. A. Hunter and Mrs. S. E. Huntington.

Mrs. William B. Hurd, jr.; Mrs. Charles F. Iddings, Miss Sallie A. Ingalls, Mrs. Almet F. Jenks, Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mrs. Frank S. Jones, Mrs. Henry A. Jones, Mrs. Martin Joost, Miss Alice M. Judge, Mrs. Henry B. Ketcham, Mrs. Herbert F. Ketcham, Mrs. Robert J. Kimball, Mrs. F. B. Kinnaird, Mrs. Alexander S. Kirkman, Mrs. Eben J. Knowlton, Mrs. Victor Koechl, Mrs. Emma R. Kuster, Mrs. John B. Ladd, Mrs. Albert E. Lamb, Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Emma B. Levy, Mrs. Edward H. Litchfield, Mrs. Calvin B. Loxwood, Mrs. John B. Lord, Mrs. Jeremiah Lott, Mrs. Francis H. Ludlow, Mrs. William H. Lyon, Mrs. Marvin T. Lyon, Mrs. J. W. MacBride, Mrs. Charles Mallory, Mrs. Robert Mallory, Mrs. A. V. Marckwald, Mrs. Josiah T. Marean, Miss Matson, Miss Clara A. Matthews, Mrs. Charles McDermott, Mrs. James McMahon, Miss Matilda McLean, Mrs. Henry N. Meeker, Miss S. L. Meserole, Mrs. Francis L. Minton, Mrs. S. H. Moore, Mrs. W. B. Moore, Mrs. J. L. Morgan, Miss Alice Morse, Mrs. Wilhelmus Mynderse, Mrs. Frederick A. Nergaard, Mrs. A. M. Nesbitt, Mrs. L. Nicolovius, Mrs. Skeffington Norton, Mrs. George Notman, Mrs. James H. Oliphant, Mrs. Herman L. Ormsbee, Mrs. Charles H. Otis, Mrs. Theodore T. Ovington, Mrs. Edwin Packard, Mrs. William S. Packer, Mrs. Frank Page, Miss Ada Palm, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, jr.

Mrs. Edwin L. Patterson, Mrs. Andrew J. Perry, Mrs. Frederick O. Pierce, Mrs. F. Eugene Pitkin, Mrs. Frederick B. Pratt, Mrs. George D. Pratt, Mrs. Russell Prentiss, Mrs. George A. Price, Mrs. Julius E. Prior, Miss Fay Randall, Mrs. William Ray, Mrs. Frederick Rawolle, Miss Sarah J. Read, Mrs. Lydia T. Redling, Mrs. William C. Redfield, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Mrs. Clarence H. Riggs, Miss Rose, Mrs. Frederick Rose, Mrs. Gulian Ross, Mrs. Marwin Rushmore, Mrs. James T. Russell, Mrs. Philip Ruxton, Mrs. J. Sidney Sampson, Mrs. Charles A. Schieren, Mrs. C. W. Seamans, Mrs. J. P. Seymour, Mrs. Henry K. Sheldon, Mrs. Harry Rowe Shelley, Mrs. Charles Shepard, Mrs. George H. Southard, Mrs. William A. Spelman, Mrs. George A. Stanton, Mrs. Hiram R. Steele, Mrs. Arthur G. Stone, Mrs. Joseph Suplee, Mrs. Stephen B. Sturges, Mrs. Alden S. Swan, Mrs. Edwin A. Sweet, Miss Margaret J. Thayer, Mrs. David Thornton, Mrs. John E. Tousey, Mrs. Alexander B. Trowbridge, Mrs. W. M. Tuttle, Mrs. Jerome P. Uptegrove, Mrs. J. P. Warbasse, Mrs. Mary B. Wardell, Mrs. Samuel R. Weed, Mrs. Henri Werlemann, Mrs. Frederick Wesson, Mrs. Alfred T. White, Mrs. C. C. Whitney, Mrs. John O. Williams, Mrs. Alfred F. Wise, Mrs. Henry Hayes Wood, Mrs. Walter C. Wood, Mrs. R. H. Woodman, Mrs. Richard Young and Mrs. William Ziegler.

[34]

From NEW YORK SUN
Address
Date OCT 27 1907

Visiting pianist No. 2 will be Mark Hambourg, who will give his first recital at Mendelssohn Hall on the afternoon of November 1. He will play Beethoven's sonata, opus 55, the Brahms variations on a theme by that harmonious blacksmith, Handel, the usual entrée of Chopin delicatessen, a "Rhapsodie Etude" by Joseph Holbrooke, Hambourg's "Folkslied" and a paraphrase on themes from Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin," by one Pabst.

Visiting pianist No. 3, Mr. Paderewski, will give his first New York recital at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. His second recital is announced for November 23, and his only appearance with orchestra for December 7, when he will be the soloist at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall. The house for the first recital is already nearly sold out.

From
Address
Date

Among the orchestras, that of Boston will follow New York's namesake at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 7, playing Bach, Beethoven and a Bruckner symphony No. 9. A double symphony matinée bill pairs Mozart's G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral." Mr. Altschuler's Russians on Nov. 14 play Glazunow's symphony No. 8, composed during the troubles in St. Petersburg. Mr. Safonoff has cabled to amend the opening Philharmonic bill that week by adding Grieg's "Peer Gynt." Later, the Volpe Orchestra of ninety-five men will open a fourth season on Nov. 21. Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony give on Nov. 23 the first of five matinées in Brooklyn.

From
Address
Date

The stock market seems to have had no effect whatever on the subscription sale of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which has been going on for the last two weeks at Carnegie Hall. The sale for Thursday nights is even larger than it was last year, and for Saturday afternoon it is about the same. The first pair of concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 7, and Saturday afternoon, November 9, respectively. There will be no soloist. On Thursday night the programme will be Bruckner's Ninth Symphony (unfinished); Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Beethoven's Overture Leonore No. 1. The programme for Saturday afternoon will consist of two symphonies: Mozart's in G minor (K. 550) and Beethoven's Pastoral.

From
Address OCT 26 1907
Date

An interesting novelty, Bruckner's ninth symphony, which its composer did not live to finish, will be played at the first of the season's Carnegie Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A Bach suite and Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture will also be heard. The programme for the following Saturday afternoon will include a Mozart symphony and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

From
Address
Date

As an indication of the steadily increasing interest in this city in music of the best, it is said that the subscription sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the largest in many years. The first concert will be on Monday evening, November 4. There will be no soloist. The feature of the programme will be d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein." Other numbers will be Bach's Suite in D Major and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 1.

From NEW YORK CITY
Address
Date OCT - 1907

WORLD RENOWNED ARTISTS TO APPEAR AT BROOKLYN INSTITUTE.

That great association of Brooklynites known as the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences announces through its department of music, a series of concerts, for the forthcoming season, heretofore unparalleled in the history of this city.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Carl Muck, will give a series of concerts. Ignace Jan Paderewski, Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mme. Schumann-Heink, David Bispham, Miss Bessie Collier, Mme. Sembrich, Mme. Gadski, Francis Rogers, Mme. Corinne Rider Kelsey, Miss Janet Spencer, Edward Johnson, Frederick Martin, Mme. Hissem de Moss, Miss Cecilia Winter, Kelly Cole, Charles W. Clark, Josef Hofmann, Fritz Kreisler, Jan Kubelik, Vladimir de Pachmann, Katherine Goodson, and Mark Hambourg are some of the artists that will appear this season.

The New York Symphony Orchestra will give a series of concerts under the leadership of Walter Damrosch. The orchestra will be assisted by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Emilio de Gogorza and other soloists.

HARRY ROWE SHILLEY

Chamber music concerts will also be given by the Adamowski Trio, the Olive Mead Quartet and the Anna Otten Quartet.

The Brooklyn Oratorio Society will give two concerts; the Arion Singing Society, one concert. The total number of concerts of the first class will be thirty-five, or an average of one a week through the season.

The first Kneisel String Quartet concert will be in memory of Joseph Joachim, who passed away during last summer, and while no word will be spoken at this commemorative concert, the playing by the quartet will no doubt be as impressive as any address that might be written.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From BALTIMORE, MD
Address
Date OCT 26 1907

FIRST BOSTON CONCERT.

Programme Of Boston Symphony For The Opening.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 6. The subscription sale, which has been in progress for the last week, shows a gratifying increase over that of last year, which was the best the Orchestra ever had in Baltimore. There will be no soloist at the first concert, but Dr. Muck has arranged an extremely interesting programme. The first two numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major and Beethoven's overture ("Leonore")- No. 1. The most important item will be a work which is new to Baltimore, d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein," which had its first Boston performances on the 18th and 19th and met with great success.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 27 1907

New York is to hear no fewer than 74 orchestral concerts during the coming season. This does not include the Sunday concerts. The Philharmonic Society will give 16 concerts, the Symphony Society of the Boston Symphony 10, the Russian Symphony six, the People's Symphony [illegible] each by Franko's American Orchestra and the Volpe Orchestra.

Address BALTIMORE, MD
Date OCT 27 1907

THE musical season is fairly on again in Baltimore, the schools are all open and the concerts are about to begin. The Boston Symphony Orchestra presents three great soloists—Paderewski and Carreno as its pianists and Madam Melba as the unrivaled soprano. At the first Boston concert there will be no soloist, as it is designed to accustom the musical public of this city to find sufficient musical entertainment in the program of the orchestra itself.

All conductors feel that there is a kind of injustice done to an orchestra when a great band of 90 musicians is cast into the shadow by the warblings of a single soloist. The members of the orchestra must all be good musicians, or they could not hold their places, or be able to play together as if they were one great personal instrument, a musical body moved and animated by one musical soul. But a soloist may be not at all a good musician; she may even sing almost by note, and hardly be able to read a note. Many vocalists have shown remarkable, even phenomenal, voices without being able to comprehend their own singing except "by ear." They are almost literally "voice and nothing else." Still they get high prices, because they are able to draw crowds and arouse enthusiasm, and so to make up the salaries of the real musicians, who are honest and conscientious and yet earn but a few dollars a week.

In a concert by a great orchestra the band itself ought to be the attraction; and the most musical people prefer purely concerted music, either by voices or the band, to the very best soloists. In a perfect orchestra, the conductor is himself the soloist, and the orchestra a kind of larger human body, animated, as well as dominated, by the conductor's spirit. Under this view Mr. Muck himself will be the soloist of the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for this season. The entire program may be looked upon as "his piece." When soloists are permitted, their tastes have to be considered, and often their musical whims must be put up with, even to the spoiling of a concert. But when there is no single piece soloist, the conductor can have his own uninterrupted way, and can present exactly the sort of program he may like.

Still, the conductor may feel himself hampered by a perception of the taste, or grade of culture of his audience. The novelty that charms a worn or wearied leader, as being out of the ordinary way, may fall flat with auditors because the work is unfamiliar, and they are unable to take in its real beauty at a first, or even after several hearings, just as the leader, himself, is obliged to have in his study and rehearsal.

It is hard to make ideal conditions in this world, and the comparative degree of success of the first Boston concert for this season will be watched with interest.

The course of Peabody recitals for this season is one of unusual excellence. By a happy combination with the Kneisel Quartet, an almost unbroken series of good musical attractions will follow each other on successive Friday afternoons from the beginning to the end of the musical year. Among the bright, particular stars, will be Mr. David Bispham and Senor Gogorza, barytones; Mr. Wad and Mr. Hutcheson, in solo piano recitals, and Mr. Randolph, with the Kneisel Quartet, and in a two-piano recital with Mr. Hutcheson. There are 19 musical performances, in all, to take place at the regularly established hour, 4 o'clock, on Friday afternoons.

Ignace Jan Paderewski.

"The most commanding individuality among virtuosos since the death of Paganini is beyond doubt or peradventure Ignace Jan Paderewski," who gives a recital at the Lyric next Tuesday evening. Such is the dictum of the distinguished music critic, Philip Hale, of Boston, and it is one which cannot be disputed. In the 20 years that Paderewski has been before the world as a pianist he has held a place in the affections of the public that is without parallel in the history of music. Paganini has become a tradition, and about his life already a myth has formed; yet, even granting that he was all that legendmakers would have him, the public he appealed to was very small as compared with that which has listened to Paderewski play. Europe alone knew Paganini, while the Polish pianist has not only played in all countries of Europe, but has also conquered the United States, Canada, Mexico and Australia.

The program will embrace two pieces of his own composition in variations and fugue Op. 23.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 6. The subscription sale which has been in progress for the last week shows a gratifying increase over that of last year, which was the best the orchestra ever had in Baltimore. There will be no soloist at the first concert, but Dr. Muck has arranged an extremely interesting program. The first two numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 1. The most important item will be a work which is new to Baltimore, d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein," which had its first Boston uerformances on October 18 and 19, and met with great success.

Seats for the concert are now on sale at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street.

From RECORD
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 27 1907

The first of this season's series of Monday evening orchestral pipe organ recitals will be held at the Estey warerooms, No. 1118 Chestnut street, to-morrow evening. On this occasion several of the numbers played at this season's first concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra will be reproduced, among them Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony" and the overture from "Tannhaeuser." It will be a feature of these recitals to reproduce as nearly as possible the works offered by the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras at their concerts. In addition to the numbers mentioned, Schubert's "Military March" will be play, and for the piano, Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12," and "Dornoeschen," by Bendel. F. G. Riggins, baritone, will sing "The Tourney of King John," by Saint-Saens, and "Awake, Beloved," by Cowen. The recitals are entirely free to the public.

From INQUIRER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date OCT 27 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The subscription sale for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, which has been going on for the past two weeks, is the best the orchestra has had in Philadelphia for several years, and shows a great increase over the sale of last year, which, in its turn, was an improvement over the year before. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4. There will be no soloist, and the important item on the program will be a work in which, although it is not new, will be a novelty in this city, d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein." It had its first performances in Boston on October 18 and 19, and was received with much enthusiasm. The other numbers will be Bach's Suite in D Major and Beethoven's Overture, Leonore No. 1

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The Most Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date OCT 27 1907

Paderewski's Tour Begins.

Paderewski's American tour will begin tomorrow night at Bridgeport, Conn. On his program are two of his own compositions, new to this country—a sonata in E flat minor, and a set of variations and fugue on an original theme.

The Mendelssohn Club will give two choral concerts this season—on January 23 and April 8, 1908. Brahms' "Requiem" will be sung in January, and Elgar's "King Olaf" at the second concert.

At the Boston Orchestra's opening concert in the Academy of Music, November 4, D'Indy's symphonic melody, "Wallensteine," is to be played—the first time in Philadelphia. Other numbers will be Bach's suite in D major and the Leonore No. 1 overture.

An organ recital by Pennsylvania College of Music players is to be given at the church, 1511 Girard avenue, Tuesday evening next.

F. G. Riggins, barytone, is to be soloist at the first free Estey pipe organ concert of the season in the Estey warerooms tomorrow at 8.15 P. M. A new feature of these recitals is to be the reproduction, as far as possible, of works from Philadelphia and Boston Orchestra programs.

From NEWS
Address NEWARK, N.J.
Date OCT 28 1907

IMPORTANT MUSICAL EVENTS.

A Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Paderewski Recital.

As a result of contracts entered into this morning by Charles Ellis, business manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Frederick N. Sommer, of this city, the famous orchestral organization from the Hub will give a concert in the Krueger Auditorium Monday night, December 9, and Ignace Jan Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, will give a recital in the same hall Tuesday night, December 17.

The Boston Symphony comprises ninety-seven musicians, all of whom rank among the musical virtuosi, and its conductor is Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of living musical directors, who was brought from Berlin a year ago to succeed William Gerick as the leader of the orchestra. The coming concert will be the first to be given by the Boston organization in this city, and will be the most important event marking the local musical season. Mr. Paderewski, who begins his tour in Bridgeport, Conn., to-night, has added many admirable compositions to his repertoire since his last appearance here, and the program arranged for his coming recital will contain several interesting novelties.

From ROCKE
NEW YORK CI
Address
Date OCT - 1907

WORLD RENOWNED ARTISTS TO APPEAR AT BROOKLYN INSTITUTE.

That great association of Brooklynites known as the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences announces through its department of music, a series of concerts, for the forthcoming season, heretofore unparalleled in the history of this city.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Carl Muck, will give a series of concerts. Ignace Jan Paderewski, Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mme. Schumann-Heink, David Bispham, Miss Bessie Collier, Mme. Sembrich, Mme. Gadski, Francis Rogers, Mme. Corinne Rider Kelsey, Miss Janet Spencer, Edward Johnson, Frederick Martin, Mme. Hissem de Moss, Miss Cecilia Winter, Kelly Cole, Charles W. Clark, Josef Hofmann, Fritz Kreisler, Jan Kubelik, Vladimir de Pachmann, Katherine Goodson, and Mark Hambourg are some of the artists that will appear this season.

The New York Symphony Orchestra will give a series of concerts under the leadership of Walter Damrosch. The orchestra will be assisted by Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Emilio de Gogorza and other soloists.

HARRY ROWE SHILLEY

Chamber music concerts will also be given by the Adamowski Trio, the Olive Mead Quartet and the Anna Otten Quartet.

The Brooklyn Oratorio Society will give two concerts; the Arion Singing Society, one concert. The total number of concerts of the first class will be thirty-five, or an average of one a week through the season.

The first Kneisel String Quartet concert will be in memory of Joseph Joachim, who passed away during last summer, and while no word will be spoken at this commemorative concert, the playing by the quartet will no doubt be as impressive as any address that might be written.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

FIRST BOSTON CONCERT.

Programme Of Boston Symphony For The Opening.

Estab. The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 6. The subscription sale, which has been in progress for the last week, shows a gratifying increase over that of last year, which was the best the Orchestra ever had in Baltimore. There will be no soloist at the first concert, but Dr. Muck has arranged an extremely interesting programme. The first two numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major and Beethoven's overture ("Leonore") No. 1. The most important item will be a work which is new to Baltimore, D'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein," which had its first Boston performances on the 18th and 19th and met with great success. 1884

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date

New York is to hear no fewer than 74 orchestral concerts during the coming season. This does not include the Sunday concerts. The Philharmonic Society will give 16 concerts, the Symphony Society 28, the Boston Symphony 10, the Russian Symphony six, the People's Symphony eight, and three each by Franko's American Orchestra and the Volpe Orchestra.

Es 1884

From
Address
Date OCT 27 1907

THE musical season is fairly on again in Baltimore, the schools are all open and the concerts are about to begin. The Boston Symphony Orchestra presents three great soloists—Paderewski and Carreno as its pianists and Madam Melba as the unrivaled soprano. At the first Boston concert there will be no soloist, as it is designed to accustom the musical public of this city to find sufficient musical entertainment in the program of the orchestra itself.

All conductors feel that there is a kind of injustice done to an orchestra when a great band of 90 musicians is cast into the shadow by the warblings of a single soloist. The members of the orchestra must all be good musicians, or they could not hold their places, or be able to play together as if they were one great personal instrument, a musical body moved and animated by one musical soul. But a soloist may be not at all a good musician; she may even sing almost by note, and hardly be able to read a note. Many vocalists have shown remarkable, even phenomenal, voices without being able to comprehend their own singing except "by ear." They are almost literally "voice and nothing else." Still they get high prices, because they are able to draw crowds and arouse enthusiasm, and so to make up the salaries of the real musicians, who are honest and conscientious and yet earn but a few dollars a week.

In a concert by a great orchestra the band itself ought to be the attraction; and the most musical people prefer purely concerted music, either by voices or the band, to the very best soloists. In a perfect orchestra, the conductor is himself the soloist, and the orchestra a kind of larger human body, animated, as well as dominated, by the conductor's spirit. Under this view Mr. Muck himself will be the soloist of the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for this season. The entire program may be looked upon as "his piece." When soloists are permitted, their tastes have to be considered, and often their musical whims must be put up with, even to the spoiling of a concert. But when there is no single piece soloist, the conductor can have his own uninterrupted way, and can present exactly the sort of program he may like.

Still, the conductor may feel himself hampered by a perception of the taste, or grade of culture of his audience. The novelty that charms a worn or wearied leader, as being out of the ordinary way, may fall flat with auditors because the work is unfamiliar, and they are unable to take in its real beauty at a first, or even after several hearings, just as the leader, himself, is obliged to have in his study and rehearsal.

It is hard to make ideal conditions in this world, and the comparative degree of success of the first Boston concert for this season will be watched with interest.

The course of Peabody recitals for this season is one of unusual excellence. By a happy combination with the Kneisel Quartet, an almost unbroken series of good musical attractions will follow each other on successive Friday afternoons from the beginning to the end of the musical year. Among the bright, particular stars, will be Mr. David Bispham and Senor Gogorza, barytones; Mr. Wad and Mr. Hutcheson, in solo piano recitals, and Mr. Randolph, with the Kneisel Quartet, and in a two-piano recital with Mr. Hutcheson. There are 19 musical performances, in all, to take place at the regularly established hour, 4 o'clock, on Friday afternoons.

Ignace Jan Paderewski.

"The most commanding individuality among virtuosos since the death of Paganini is beyond doubt or peradventure Ignace Jan Paderewski," who gives a recital at the Lyric next Tuesday evening. Such is the dictum of the distinguished music critic, Philip Hale, of Boston, and it is one which cannot be disputed. In the 20 years that Paderewski has been before the world as a pianist he has held a place in the affections of the public that is without parallel in the history of music. Paganini has become a tradition, and about his life already a myth has formed; yet, even granting that he was all that legendmakers would have him, the public he appealed to was very small as compared with that which has listened to Paderewski play. Europe alone knew Paganini, while the Polish pianist has not only played in all countries of Europe, but has also conquered the United States, Canada, Mexico and Australia.

The program will embrace two pieces of his own composition in variations and fugue Op. 23.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 6. The subscription sale which has been in progress for the last week shows a gratifying increase over that of last year, which was the best the orchestra ever had in Baltimore. There will be no soloist at the first concert, but Dr. Muck has arranged an extremely interesting program. The first two numbers will be Bach's Suite in D major and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 1. The most important item will be a work which is new to Baltimore,, d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein," which had its first Boston performances on October 18 and 19, and met with great success.

Seats for the concert are now on sale at Albaugh's ticket office, 109 North Charles street.

From RECORD
Address
Date OCT 27 1907

—The first of this season's series of Monday evening orchestral pipe organ recitals will be held at the Estey warerooms, No. 1118 Chestnut street, to-morrow evening. On this occasion several of the numbers played at this season's first concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra will be reproduced, among them Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony" and the overture from "Tannhaeuser." It will be a feature of these recitals to reproduce as nearly as possible the works offered by the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras at their concerts. In addition to the numbers mentioned, Schubert's "Military March" will be play, and for the piano, Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12," and "Dornoeschen," by Bendel. F. G. Riggins, baritone, will sing "The Tourney of King John," by Saint-Saens, and "Awake, Beloved," by Cowen. The recitals are entirely free to the public.

Estabi 1884

From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The subscription sale for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, which has been going on for the past two weeks, is the best the orchestra has had in Philadelphia for several years, and shows a great increase over the sale of last year, which, in its turn, was an improvement over the year before. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4. There will be no soloist, and the important item on the program will be a work in which, although it is not new, will be a novelty in this city, d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein." It had its first performances in Boston on October 18 and 19, and was received with much enthusiasm. The other numbers will be Bach's Suite in D Major and Beethoven's Overture, Leonore No. 1

Es , 1884

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

Paderewski's Tour Begins.

Paderewski's American tour will begin tomorrow night at Bridgeport, Conn. On his program are two of his own compositions, new to this country—a sonata in E flat minor, and a set of variations and fugue on an original theme.

Esta 1884

The Mendelssohn Club will give two choral concerts this season—on January 23 and April 9, 1908. Brahms' "Requiem" will be sung in January, and Elgar's "King Olaf" at the second concert.

At the Boston Orchestra's opening concert in the Academy of Music, November 4, D'Indy's symphonic melody, "Wallensteine," is to be played—the first time in Philadelphia. Other numbers will be Bach's suite in D major and the Leonore No. 1 overture.

An organ recital by Pennsylvania College of Music players is to be given at the church, 1511 Girard avenue, Tuesday evening next.

F. G. Riggins, barytone, is to be soloist at the first free Estey pipe organ concert of the season in the Estey warerooms tomorrow at 8.15 P. M. A new feature of these recitals is to be the reproduction, as far as possible, of works from Philadelphia and Boston Orchestra programs.

From NEWS
Address NEWARK, N.J.
Date OCT 28 1907

IMPORTANT MUSICAL EVENTS.

A Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a Paderewski Recital.

Esta 1884

As a result of contracts entered into this morning by Charles Ellis, business manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Frederick N. Sommer, of this city, the famous orchestral organization from the Hub will give a concert in the Krueger Auditorium Monday night, December 9, and Ignace Jan Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, will give a recital in the same hall Tuesday night, December 17.

The Boston Symphony comprises ninety-seven musicians, all of whom rank among the musical virtuosi, and its conductor is Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of living musical directors, who was brought from Berlin a year ago to succeed William Gerick as the leader of the orchestra. The coming concert will be the first to be given by the Boston organization in this city, and will be the most important event marking the local musical season. Mr. Paderewski, who begins his tour in Bridgeport, Conn., to-night, has added many admirable compositions to his repertoire since his last appearance here, and the program arranged for his coming recital will contain several interesting novelties.

From Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date OCT 30 1907

Musical Notes.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail, more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the Orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips has been cut down entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford, and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these regular concerts the usual two Pension Fund concerts will be given in Boston.

Estab 1884

From STAR
Address NEWARK N.J.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT HERE.

Famous Orchestral Body Will Play December 9 Under Dr. Muck—Paderewski Here December 17.

Negotiations were closed today for the appearance here on the night of December 9, at Krueger's Auditorium, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is director. This will be one of the most important events of the music season this year. The famous orchestra has never before appeared here. The Boston Symphony stands as the highest and best in orchestral music in this country. Frederick N. Sommer, of this city, has the local management.

Paderewski will give a recital here at the same place on the night of December 17. He begins his tour tonight at Bridgeport, Conn. Mr. Sommer is also responsible for his appearance here.

Estab 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau, In the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA PA
Date OCT 27 1907

The subscription sale for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, which has been going on for the past two weeks, is the best the orchestra has had in Philadelphia for several years, and shows a great increase over the sale of last year, which in its turn was an improvement over the year before. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4. There will be no soloist and the important item on the programme will be a work which, although it is not new, will be a novelty in this city, d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein." It had its first performances in Boston on October 18 and 19, and was received with much enthusiasm. The other numbers will be Bach's Suite in D Major and Beethoven's Overture, Leonore, No. 1.

Established 1884

From Philadelphia RECORD
Address
Date OCT 27 1907

The subscription sale for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, which has been going on for the past two weeks, is reported to be the best the orchestra has had in Philadelphia for several years. The first concert will be given on Monday evening of next week. There will be no soloist and the important item on the program will be a work which, although it is not new, will be a novelty in this city—d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein." It had its first performances in Boston on October 18 and 19 and was received with much enthusiasm. The other numbers wil be Bach's Suite in D major and Beethoven's Overture Leonore No. 1.

Established 1884

From WASHINGTON, D. C.
Date OCT 27 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in Washington with its first concert in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 5, and it starts its series with the house practically sold out by subscription. As already announced, there will be no soloist at the first concert. Dr. Muck has arranged a particularly delightful program, which comprises Schumann's overture "Genoveva;" Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, known as the "Scotch" Symphony.

Established 1884

From PRESS
Address PHILADELPHIA, Pa.
Date OCT 27 1907

The subscription sale for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, which has been going on for the past two weeks, is the best the orchestra has had in Philadelphia for several years and shows a great increase over the sale of last year, which in its turn was an improvement over the year before. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4. There will be no soloist and the important item on the program will be a work which, although it is not new, will be a novelty in this city—d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein." It had its first performances in Boston on October 18 and 19, and was received with much enthusiasm. The other numbers will be Bach's Suite in D Major and Beethoven's Overture Leonore No. 1.

From POST
Address
Date OCT 27 1907

The programme for the first Boston Symphony concert will comprise Schuman's overture, "Genoveva," Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, known as the "Scotch" symphony.

Established 1884

The Philadelphia Orchestra has already given four very successful concerts in Philadelphia under the new director, Pohlig. The programmes of the first pair was composed of Beethoven numbers (the overtures "Fidelio" and "Leonore No. 3," and the fifth symphony), and of Wagner selections; "Meistersinger" overture, "Siegfried Idyll," and overture "Tannhauser." The second concerts were devoted to Weber's overture "Oberon," Liszt's concerto in E flat, Hambourg; Haydn's G major symphony, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

From
Address WASHINGTON, D. C.
Date OCT 27 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in Washington with its first concert in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 5.

As already announced, there will be no soloist at the first concert. Dr. Muck has arranged a particularly delightful programme, which comprises Schumann's overture, "Genoveva;" Bach's suite, in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and Mendelssohn's symphony, in A minor, known as the Scotch Symphony.

Established

From RECORD
Address PHILADELPHIA, Pa.
Date OCT 27 1907

—Marie Nichols, who is accounted one of the best of American women violinists, secured her first opportunity to put her artistic ability to a serious test when she accompanied the Boston Orchestra on tour in 1901. The following year she went abroad, and, without using her letters of introduction, became a pupil of Halir. In Berlin and London she made a deep impression, and on her return to her own country achieved a series of pronounced successes. Miss Nichols will tour again this season with Clara Clemens, "Mark Twain's" daughter, who has recently entered the concert field.

rk, 1884

From TIMES
Address Washington, D. C.
Date OCT 27 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in Washington with its first concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, November 5, and it starts its work here with the house practically sold out by subscription. Dr. Muck has arranged a particularly delightful program, which comprises Schumann's overture, "Genoveva;" Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, known as the "Scotch" symphony.

Established

[36]

From Theatre
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date 1907

Then, to abandon the opera stage for the concert platform, there is a welter of orchestral concerts that is amazing in its promise. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck at its head, is to visit us for ten concerts, while the native Philharmonic Society is to give sixteen concerts of its own under the baton-less batonist Safonoff. Walter Damrosch, conducting the New York Symphony Orchestra, will appear before his audiences often, and Franz X. Arens will conduct his educational concerts for wage-earners and will thus spread the gospel of music among the more lowly in purse. The Russian Symphony Society is again in the field and its leader, Modest Altschuler, announces rousing novelties from the land of the Czar. Then there will be the Symphony Concerts for Young People, conducted by Frank Damrosch, the Musical Art Society and the Oratorio Society. These are present groups of concerts, while the single orchestral affairs will be without number.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1907.

The fourth symphony programme, which wil be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, will present Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist, and the works she has chosen to sing are rather out of the ordinary and more than usually interesting. She will sing three of Schubert's great songs with orchestra. The first will be "The Young Nun," which was orchestrated by Franz Liszt. The second will be "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottl. The third will be the "Earl King," orchestrated by Berlioz. The symphony will be Bruckner's ninth, the one which he left unfinished. The other number will be Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 1.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 27, 1907.

Carl Wendling Soloist at the Symphony.

Olga Samaroff and Leland Hall to Give Recitals This Week.

Handel and Haydn Fund —Current Gossip.

The third Symphony program introduced as soloist Mr Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra, in Brahms' D-major concerto for violin and orchestra. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony completed the program. The Brahms number is not specially popular with violinists, for it is not a show piece, despite its brilliant passage work in the final movement, and it appeals mainly to the artist of serious purpose rather than to the performer whose dazzling technique must be given plenty of latitude for display. And Mr Wendling appears to be an earnest, skilled and modest exponent of the composer's intent, and in his interpretation of the Brahams piece be shown great delicacy of expression, fine technical equipment and a quality of tone that, while not big, was sweet and appealing.

The unaccompanied cadenza was deftly executed. The second movement lacked in sonority of tone in the forte parts, but the melodies were very sweetly sung. In the demands of the third movement Mr Wendling's execution was sufficient to surmount all difficulties of bowing and fingering, and this part of his work gave special delight to his auditors, who recalled him several times at the conclusion of his playing.

The somber "Genoveva" music is quite familiar to patrons of these concerts, and as Dr Muck introduced no radical departure from the usual interpretation Schumann's somewhat heavy composition may be considered as having been well performed in traditional style. The hunting calls by the horns and the delightful themes given the wood winds were some of the enlivening episodes that deserve mention.

The orchestra played admirably all the concerto music, although at times a diminution in volume of tone would have been better for the soloist. The "Scotch" symphony was given without a long break between the movements, but the welding together of the four parts did not seem to make the work unduly extended, for the performance was spirited, generally smooth in ensemble and of a character calculated to arouse enthusiasm.

Of course the "Scotch" atmosphere of the trippingly quaint second and fourth parts was, as usual, the best appreciated. And the clarinets and other woodwinds did their work splendidly in the dance measures. In the finale the well-known staccato measures for horns, violas and bassoons were given with resonant and well-contrasted effect and the close of the movement, with the possible exception of too much stress in the brass group, went with commendable vigor and precision.

This week's program will present Mme Schumann-Heink as soloist. She will sing three of Schubert's great songs, "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Franz Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottl; "Earl King," orchestrated by [illegible] selections will be Bruckner's [illegible]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT. OCTOBER 31, 1907

[illegible]anz's recital, postponed from Monday, has now been definitely set for Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, in Chickering Hall—the day after he plays at the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet. His programme remains the unusual and exceptionally interesting list of pieces, like Liszt's "First Year of Pilgrimage," Ravel's "Oiseaux Tristes" and Alkan's "The Railroad," already announced in this column.

In Mr. Gericke's days as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, the violin players, first and second, bowed as nearly uniformly as possible. Mr. Gericke was not the martinet on this score that some of the elder conductors—Theodore Thomas, for example—were; but he liked the bowing to be as uniform as the men could conveniently make it, and he accustomed the eyes of his audiences to the sight of the bows rising and falling symmetrically over the thirty violins. Now Dr. Muck, like most of the younger conductors, cares nothing for this uniformity. The violinists may bow as they please, so long as they get the results that he desires. The change in their methods has been particularly obvious this season, and it has provoked more or less comment. Here, accordingly, is Dr. Muck's statement of his faith in the matter: "I do not want my violins to bow together. When they do, it is beautiful to see, but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone, and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. The men are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion."

Miss Bessie Abott's "operatic concert" announced for Tuesday evening, Nov. 12, at Symphony Hall, has been postponed, and probably abandoned. Miss Abott is a skilful, interesting and promising singer, but as yet she has hardly gained reputation enough in the Metropolitan Opera House to make her widely known outside its public and in Boston, "operatic concerts" [illegible] undoes there is

BOSTON EVENING RECORD. OCTOBER 28, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From Mr. Elson's Criticism in the Daily advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Schumann......"Genoveva" Overture
Brahms.....Violin Concerto
Soloist, Mr. Carl Wendling.
Mendelssohn.....Scotch Symphony

It was a rather tepid concert, that of Saturday, with little in any of its numbers that would cause the pulse to beat quicker or any auditor to become wildly enthusiastic. In this it was in strong contrast with that of the preceding week which culminated so thrillingly with the Wagner march. The luke-warm character was not the result of the performance, but of the numbers themselves. Even their orchestral tints were all more or less subdued and there was not [illegible] the modern instrumental brilliance present save in the solo part of the concerto and in the clarinette part of the symphony.

But we have had just these half-tinted works played better, and read better, in preceding concerts. For once Dr. Muck's unity of programme was somewhat monotonous.

Mr. Wendling is evidently a musician from top to toe; his phrasing was [illegible] his intonation without flaw, his double stopping (there is much of this in the work) masterly, but his tone was [illegible] for Symphony Hall. The [illegible] first movement was [illegible] and [illegible]

Standard Union

From ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Address .....

Date ..... OCT 30 1907

Musical Notes.

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail, more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the Orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England for which the orchestra had to make special trips has been cut down entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford, and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these regular concerts the usual two Pension Fund concerts will be given in Boston.

Estab 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERT HERE.

Famous Orchestral Body Will Play December 9 Under Dr. Muck—Paderewski Here December 17.

Negotiations were closed today for the appearance here on the night of December 9, at Krueger's Auditorium, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is director. This will be one of the most important events of the music season this year. The famous orchestra has never before appeared here. The Boston Symphony stands as the highest and best in orchestral music in this country. Frederick N. Sommer, of this city, has the local management.

Paderewski will give a recital here at the same place on the night of December 17. He begins his tour tonight at Bridgeport, Conn. Mr. Sommer is also responsible for his appearance here.

Estab 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The subscription sale for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, which has been going on for the past two weeks, is the best the orchestra has had in Philadelphia for several years, and shows a great increase over the sale of last year, which in its turn was an improvement over the year before. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4. There will be no soloist and the important item on the programme will be a work which, although it is not new, will be a novelty in this city, d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein." It had its first performances in Boston on October 18 and 19, and was received with much enthusiasm. The other numbers will be Bach's Suite in D Major and Beethoven's Overture, Leonore, No. 1.

* * *

From ..... RECORD

Address .....

Date .....

The subscription sale for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, which has been going on for the past two weeks, is reported to be the best the orchestra has had in Philadelphia for several years. The first concert will be given on Monday evening of next week. There will be no soloist and the important item on the program will be a work which, although it is not new, will be a novelty in this city—d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein." It had its first performances in Boston on October 18 and 19 and was received with much enthusiasm. The other numbers wil be Bach's Suite in D major and Beethoven's Overture Leonore No. 1.

* * *

From ..... H. D. C. R.

Address .....

Date ..... OCT 27 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in Washington with its first concert in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 5, and it starts its series with the house practically sold out by subscription. As already announced, there will be no soloist at the first concert. Dr. Muck has arranged a particularly delightful program, which comprises Schumann's overture "Genoveva;" Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, known as the "Scotch" Symphony.

Estab 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The subscription sale for the five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, which has been going on for the past two weeks, is the best the orchestra has had in Philadelphia for several years and shows a great increase over the sale of last year, which in its turn was an improvement over the year before. The first concert will be given on Monday evening, November 4. There will be no soloist and the important item on the program will be a work which, although it is not new, will be a novelty in this city—d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein." It had its first performances in Boston on October 18 and 19, and was received with much enthusiasm. The other numbers will be Bache's Suite in D Major and Beethoven's Overture Leonore No. 1.

* * *

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The programme for the first Boston Symphony concert will comprise Schuman's overture, "Genoveva," Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, known as the "Scotch" symphony.

Estab 1884

The Philadelphia Orchestra has already given four very successful concerts in Philadelphia under the new director, Pohlig. The programmes of the first pair was composed of Beethoven numbers (the overtures "Fidelio" and "Leonore No. 3," and the fifth symphony), and of Wagner selections; "Meistersinger" overture, "Siegfried Idyll," and overture "Tannhauser." The second concerts were devoted to Weber's overture "Oberon," Liszt's concerto in E flat, Hambourg; Haydn's G major symphony, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston ...phony Orchestra will begin its seasc ... Washington with its first concert in ...e New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 5.

As already announced, there will be no soloist at the first concert. Dr. Muck has arranged a particularly delightful programme, which comprises Schumann's overture, "Genoveva;" Bach's suite, in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and Mendelssohn's symphony, in A minor, known as the Scotch Symphony.

Established

From ..... RECORD

Address .....

Date .....

—Marie Nichols, who is accounted one of the best of American women violinists, secured her first opportunity to put her artistic ability to a serious test when she accompanied the Boston Orchestra on tour in 1901. The following year she went abroad, and, without using her letters of introduction, became a pupil of Halir. In Berlin and London she made a deep impression, and on her return to her own country achieved a series of pronounced successes. Miss Nichols will tour again this season with Clara Clemens, Mark Twain's daughter, who has recently entered the concert field.

ork, 1884

From .....

Address .....

Date ..... OCT 27 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in Washington with its first concert in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, November 5, and it starts its work here with the house practically sold out by subscription. Dr. Muck has arranged a particularly delightful program, which comprises Schumann's overture, "Genoveva;" Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, known as the "Scotch" symphony.

Establish

[36]

From ..... Theatre

Address ..... NEW YORK CITY

Date ..... NOV ... 1907

Then, to abandon the opera stage for the concert platform, there is a welter of orchestral concerts that is amazing in its promise. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck at its head, is to visit us for ten concerts, while the native Philharmonic Society is to give sixteen concerts of its own under the baton-less batonist Safonoff. Walter Damrosch, conducting the New York Symphony Orchestra, will appear before his audiences often, and Franz X. Arens will conduct his educational concerts for wage-earners and will thus spread the gospel of music among the more lowly in purse. The Russian Symphony Society is again in the field and its leader, Modest Altschuler, announces rousing novelties from the land of the Czar. Then there will be the Symphony Concerts for Young People, conducted by Frank Damrosch, the Musical Art Society and the Oratorio Society. These are present groups of concerts, while the single orchestral affairs will be without number.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1907.

The fourth symphony programme, which wil be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively, will present Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist, and the works she has chosen to sing are rather out of the ordinary and more than usually interesting. She will sing three of Schubert's great songs with orchestra. The first will be "The Young Nun," which was orchestrated by Franz Liszt. The second will be "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottl. The third will be the "Earl King," orchestrated by Berlioz. The symphony will be Bruckner's ninth, the one which he left unfinished. The other number will be Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 1.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 27, 1907.

Carl Wendling Soloist at the Symphony.

Olga Samaroff and Leland Hall to Give Recitals This Week.

Handel and Haydn Fund —Current Gossip.

The third Symphony program introduced as soloist Mr Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra, in Brahms' D-major concerto for violin and orchestra. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony completed the program. The Brahms number is not specially popular with violinists, for it is not a show piece, despite its brilliant passage work in the final movement, and it appeals mainly to the artist of serious purpose rather than to the performer whose dazzling technique must be given plenty of latitude for display. And Mr Wendling appears to be an earnest, skilled and modest exponent of the composer's intent, and in his interpretation of the Brahams piece be shown great delicacy of expression, fine technical equipment and a quality of tone that, while not big, was sweet and appealing.

The unaccompanied cadenza was deftly executed. The second movement lacked in sonority of tone in the forte parts, but the melodies were very sweetly sung. In the demands of the third movement Mr Wendling's execution was sufficient to surmount all difficulties of bowing and fingering, and this part of his work gave special delight to his auditors, who recalled him several times at the conclusion of his playing.

The somber "Genoveva" music is quite familiar to patrons of these concerts, and as Dr Muck introduced no radical departure from the usual interpretation Schumann's somewhat heavy composition may be considered as having been well performed in traditional style. The hunting calls by the horns and the delightful themes given the wood winds were some of the enlivening episodes that deserve mention.

The orchestra played admirably all the concerto music, although at times a diminution in volume of tone would have been better for the soloist. The "Scotch" symphony was given without a long break between the movements, but the welding together of the four parts did not seem to make the work unduly extended, for the performance was spirited, generally smooth in ensemble and of a character calculated to arouse enthusiasm.

Of course the "Scotch" atmosphere of the trippingly quaint second and fourth parts was, as usual, the best appreciated. And the clarinets and other woodwinds did their work splendidly in the dance measures. In the finale the well-known staccato measures for horns, violas and bassoons were given with resonant and well-contrasted effect and the close of the movement, with the possible exception of too much stress in the brass group, went with commendable vigor and precision.

This week's program will present Mme Schumann-Heink as soloist. She will sing three of Schubert's great songs, "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Franz Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottl, and "The Erlking," orchestrated by Berlioz. The other selections will be Bruckner's ninth symphony, which he left unfinished, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT. OCTOBER 31, 1907

...Ganz's recital, postponed from ... Monday, has now been definitely set for Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 13, in Chickering Hall—the day after he plays at the first concert of the Kneisel Quartet. His programme remains the unusual and exceptionally interesting list of pieces, like Liszt's "First Year of Pilgrimage," Ravel's "Oiseaux Tristes" and Alkan's "The Railroad," already announced in this column.

In Mr. Gericke's days as the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, the violin players, first and second, bowed as nearly uniformly as possible. Mr. Gericke was not the martinet on this score that some of the elder conductors—Theodore Thomas, for example—were; but he liked the bowing to be as uniform as the men could conveniently make it, and he accustomed the eyes of his audiences to the sight of the bows rising and falling symmetrically over the thirty violins. Now Dr. Muck, like most of the younger conductors, cares nothing for this uniformity. The violinists may bow as they please, so long as they get the results that he desires. The change in their methods has been particularly obvious this season, and it has provoked more or less comment. Here, accordingly, is Dr. Muck's statement of his faith in the matter: "I do not want my violins to bow together. When they do, it is beautiful to see, but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone, and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. The men are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion."

Miss Bessie Abott's "operatic concert" announced for Tuesday evening, Nov. 12, at Symphony Hall, has been postponed, and probably abandoned. Miss Abott is a skilful, interesting and promising singer, but as yet she has hardly gained reputation enough in the Metropolitan Opera House to make her widely known outside its public and in Boston, "operatic concerts" ... undess there is ...

BOSTON EVENING RECORD, OCTOBER 28, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From Mr. Elson's Criticism in the Daily advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Schumann.....“Genoveva” Overture
Brahms.....Violin Concerto
Soloist, Mr. Carl Wendling.
Mendelssohn.....Scotch Symphony

It was a rather tepid concert, that of last Saturday, with little in any of its measures that would cause the pulse to beat quicker or any auditor to become wildly enthusiastic. In this it was in strong contrast with that of the preceding week, which culminated so thrillingly with the Wagner march. The luke-warm character was not the result of the performance, but of the numbers themselves, for their orchestral tints were all more or less subdued and there was nothing of the modern instrumental brilliancy present save in the solo part of the concerto and in the clarinette part of the symphony.

But we have had just these neutral tinted works played better, and read better, in preceding concerts. For once Dr. Muck's unity of programme was somewhat monotnous.

Mr. Wendling is evidently a musician from top to toe; his phrasing was sure, his intonation without flaw, his double-stopping (there is much of this in the work) masterly, but his tone was rather light for Symphony Hall. The cadenza of the first movement was filled with embroidery and with double-stopping and had much work in the high positions, but no pizzicato or harmonic work. The ... ness of the artist in high position pass...

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1907

Dr. Muck and Operatic Overtures at the Symphony Concert — Josef Hofmann Gives a Remarkable Recital in New York in Which He Seemed Transformed — Paderewski Returns and Talks of Boston and Other Things—The Amiable Discourse of Mary Garden—Mr. Locke Dramatizes Another Novel—Mr. Ganz's Unusual Programme for His Recital Here—"The Hypocrites" in Boston—Viola Allen Finds a Play by Bernstein—Granville Barker to Come to America

Mr. Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra, was as warmly received at the Symphony concert of Saturday as he had been at that of Friday, but he was hardly so heartily applauded at the end of Brahms's concerto. To the first movement he brought a warmer and more expressive tone than he had summoned on the preceding day, but in other respects his playing left the same impressions that it had already given. In its turn, the audience of Saturday seemed as willing and as capable to listen to Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony without pause, and again Dr. Muck and his men renewed the vitality of the music. Perhaps here and there they over-renewed it. To try to make Mendelssohn in the "Scotch" symphony, or anywhere else, sound big is to make him sound hollow. To remain alive, his music must sound as nearly as possible as he intended it. Otherwise all its defects, especially in our modern ears, are as emphatic as the orchestra was on occasion on Saturday night. On Friday it found and kept the golden mean. On Saturday it seemed to try to make the slow movement a little more songful and the first movement a little more agitated than they really are. To draw out Mendelssohn's cantilena is to thin it and to over-accent his rhythms is to make them a little monotonous.

The opera behind Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" vanished two generations ago, but Dr. Muck played it, as he plays all operatic overtures, as though the curtain was to rise at the end. He gives them always an expectant, a preparatory air, as though they were only foretelling the moods and suggesting the atmosphere that are to come. "Genoveva," the opera, sought feebly enough the shadowy glow that should clothe romance, as it went to poets and composers along the Rhine seventy years ago. Through the shadows, by the same token, should come the horns of returning knights and the glint of their armor as they ride through the forest. Devotion should caress them with its melody, and enter into its triumphant reward. Schumann loved this sort of romance. Sorry stuff as was the text of "Genoveva," he drew such moods and pictures from it and idealized them in the overture. There at least he need think little of those theatrical requirements that so puzzled him. Such romantic glow and depth, such pictorial and chivalrous quality are in the overture, and Dr. Muck gave them their own voice. He and they even made the listener believe that the curtain ought to rise. But when since the fifties has it ever risen on "Genoveva"?

H. T. P.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From JOURNAL

Address

Date

An unusual number of new faces will be seen in the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. The year's leave of absence given to the concert master, Prof. Willy Hess, and the resignation of Mr. Timothee Adamowski will bring two new men to the first violin desk. In Prof. Hess's place will be Karl Wendling, concert master of the Court Theatre of Stuttgart and of the Bayreuth Festival Theatre. In Mr. Adamowski's place will be Julius Thomberg of Copenhagen. The vacancy in the first violins caused by the death of Mr. Arnold Moldauer will be filled by Mr. Theodorowicz, who left the orchestra some seasons ago to join the Kneisel Quartet. A new viola will share the first desk of that section with Mr. Emil Ferir. Mr. Max Zach having resigned to become conductor of the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society. There will be a new bass clarinet in place of Mr. Fritsche, who died last spring, a new bassoon, two new horns, thus giving the orchestra a full complement of eight, and a new tuba. There will be some other minor changes in the string choir.

Estab 1884

From N. Y. EV'G SUN

Address

Date OCT 27 19

Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give their first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week. There will be no soloist. On Thursday they play Bruckner's ninth symphony ("unfinished"), Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and strings, and what Beethoven called his "Leonore" overture No. 1. The matinée will consist of two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral."

Estab 84

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
OCTOBER 27, 1907

BY OLIN DOWNES

At the third Symphony concert of the season the following programme was given:

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann
Violin Concerto in D major.....Brahms
Symphony No. 3, "Scotch," in A minor...
Mendelssohn

Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert meister, was soloist. The Genoveva overture is a characteristically imaginative work, though by no means one of Schumann's strongest. Brahms' concerto shows us the composer in his most tranquil—his enemies would say somnolent—frame of mind. Then Mendelssohn's supremely symmetrical symphony — who could take offence at it? This programme had admirable unity, but it lacked stimulating contrast.

It is hard to conceive of a more appreciative, truly Schumannesque reading of the overture than that given by Dr. Muck on this occasion. The introduction, in particular, was wonderfully played. Each instrument spoke with a supremely appealing voice, and all united in a perfect ensemble to give a peculiar poignancy to those brooding measures. It was a most imaginative and refined interpretation throughout. It might be added that Dr. Muck, with all his objectivism, rarely displays a more acute sense of the intentions of a composer than when conducting a Schumann composition. He is one of the very few who can handle thick and frequently clumsy scores in such a way that we really hear, with our ears as well as our minds, the effects that the composer was striving after.

The nobility of the Brahms concerto becomes more evident with each successive performance. If ever music breathed the exalted peace and the exuberant underlying energy of nature, this work does. Mr. Wendling, who was not always technically secure, interpreted the concerto as an artist feeling the highest reverence toward his art.

His performance was broad, sane and manly; it was also characterized by the utmost fidelity to the spirit of the music. Wendling was heartily applauded as he made his final bow.

The performance of the "Scotch" symphony was a brilliant and traditional one, with the exception of the scherzo, which was taken at an entirely too rapid tempo, with a fine disregard of the direction in the score, "non troppo." This gave rise to several wild scrambles among the horns, though the rest of the orchestra proceeded on their way with joyful virtuosity.

It is true that Mendelssohn was a great man for arpeggios, but in spite of this he did have an idea once in a while. Remarks on the really exquisite beauty of the work would be very trite at this day; but though ultra-moderns may bark, it wil be long before the sheer loveliness of most of this music palls. Even the florid adagio, flowing with a felicitous ease that almost provokes a smile, is very charming, if it is provincial. There is an old fashioned sentimentalism in its lyric measures, a sentimentalism not far from the feelings one might have on taking out some sweet old miniature from a cabinet that still exhales the faint odor of faded rose leaves. Is it entirely to Mendelssohn's discredit that he writes so frankly? Or is it a judgment day crime to compose such a perfect, coherent, inexorably logical opening movement? Let us hope not. True, the finale sounds very thin in these days, and there is a certain smug respectability about the coda which is as the audience's hymn of thanks, "Praise God, now we get out!" All this, and much more! Yet there are very few unprejudiced listeners who will deny that they experience a great deal of fresh pleasure when the Scotch symphony is given, and there can be little question but that the name of now despised Felix Mendelssohn, and his sweet singing, will outlast many of his more ambitious sucessors.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The fourth Symphony programme which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening respectively will present Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist. She will sing three of Schubert's songs with orchestra. The first will be "The Young Nun," which was orchestrated by Franz Liszt. The second will be "Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottlfi The third will be the "Erl King," orchestrated by Berlioz. The symphony will be Bruckner's ninth, the one which he left unfinished. The other number will be Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 1.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MENDELSSOHN, BRAHMS AND A NEW VIOLINIST

Mendelssohn as the Bellini of Symphonists, and a Performance That Made His "Scotch" Symphony Alive Again—The New Concertmaster Makes His Debut as a Solo Violinist

Dr. Muck made his first venture here with a symphony by Mendelssohn, "The Scotch"; Mr. Wendling, the new concert-master of the orchestra, played the solo part in Brahms's concerto for violin—the third year in succession in which it has stood on its programmes; and Schumann's overture that survives from his forgotten opera of "Genoveva" rounded out the afternoon with still another sort of romantic music at the Symphony Concert of yesterday. From beginning to end the audience was interested and pleased and testified to its pleasure. As Mendelssohn wished, and as his first audience of sixty-five years ago resented, the symphony was played without pause, and the four movements fill forty minutes. It is the custom to lament the decay of attention nowadays, and to compare that faculty in audiences of the present day unfavorably with the receptive capacity of our forefathers. Yet there was not a sign of restlessness through the performance of the "Scotch" symphony yesterday and scarcely an audible departure, while Mendelssohn's hearers half a century ago complained bitterly of the tax that the "Scotch" symphony laid upon their attention. Thus did we of 1907 vindicate our feeble selves, and thus did Mendelssohn's design justify itself. until some cynic whisper hinted that his music is mere pastime nowadays, whereas it was a strenuous thing in the fifties; or even that it was Dr. Muck who was reanimating the symphony until it might defy the years that it has lived and the time that it consumes. The obvious retort was the clapping at the end, when usually there is more thought of motors than of finales. Warmer still was the applause of his hearers for Mr. Wendling. Clearly they heard him gladly; clearly they liked the smooth, sure rectitude with which he played the concerto; and clearly the sober but vital beauty with which Dr. Muck, as he has done often with Brahms, was reclothing the music, stirred the listeners recalled Mr. Wendling many times, and his frank pleasure in the cordiality of his new public was as unforced as his playing. The warm romance of Schumann's overture won hearty response as well, and the whole concert, for the first time this season, took an air of easy and spontaneous enjoyment. Even the orchestra had its smiling fun in the sparkling swiftness with which Dr. Muck sped it through the scherzo of the symphony. From first to last, moreover, the men were in form again—their old form and their new. In detail the programme ran:

Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.
Brahms: Concerto in D major, for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 77.
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "The Scotch," Op. 56.

Does Mendelssohn seem a little the Bellini of symphonists nowadays? It is as easy to point mockery and poke disdain at "The Scotch, or "The Italian" or "The Reformation" among symphonies as it is at "Norma" or "Sonnambula" or "Puritani" among operas. And the notion is not wholly fanciful of a certain likeness in aim, quality and achievement in the music of the German and the Sicilian. Each, for example, brought their music to what seems, in these days of jagged tonal edges and broken imaginative suggestion, very complete and rounded expression. Mendelssohn labored long at the "Scotch" Symphony. The fear that his purpose might elude him haunted his mind. Yet heard in 1907, the music seems to accomplish its aim with a persuasive nicety of precision. A week ago, at the Castle Square, the music of "Sonnambula" gave this same impression of suave exactness. Mendelssohn and Bellini were alike fastidious in all they wrote, perhaps to the gentility that is the iconoclasts' contemptuous epithet for them both. Equally they loved the murmur of the delicate, edgeless, perfectly rounded phrase. It is an abiding virtue of their music, and in such elegant perfection is quite half its expressiveness. Each could court at need a pensive and gentle melancholy or a light and sparkling animation. Each was a man of sensibility, as the novelists and essayists liked to say in those days; and their fancies played about little imaginings and moods beside those of "Zarathustra" or "Tristan." Each was a gentleman of an excessively elegant world and wrote as such, and it is not quite clear yet whether that quality is of much worth in music-making. No one much liked to have Wagner about, and to dine with Richard Strauss has been accounted tribulation in Berlin.

Moreover, Mendelssohn with his symphonies and Bellini with his operas are alike in their requirement of very perfect and very sympathetic performance if their music is to keep its characteristic and insinuating qualities. Its polished completeness in its own kind demands as polished and complete an artistry in those that perform it. The orchestra that undertakes "The Scotch" must have the same nice precision in its playing as must the singers in their song when they undertake "Sonnambula." The orchestra must be as capable as the singers of a clear and edgeless tone that shall be suavity, sparkle or gentle brooding. Both must turn the polished and flawless phrase, and both must have an unobtrusive air of delicate fastidiousness. Yet no more in music than in man do these qualities connote dulness, and if a performance of "The Scotch" symphony or of "Sonnambula" is dull, by so much does it lack essential virtues. The sparkle of Mendelssohn's scherzo, for example, in the symphony is playful fancy and light animation themselves, and the finale is more truly spirited than some of the laborious strivings of the hour. Spirit, after all, implies ease. The pensive Mendelssohn or the pensive Bellini is far from dull. Their elegiac phrases have a poetic, even an emotional, accent of their own. Witness the melancholy mood that ebbs and flows through the first movement of "The Scotch" or the mournful note of the cantilena and the shadowy instrumental half-tints in the slow movement. Because Mendelssohn's symphony came to precisely this complete and characteristic performance at the hands of Dr. Muck and his men yesterday it was alive again, and with its own enduring and persuasive life. Mendelssohn no less than Bellini may find his voice—or, rather, voices—sixty years after, and they are ingratiating.

Mr. Wendling's performance of the solo part in Brahms's concerto confirmed him as a skilled violinist, an accomplished musician, an able concert-master, but not a fascinating or a stirring virtuoso. It is as easy to decry the virtuoso, especially in perverse mood, as it is Mendelssohn or Bellini. But the virtuoso in his best estate is such because he has a fascination, an individuality, a transmuting and a rhapsodic quality in his playing that distinguishes him from the accomplished, the musicianly, the altogether sane and sensible violinist or pianist. Now it was precisely these virtuoso traits that, Mr. Wendling's playing lacked. It never quite fascinated, it never quite stirred; it never brought the sense of a penetrating personality. It had duly, surely, and unobtrusively the technical virtues of the skilled violinist; it had as well the finer qualities of the intelligent and the discerning musician. Mr. Wendling's tone was clear, warm, undulating and sensitive. Admirable were his continent understanding and his continent expression of his music. Clearly he would be and often he was the voice of Brahms, but since that voice must speak through the violinist it should take individual color and quality from him. Yet it seldom did. Presumably the music was stirring him with the clear emotion that is in Brahms in spite or because of his sobriety. Yet it was hard to feel it in the playing. The individual, the rhapsodic, the transmuting note that are the marks of the born and practised virtuoso were not in Mr. Wendling. The lack of them makes him the abler concert-master, but the less interesting virtuoso. Dr. Muck had more of them, for again he was calling forth, as he did in the symphony last year, the under-glow and the under-fervor that Brahms, even in a concerto, has in his music.

H. T. P.

/ / + / /

Concerts Next Week

For the second time, at the fourth pair of Symphony Concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, in Symphony Hall, Dr. Muck will prove his own faith, and test his audiences, in the music of Bruckner. It was the composer's seventh symphony that he played last year. Now he has chosen the three completed movements of the ninth symphony (in D minor) upon which he was working at his death. For it, following the example of Beethoven, he designed a choral finale, but he could never bring the design to execution. "I undertook a stiff task," he said. "I should not have done it at my age and in my weak condition. If I never finish it, then my 'Te Deum' may be used as a finale. I have nearly finished three movements. This work belongs to my Lord God." The other orchestral number is the first "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. Between the two Mme. Schumann-Heink, the eminent contralto, who has been too long absent from the Symphony Concerts, will sing three of Schubert's masterpieces — "The Young Nun," as scored for orchestra by Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," as scored by Mottl, and "The Erl-King," as scored by Berlioz—an interesting and rather unusual group, as such things go at the Symphony Concerts.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

THE late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler for having all his violins bow exactly alike, and it certainly was a very beautiful and soothing sight to see the bows of the first violins and the second rise and fall with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Mr. Gericke did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, since the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone, and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow; others with the heel, and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion."

Estab 84

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

AGAIN A WEEK-END OF MANY THINGS

A Symphony Concert with the Orchestra at Its Best—A Note on Paderewski's New Pieces—Kreisler Reappears in New York—Paris Discovers a New Sensation in a Dramatized Earthquake—Miss Abot to Give Her Concert Here—The Dubious Petulances of Geraldine Farrar — Mrs. Campbell Not to Come to Boston?—Other News of the Day

The listeners of Saturday night, at the Symphony concert, received Bruckner's symphony as attentively and much more warmly than did those of Friday afternoon; but they likewise kept their heartiest and most insistent applause for the singing of Mme. Schumann-Heink. Again she richly earned the many recalls that she received, and recalls that were sincere admiration because, under the rules of the concerts, they could bring no extra pieces. More than on Friday, the song of "The Young Nun" seemed to lie beyond the easy range of her voice and to constrain accordingly the expressiveness of her tones. On the other hand, her singing of "Death and the Maiden" was a little masterpiece in the art of song, alike in the quality of her tone, in the leading of the melody, the adjustment of details, the mingled breadth and fineness of her phrasing, and in the impartment of the mood of the music and of the verse. Throughout a perfect continence ennobled very deep emotion. Indeed the impression of austere tragedy that the song and the singing left behind, almost made "The Erlking" seem musical melodrama. Not within memory has Mme. Schumann-Heink sang in Boston with the full and ordered beauty of tone and the large justice of expression that she showed alike on Friday and on Saturday.

It was indeed an evening of notable performances. Even the waste places in Bruckner's symphony almost blossomed under the playing of Dr. Muck and the band. Time and again, the conduetor seemed to begin where the composer had stopped—to bring to full expression what Bruckner believed that he had put into his music, but that he put into it so clumsily, so hiddenly that it needed such penetrating imagination and expressive power as was in Dr. Muck and his men on Saturday to bring it forth. They martialled Bruckner's climaxes to gradual heights with gathering intensity as well as sonority. They masked and smoothed away his awkwardnesses with beauty of tone. They caught and realized the instrumental poignancies that he heard in vision. They maintained the moods that he by himself could not quite maintain. The increased choir of horns, the changes in the strings justified themselves in the shadowy, tremulous foreboding quality of tone that they gained in the long, expectant, mysterious passages that begin the symphony. The new power of the orchestra spoke in the rising flood of tone with which they brought the principal melody to light. It glowed as Bruckner would have it glow. The sheer virtuosity of the band, more elastic now than it has ever been, played through the scherzo until the music seemed a huge, fantastic improvisation. The beginning of the adagio was moving proof of the new expressive quality in the tone of the strings, and the song of the tubas further on was the deep and serene instrumental voice that Bruckner would draw from them. And so on with detail after detail, even to that wonderful flick of string tone, like a red thread, across the darker voices of the wind choir in the first movement. Throughout the playing was of our new orchestra in its best estate, and it was good to have it go so to other cities.

H. T. P.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate its twenty-third season in Philadelphia at the Academy of Music next Monday evening. There will be no soloist, but a very fine programme will be presented.

The chief work, which will be new to Philadelphia, will be Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Philadelphia. The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements, and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled I Piccolomini, is now called Max and Thekla. The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, Wallenstein's Camp, was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888.

The other works on the programme will be Bach's Suite in D major, and Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 1.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
NOVEMBER 4, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner...Symphony in D minor, "Unfinished"
Schubert.....Three Songs with Orchestra
Soloist, Mme. Schuman Heink.
Beethoven.....Leonora Overture, No. 1

Bruckner's unfinished symphony is over one hour long! How long it might have been if he had finished it is one of those "ifs" of musical history which we do not wish to ponder on. There is another "Unfinished" symphony, by a composer who has been accused of extreme length—or "divine length"—which seems excessively brief and very melodic by comparison. But your true modern requires an abundance of room to turn around in.

It used to be an adage that "A little knowledge is a dangerous thing!" We believe that this ought to be inverted for the musical composer. In his case it is great knowledge which often becomes dangerous. In the first and last movements of this symphony Bruckner spins out every conceivable device from its figures and is loath to let any possible transformation go unrecorded. As a consequence some parts of this symphony are so evidently machine-work that they might well be labelled—"Manufactured in Vienna and guaranteed under the Pure Music Act. Contains 1-10 of one per cent of poetic inspiration as a preservative."

For all that there are beautiful oases in the desert, and the work grows upon acquaintance. More than this, it is intelligible and its beauties require no guidebook for their revelation. One finds neither the bombast of Mahler nor the vague restlessness of Reger in its measures. In spite of its prolixity it is a work which we would like to hear again—when we have time.

The splendid reading of Dr. Muck made the work take on new life. The first movement was so heartily applauded that after the conductor had bowed the entire orchestra was allowed to rise in response to the enthusiasm.

But there was no such outburst at the end of the almost endless Adagio. This is considered Bruckner's "swan's song." If it be so we can only add that he died a very lingering death. As a rule we distrust composer's "last thoughts." The work known as "Weber's Last Thought" was not composed by Weber at all, but by Reissiger, while Beethoven's puny "Farewell to the Pianoforte," which is also labelled "his last composition," was a valueless composition in a drawing-room album, and was written long before the composer's death.

There are points of wonderful beauty in the Adagio, but there is also a prolixity that is exasperating, so that one is apt to forget the nobler ideas. But the Scherzo is hearty and genuine. It is grotesque at times, rather than playful, and it has some of the rustic hurly-burly which one finds in Bizet's "Farandole." The Trio is in delicate contrast, however, and the movement is not of the extreme length of the other two parts of the symphony. Had Bruckner only condensed himself a little he would not have been far behind his contemporary and rival,—Brahms; but one only needs to compare the symphony of the next concert (Brahms' D major) with this work, to see what a deadly enemy Bruckner was to himself. Dr. Muck and his orchestra deserve especial thanks for the care with which the work was performed; it was almost a revelation.

But one soloist outweighs an entire orchestra when it comes to exciting the public. We consider Mme. Schumann-Heink one of the greatest of artists, but we do not think that she was at her best in this concert. That, however, made no difference to the general public, and she aroused an applause that was as excessive in its length as the Bruckner symphony. Her best work was done in Schubert's "Young Nun" and "Death and the Maiden." Here the breadth and the contrasts were commendable. We were also much impressed with the quiet, but effective, scoring of the latter song, by Felix Mottl. Schubert thought enough of this song to make it the theme of the slow movement of one of his string quartettes. The beautiful violoncello work in the accompaniment deserves chronicling.

But the "Erl-king" seemed too high for the singer's best tones. At times there was a squeezed quality of voice and an evident effort which we do not associate with the grand work which this artist generally achieves. The coaxing of the Erlking was done in a crisp staccato which did not seem fitting to the words, and robbed the final of its contrast.

"Und bist du nicht willig, so brauch ich Gewalt"

Nevertheless it was quite evident that the audience was not of our way of thinking, for Mme. Schuman-Heink was recalled, with fervor, six distinct and several times.

We found the orchestra rather ragged in the "Leonore, No. 1" overture. They had possibly expended all their effort on Bruckner. We seem to have gained something and lost something in recent months in our symphony concerts. The organization is not of such an astonishing technical excellence as it was. It is no longer "hors concours" in America. There are other bands which today might equal it in ensemble.

We have gained in virility and in freedom of interpretation. Dr. Muck often seizes on the very heart of a composition and reveals it to the audience. The symphony orchestra today is great chiefly through its conductor, but is not supreme in itself any more.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BRUCHNER AGAIN, SCHUBERT AND SCHUMANN-HEINK

Dr. Muck Revives the Unfinished Symphony of the Viennese Composer in a More Successful Venture Than That of Last Year—The Unusual Qualities That Kept the Music Interesting in Spite of the Usual Defects and Limitations—Mme. Schumann-Heink's Singing, Paderewski's and Sembrich's Recital—Other Concerts Next Week

The education of audiences in Bruckner's music makes no faster progress, apparently, in Boston than it does elsewhere. For a decade, at the Symphony Concerts, Mr. Paur Gericke pursued the process fitfully, playing one or another symphony by Bruckner every two years. Dr. Muck is more energetic and persistent. Last winter he put Bruckner's seventh symphony (E major) on one of his programmes, and yesterday he began the afternoon with the three movements that Bruckner completed of a ninth. They are as long, seemingly, as the whole seventh. They continued for a little more than an hour, and the first—let the late-comer beware!—lasts almost thirty minutes. None the less the listeners seemed to hear not only with patience, but with a curiosity that was close to interest, and sometimes to response. The audiences of Friday afternoon have been far more restless at times under some acknowledged masterpiece than they were yesterday under Bruckner's uneven, irritating and debateable symphony. By so much, at least, Dr. Muck may congratulate himself upon the results of his mild crusading for the music of the simple, gentle old man—half the prey of hard circumstance and half unwilling sufferer under his own limitations—whom the conductor in his youth knew and honored. True, the applause at the close of each movement was by no means hearty. Bruckner, however, never mastered the art of unmistakable and inevitable ending. His music only stops. Therefore there was a touch of surprise and unreadiness in each little ripple of applause. Throughout, however, there were no such signs of irritated indifference and impatient weariness as pursued the performance of Bruckner's seventh symphony on a Friday afternoon of last December.

With the coming of Mme. Schumann-Heink, in velvet and plumes that made her look as though she had stepped down from some sumptuous picture, the audience could safely and surely let loose its applause. It welcomed her warmly; it listened with rapt attention; and at the end of the three songs of Schubert that she sang with the orchestra, it recalled her again and again. Her tones were rich, full and warm. She neither exaggerated nor roughened them. The continent surety and roundness of her artistry was not the least part of its mastery. As just and as true was the emotional quality of her singing. The little lyric drama of "The Erlking" is a pitfall of overemphasis, and the musical and the rhapsodical contrasts of "The Young Nun" have their temptations. Sometimes the sheer vigor of Mme. Schumann-Heink's temperament has made her prey to such allurements. Yesterday, she withstood them. Vivid and poignant often, now large and now adroit, was her coloring of her tones, but everywhere the justness of the expression intensified the emotion it would convey. The sombre pity, the darksome tenderness of the music of Death, in "Death and the Maiden," were in her tones. She maintained the mood that Schubert strikes and holds and leads onward and upward into ecstacy in "The Young Nun" and her "Erlking," was piteous legend told and sung, but not acted beyond the just powers of song, in her tones. The vocal and the emotional attributes of her singing were uncommonly even and satisfying in all three of her songs, and she still stands, when exuberance does not lead her astray, in the ripe and ordered richness of matured art. Her songs and the rest of the programme in detail were:

Bruckner: Symphony in D minor, No. 9 (unfinished).
Schubert: "The Young Nun," orchestrated by Franz Liszt.—"Death and the Maiden," orchestrated by Felix Mottl.—"The Erlking," orchestrated by Hector Berlioz.
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore" No. 1, Op. 138.

Bruckner had no aptitude for titles; and he drew his music from no promptings of the other arts that might have given this or that of his symphonies a name. He labelled only one of them—the fourth (in E-flat major), "The Romantic." Yet in the same vein and as plausibly, the old man, struggling against approaching dissolution as he wrote, might have named the ninth "The Mysterious." Perhaps he did so in his cunning way when he put "feierlich" (solemnly mysterious) over the first and the third movements to suggest the mood of each. For once, seemingly, an insistent mood does run through the music, incapable as Bruckner usually is of sustained thought, emotion, construction and expression. And "feierlich" with its mingled implication of mystery and exaltation does suggest it. The very beginning of the symphony summons it; throughout the first movement it recurs now vague and hesitant, often struggling, but again commanding and poignant. Bruckner keeps it as well through the searching dissonances, the queer harmonies the uncanny figuration of the scherzo. Often there, he writes very innocent music. Again he is as wierdly macabre as though he were a youngster in a Paris attic, eager to find a new shiver and so make an audience heed him. Bruckner, however, thought little of audiences and more probably, he was giving conscious or unconscious play to the vein of peasant susceptibility to uncanny and beckoning sounds that, by his birthright was in him. Thus the scherzo strikes its note of fantastic and fitful mystery; while the final adagio summons the note of a mystery that is deep and awesome. It swells into solemnity as of great and shadowy places and then falls away in to a peaceful and tender close—the mood, though it is expressed in sound, of a still and sheltering place. Was the fourth movement that Bruckner never wrote to be of solemn rejoicing?

For once then, in spite of all the stumblings and lapses of the music, a symphony by Bruckner, incomplete indeed, but still substantial, seemed to have sustained and suggestive mood, and the more for such a responsive and communicative performance as it received from Dr. Muck and his men. Certainly, the stumblings and gropings, the lapses and solecisms, the score of irritating shortcomings that usually beset Bruckner's music, seemed fewer and less trying than they did in the symphony that Dr. Muck chose last year. Equally the passages of noble and almost sustained eloquence, like the intense and solemn climaxes of the first movement; of melodic fascination as in some of the meditative moments between those climaxes; of poignant expressiveness, like the beginning of the adagio; of fantastic imagination, as in parts of the scherzo, and of a grave and ideal beauty, as in many an instant of the close—all these are more numerous and significant than were the similar "purple patches" of the seventh symphony. Time and again, the ninth seems to stir an emotional response and to maintain an absorbing mood that appreciably cloak and lessen the familiar weaknesses and limitations. The music has indeed its empty, dull, irrelevant, confused and perverse moments, but they are less vexing and insistent than they sometimes are. The mood of solemn and exalted mystery with which Bruckner often sought to clothe this last symphony was less labored expression than many another to his pure, detached, idealizing spirit. The common peasant voice, the narrow peasant mind speak less frequently in it. The peasant is indeed in the scherzo, but the imaginative and susceptible peasant. The humbly adoring peasant sings in the finale. In both the idealized Bruckner—Bruckner as at moments he could be and not as he usually was—was writing surprisingly much.

And often in the music there was, or there seemed to be, a shadowy, groping dramatic suggestion, that for an instant gained the vividness and the intensity that Bruckner sought, and then faded and wavered again. This suggestion lay not so much in the melodies or in the development or the decoration of them. It lay, rather, in the instrumental coloring, combinations, contrasts and detail. Many are the measures of a singular beauty or poignancy as so much orchestral sound, and Dr. Muck and his men mellowed the one and heightened the other. Almost always at these moments this undertone of dramatic suggestion recurred. Now, it was the ambition of Bruckner to enrich absolute music on its expressive side with the instrumental significance that Wagner gave his music-dramas. The disciple labored to carry into another field a measure of what the reforming master had done in his own. None the less, he may have forgotten that much of the expressiveness of Wagner's orchestra is due to the printed or audible text, the visible and defined characters, the momentary dramatic action that it is emphasizing or illustrating. A symphony can have no such tangible background to heighten and clarify its instrumental expressiveness. Therefore, when Bruckner tried to attain it in his symphonies, while he did gain new euphony, richness, incisiveness and even an occasional thrill, the result was often groping, confused, vague. He was trying to make his instruments dramatic when there was no drama. But in the scoring of the ninth symphony there is evasive dramatic suggestion, and frequently. Before it is half done, the listener is ready to believe that the simple-minded Bruckner, consciously or unconsciously, set his themes to playing out some shadowy drama of his imagination, as does admittedly the highly intellectual d'Indy. In his second symphony d'Indy brings such a drama almost to expression. In his ninth symphony, especially in the instrumentation, Bruckner was groping toward a similar goal. The Parisian is, the Viennese was, an idealist, and so perhaps to both came such pure and disembodied visions.

H. T. P.

Paper Cutting Bureau of the World

BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA P
NOV 2- 1907

Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. Theodore Thomas was a stickler at having all his violins bow exactly alike, and Mr. Gericke used to tell the strings to keep together as well as they possibly could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, however, makes no such requirement. He admits that his method is not so beautiful to look at, "but that," he says, "is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone, and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel, and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow in exactly the same fashion."

BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA P
NOV 2- 1907

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Monday evening will have a program of unusual interest. The principal work which Dr. Muck will present is Vincent D'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein," a work entirely new to Philadelphia. The composer, who is the leader in the modern French school, has drawn his inspiration from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," the "Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and last of the three movements bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D-major and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 1.

[38]

BOSTON
DECEMBER 3, 1907

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT AN EVENT

Interpretation Given of Bruckner's Colossal Symphony.

BY PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 9.....Bruckner
"Young Nun".....Schubert
"Death and the Maiden".....Schubert
"Erl King".....Schubert
Overture, "Leonore, No. 1".....Beethoven

Both the admirers of Bruckner and those that dislike his music lay stress on the fact that he was a born peasant and was essentially a peasant to the day of his death, although the Rector Magnificus of the University of Vienna bowed before him when he presented him with the honorary degree of doctor. The admirers find in Bruckner's peasanthood his strongest characteristics as a composer; the foes find in this peasanthood his salient faults. The former say that by reason of the simplicity and purity of his character, Bruckner was as Paul caught up in the body or out of the body, they cannot tell, to the third heaven, caught up into paradise where he heard unspeakable words, which it was not lawful for him to utter, but it was allowed him to hint at them in music. The latter insist that his peasant naïveté dashed with peasant cunning is revealed in his interminable chatter, in his vague wanderings, in his lack of continuity and cohesion in the expression of thought.

The wretched game of politics is still played with Bruckner. Because he worshipped Wagner and because Brahms, or rather Hanslick, who was to Brahms both elephanteer and thurifer, was opposed to Wagner, the Wagnerites therefore pitted Bruckner against Brahms, and proclaimed the former the great successor to Beethoven in the field of absolute music. As a matter of fact, Brahms was neither bitterly hostile toward Wagner, nor did he sneer at Bruckner. There was room for both Brahms and Bruckner—except in Vienna, and except in the shaggy breasts of Wagnerites. Hanslick is dead, "the executioner of Bruckner," as William Ritter characterizes him, "the man who derided all the true glories of the music of his time for Brahms' sole benefit," but Hanslick in his life time did not kill Bruckner, who had friendly audiences in Vienna before his death, whose fame has steadily grown. And among those conductors who have been instrumental in spreading Bruckner's glory are Dr. Muck, Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Ferdinand Loewe.

In order to appreciate fully and yet with discrimination the indisputable talent, the irregular, uncontrolled genius of Bruckner, it is not necessary to inquire curiously into Bruckner's peasanthood or into the character of his father and mother. It was the theory of Sainte-Beuve that the superior man is found, at least in part, in his parents, and especially in his mother; but I doubt in this instance whether an intimate acquaintance with Therese, the daughter of the innkeeper and administrator Ferdinand Klim at Neuzeng, would explain the inconsistencies and contradictions in her son's music. She was no doubt a strong, lusty woman, and she bore her husband a dozen children. As for Bruckner being a peasant, poor, now rude in behavior and speech and now almost cringing in his desire to be courteous, badly educated, very few of the great composers have been born in rooms of purple hangings, very few have been distinguished for the elegance of their manners or the depth and breadth of their general learning.

Bruckner did not live to complete his ninth symphony, which must necessarily be judged as an incomplete work. It was produced here by Mr. Gericke three years ago last April, and, as is, alas, the common lot, it was left severely alone, so that there could be no corroboration or reversal of the first opinion. Works of this importance should be performed at two concerts in immediate succession.

The symphony was conducted last night by Dr. Muck with firm belief in the composer and with gusto in the accomplishment of a reverential task. In the colossal work are pages of both color and solemn beauty, of dramatic strength, of wild fancy, of infinite sweep and apocalyptic vision. These pages were read by Dr. Muck with illuminative power. Nothing could have been more impressive than the establishment of a mood of contemplation until the first and chief climax of the opening movement was rendered out in its full and awful power.

Melodic passages were sung, not declaimed; declamatory phrases were read with dramatic intensity. The performance of the scherzo, one of the most remarkable movements in all Bruckner's symphonies, music that is now lightly graceful and now demoniacal, was one to be remembered. The reading of the Adagio was highly poetical from the delivery of the opening and poignant theme to the close of quiet grandeur, which has been aptly characterized as the composer's farewell to the world and its pomp and gauds, its vain ambitions and its gnat-like cares.

And yet, in spite of the presence of these inspired pages, in spite of a performance that must long be memorable, there were stretches of waste, where one was plodding through sand and mire. Grant the purely technical interest in Bruckner's treatment of his material, it yet remains a fact that his diffuseness, his lack of continuity, his occasionally childish, sentimental prattle, are revealed in this symphony as in the preceding ones. Only the scherzo is conceived and carried from beginning to end and built together. Though the [illegible] and grievous in the [illegible], especially in the [illegible] forgotten afterward in [illegible] which is [illegible] ex-with the piano accompaniment instrumentated by Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," with Mottl's instrumentation, and "Erlking," with Berlioz's instrumentation. These songs at former symphony concerts have been sung with piano accompaniment.

Her singing was distinguished chiefly by her suggestion of widely varying moods; of religious ecstasy, akin to that expressed in Tennyson's exquisite poem that is all white in the exposition of a nun's religious longing; of the impassive yet comforting voice of Death in answer to the fearsome maiden; of the legendary spirit and horror of the Erlking. In all this she succeeded, but she was most effective in "Death and the Maiden," which displayed the richness of her voice and did not force her beyond present vocal limitations.

It is said that when Roger, the great French tenor, sang "Erlking" he came dangerously near—ventriloquism in his effort to present distinctly the three characters in the drama, and only his dramatic genius saved him from being ridiculous. Mme. Schumann-Heink avoided this pit into which many and distinguished singers have fallen, yet her interpretation was dramatic, and it was commendably free from exaggeration. Critics for many years have found fault with Schubert's setting. (Mendelssohn, for instance, in his jaunty, genteel way preferred Reichardt's!)

They have accused Schubert of absurd accentuation, of giving to the Erlking incongruously sentimental strains, melodies that would not frighten even the most timid child; of portraying in Italian music an episode of the chilly North. What have they not said? Yet Schubert's song still thrills, for here is the suggestion of night and speed and horror. Loewe's ballad is remarkable, but it is conceived in another manner.

It is all very well to say that the Leonore overture No. 1 is better as a prelude to the opera than No. 3, and that No. 2 is in some respects superior to the most famous of the four overtures. Whenever No. 1, No. 2, or the overture to "Fidelio" is played, the hearer instinctively is reminded of No. 3, and would fain hear it.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
—NOVEMBER 3 1907.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mme Schumann-Heink Symphony Soloist.

Recitals This Week by Paderewski and Mme Sembrich.

Other Events of the Near Future—Current Gossip.

The fourth Symphony program began with Bruckner's D minor, or unfinished symphony; then followed a group of Schubert songs, with Mme Schumann-Heink as soloist, and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 1, for the third and last number. The great contralto returns with her voice apparently unimpaired, her vocal style unchanged, and the splendor of tone and power undiminished. She is still prone to exaggeration which at times mars the beauty of her phrasing, but the fervor of her delivery, the glorious warmth of her declamation and the wonderfully rich and resonant quality of her lower tones enthrall her auditors as in the past.

Her selections were "The Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden" and the familiar "Erlking." She sang them with excellent contrasting effects, deep expression and tenderness, though less intensity would have made the songs sufficiently dramatic. The rapturous applause that greeted the singer's interpretations attested the well-deserved popularity of the distinguished artist, who was recalled many times to the platform.

The accompaniments to madam's songs were thoroughly good, and on account of her big voice the tonal balances twixt singer and orchestra was preserved unusually well. Dr Muck opened his program with the unfinished symphony by Bruckner, an incomplete and bewildering work filled with cross harmonies, dissonants and puzzling modulations and changes in key.

It is a massive composition that seemingly defies an attempt to unravel its significance, save that it typifies the spirit of unrest, doubt and disappointment of a man whose life is embittered by his misfortunes. In the first part there are climaxes and anticlimaxes in profusion, the full orchestra being given numerous fortissimo episodes, with the brasses prominent in almost every instance. Opposing themes by different groups also are frequent. In the second section the violin parts, which are very difficult in scoring, were admirably brought out, the strange character of this movement making it interesting despite the chaotic nature of the scherzo. The violins, too, were very effective in the figurations of the last movement. But the whole work is so puzzling and formless that it does not appeal to the average concert attendant, and its cool reception by the audience was a repetition of the former one some three years ago. The "Leonore" overture was interpreted in a sympathetic manner and won much applause.

As the orchestra will make its first trip this week there will be no public rehearsal and concert until Nov 15 and 16. Paderewski will be the soloist and play Rubinstein's D minor concerto. The program will open with the overture, "Christ-Elflein," given here for the first time, and close with Brahms' first symphony.

NOVEMBER 3, 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY OLIN DOWNES

The opening number, and the "piece de resistance" of the fourth Symphony rehearsal and concert was Bruckner's ninth symphony (unfinished), which had received its first and only previous performances in this city at the hands of Mr. Gericke in 1904.

This is the symphony of which Bruckner said, when its composition was brought to a stop by approaching death, "If I never finish it, then my 'Te Deum' may be used as a finale. . . . This work belongs to my Lord God." And a more pathetically appropriate monument to its creator, who fearlessly, and with the naïveté of a child, committed the thoughts of his soul to his manuscripts in the solitude of his chamber, could hardly be conceived.

Dr. Muck exerted himself to the utmost, and rarely have his searching intelligence, keen perceptions and excellent control of his orchestra manifested themselves to greater advantage. The performance, so far as one might judge on the second hearing of such a colossal work, was a remarkably fine one, a worthy complement to the splendid reading of the seventh symphony last season. All, apparently, that could be said for the composer was said, and other than this, little can be written that essentially differs from the verdict pronounced on the occasion of the first performance.

The same sublimity of thought and pontifical splendor of utterance, the sonority of the orchestra, particularly in the many instances of masterly scoring for the brass choir, gave many passages of the music an impressiveness that, once felt, is never forgotten by the hearer. And again—alas! that it should be so—cheek by jowl with these wondrous conceptions came passages of what one can only call tiresome, incoherent, pedantic twaddle.

The first movement is the most concise of the three. There are few more magnificent passages, moreover, in modern music than the preparation and introduction of the opening theme. As we go on, one glorious moment follows another, and as theme succeeds theme (notably the superbly powerful motive in D minor and the finely contrasted one in A major) there arises in the listener a sense of extraordinary richness of invention and fantasy. We are transported for a time with the sumptuousness of the composer's imagination; but there is dross in the gold, and a full third of the section could well be spared.

The scherzo is a not unworthy descendant of the form that Beethoven brought to life. It is wholly original, and with an application of the blue pencil would be very effective, having a certain brusquerie, a harsh harmonic bite and an ironical, Jean Paul-like humor all its own.

Bruckner, in this his last great work, has not at all strayed from his hero worship of Richard Wagner. The orchestral coloring is often reminiscent and the melodies have frequently a very Wagnerian contour, as in the case of the opening theme of the adagio, which in its first five notes is synonymous with the theme of the introduction of the "Faust Overture." This adagio is of incomparable nobility, and it would surely stand the test of the ages, were it not that, like a millstone around the neck, there is still more of verbosity, of tedious reiteration.

Bruckner unquestionably holds out much to appeal to the modern man, but it is very questionable whether he will ever, with such strangely incongruous virtues and defects, find appreciation with the general musical public. Nevertheless, such great thoughts, such sublime conceptions come but too rarely in these days, whatever their surrounding discrepancies. Let us thank Dr. Muck for uttering such messages.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was soloist on this occasion, and her numbers were three Schubert lieder—"The Young Nun" (orchestration by Liszt), "Death and the Maiden" (orchestration by Mottl), "The Erlking" (orchestration by Berlioz).

Mme. Schumann-Heink's great voice has its peculiar qualities, which are as they have always been. Of her singing it can be said that it was worthy of the songs that she sang, and greater praise hath no man than this. She vocalized with the utmost care and interpreted with an artistic reserve which doubly enhanced the effect of her nobly sincere performances. The various orchestrations were reassuringly discreet and in consonance with the spirit of the text.

Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture brought the concert to an end.

N. Y. EVG. WORLD
NOV 2 - 1907

That famous band of musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, comes to town next week for its first pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. There will be no soloist at either concert, Bruckner's unfinished ninth symphony, in three movements, the last written in October, 1904, will be the feature on Thursday night. The composer died before he could complete the work. The Saturday afternoon programme will consist only of two symphonies, Mozart's, in G minor, and Beethoven's sixth, the "Pastoral."

NEW YORK WORLD
Address .....
NOV 3- 1907

COMING EVENTS IN MUSICAL WORLD. 1884

A Solid Week of Concerts with Many Notable First Appearances.

DEBUT OF PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA AND POHLIG.

Vocal and Instrumental Programme of a High Order for New York Music Lovers.

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At neither concert will there be a soloist. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme will be Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony. This work is in three movements, its completion having been prevented by Bruckner's death, and although sketches of the last movement are in existence, they give but small evidence of the composer's intentions. The other works on the programme are Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, Mr. Andre Maquarre being the flutist, and Beethoven's overture "Leonore No. 1." For Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck is making a very bold innovation. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor (E. 550), and Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral." At the first concert in Boston this fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major suite, but the programme was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinee he has cut out the Bach Suite.

NEW YORK EVENING POST
Address .....
NOV 3- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At neither concert will there be a soloist. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme will be Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony. This work is in three movements, its completion having been prevented by Bruckner's death, and although sketches of the last movement are in existence, they give but small evidence of the composer's intentions.

The first movement was begun in the end of April, 1891, and was finished in October, 1892. The Scherzo was completed on Feb. 15, 1894, but the Trio was finished as early as Feb. 13, 1893. The Adagio was completed on Oct. 31, 1894. The first performance was by the Vienna Academic Wagner Society and the Vienna Concert Society at Vienna on Feb. 11, 1903. The conductor was Löwe, and as an act of piety Bruckner's "Te Deum" was used as a final movement. The work was brought out in Germany in Berlin by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Nikisch on Oct. 26, 1903. Its first performance in America was by the Chicago Orchestra under Theodore Thomas, Feb. 20, 1904. Mr. Gericke performed it in Boston on March 31 and April 2 of the same year.

The other works on the programme are Bachs's Suite in B minor for Flute and String Orchestra, Mr. André Maquarre being the flutist, and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 1."

Saturday afternoon the programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor, (K. 550) and Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral." At his first concert in Boston this Fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major Suite, but the programme was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinee he has cut out the Bach Suite.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.) NOV 3- 1907
Address .....

MUSIC NOTES.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season of New York concerts on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, and there will be an absence of soloists. The programme will be made up of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore Overture" and Bach's B minor suite for flute and string orchestra. In the latter number Mr. Andre Maquarre will be the flutist. The Bruckner Symphony is a work of extraordinary importance, its scherzo being reckoned as among the most inter-

[39]

SUNDAY HERALD---BOSTON,
NOVEMBER 3, 1907.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT AN EVENT

Fine Interpretation Given of Bruckner's Colossal Symphony.

BY PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 9.....Bruckner
"The Young Nun".....Schubert
"Death and the Maiden".....Schubert
"The Erl King".....Schubert
Overture, "Leonore, No. 1".....Beethoven

Both the admirers of Bruckner and those that dislike his music lay stress on the fact that he was a born peasant and was essentially a peasant to the day of his death, although the Rector Magnificus of the University of Vienna bowed before him when he presented him with the honorary degree of doctor. The admirers find in Bruckner's peasanthood his strongest characteristics as a composer; the foes find in this peasanthood his salient faults. The former say that by reason of the simplicity and purity of his character, Bruckner was as Paul caught up in the body or out of the body, they cannot tell, to the third heaven, caught up into paradise where he heard unspeakable words, which it was not lawful for him to utter, but it was allowed him to hint at them in music. The latter insist that his peasant naivete dashed with peasant cunning is revealed in his interminable chatter, in his vague wanderings, in his lack of continuity and cohesion in the expression of thought.

The wretched game of politics is still played with Bruckner. Because he worshipped Wagner and because Brahms, or rather Hanslick, who was to Brahms both elephanteer and thurifer, was opposed to Wagner, the Wagnerites therefore pitted Bruckner against Brahms, and proclaimed the former the great successor to Beethoven in the field of absolute music. As a matter of fact, Brahms was neither bitterly hostile toward Wagner, nor did he sneer at Bruckner. There was room for both Brahms and Bruckner—except in Vienna, and except in the shaggy breasts of Wagnerites. Hanslick is dead, "the executioner of Bruckner," as William Ritter characterizes him, "the man who derided all the true glories of the music of his time for Brahms' sole benefit," but Hanslick in his life time did not kill Bruckner, who had friendly audiences in Vienna before his death, whose fame has steadily grown. And among those conductors who have been instrumental in spreading Bruckner's glory are Dr. Muck, Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Ferdinand Loewe.

In order to appreciate fully and yet with discrimination the indisputable talent, the irregular, uncontrolled genius of Bruckner, it is not necessary to inquire curiously into Bruckner's peasanthood or into the character of his father and mother. It was the theory of Sainte-Beuve that the superior man is found, at least in part, in his parents, and especially in his mother; but I doubt in this instance whether an intimate acquaintance with Therese, the daughter of the innkeeper and administrator Ferdinand Helm at Neuzeng, would explain the inconsistencies and contradictions in her son's music. She was no doubt a strong, lusty woman, and she bore her husband a dozen children. As for Bruckner being a peasant, poor, now rude in behavior and speech and now almost cringing in his desire to be courteous, shabbily educated, very few of the greatest composers have been born in rooms of purple hangings, very few have been distinguished for the elegance of their manners or the depth and breadth of their general learning.

Bruckner did not live to complete his ninth symphony, which must necessarily be judged as an incomplete work. It was produced here by Mr. Gericke three years ago last April, and, as is, alas, the common rule, it was left severely alone, so that there could be no corroboration or reversal of the first opinion. Works of this importance should be performed at two concerts in immediate succession.

The symphony was conducted last evening by Dr. Muck with firm belief in the composer and with gusto in the accomplishment of a reverential task. In this colossal work are pages of both tender and solemn beauty, of dramatic strength, of wild fancy, of infinite sweep and apocalyptic vision. These pages were read by Dr. Muck with illuminative fervor. Nothing could have been more superb than the establishment of a mood of anticipation until the first and chief theme of the opening movement was thundered out in its full and aweful dignity.

Melodic passages were sung, not declaimed; declamatory phrases were read with dramatic intensity. The performance of the scherzo, one of the most remarkable movements in all Bruckner's symphonies, music that is now lightly fantastical and now demoniacal, was one long to be remembered. The reading of the Adagio was highly poetical from the delivery of the opening and poignant theme to the close of quiet grandeur, which has been aptly characterized as the composer's farewell to the world and its pomp and gauds, its vain ambitions and its gnat-like cares.

And yet, in spite of the presence of these inspired pages, in spite of a performance that must long be memorable, there were stretches of waste, there was plodding through sand and desolation. Grant the purely technical interest in Bruckner's treatment of thematic material, it yet remains a fact that his diffuseness, his lack of continuity, his occasionally childish, inconsequential prattle, are revealed in this symphony as in the preceding ones. Only the scherzo is conceived clearly from beginning to end and firmly knit together. Though the results be serious and grievous in the other movements, especially in the [illegible] are forgotten afterward in the [illegible] that which is [illegible] and grandly ex[illegible] of pages [illegible]

[illegible] by the [illegible] Nikisch [illegible] Muck [illegible] with the piano accompaniment instrumentated by Liszt; "Death and the Maiden," with Mottl's instrumentation, and "Erlking," with Berlioz's instrumentation. These songs at former symphony concerts have been sung with piano accompaniment.

Her singing was distinguished chiefly by her suggestion of widely varying moods; of religious ecstasy, akin to that expressed in Tennyson's exquisite poem that is all white in the exposition of a nun's religious longing; of the impassive yet comforting voice of Death in answer to the fearsome maiden; of the legendary spirit and horror of the Erlking. In all this she succeeded, but she was most effective in "Death and the Maiden," which displayed the richness of her voice and did not force her beyond present vocal limitations.

It is said that when Roger, the great French tenor, sang "Erlking" he came dangerously near ventriloquism in his effort to present distinctly the three characters in the drama, and only his dramatic genius saved him from being ridiculous. Mme. Schumann-Heink avoided this pit into which many and distinguished singers have fallen, yet her interpretation was dramatic, and it was commendably free from exaggeration. Critics for many years have found fault with Schubert's setting. (Mendelssohn, for instance, in his jaunty, genteel way preferred Reichardt's!)

They have accused Schubert of absurd accentuation, of giving to the Erlking incongruously sentimental strains, melodies that would not frighten even the most timid child; of portraying in Italian music an episode of the chilly North. What have they not said? Yet Schubert's song still thrills, for here is the suggestion of night and speed and horror. Loewe's ballad is remarkable, but it is conceived in another manner.

It is all very well to say that the Leonore overture No. 1 is better as a prelude to the opera than No. 3, and that No. 2 is in some respects superior to the most famous of the four overtures. Whenever No. 1, No. 2, or the overture to "Fidelio" is played, the hearer instinctively is reminded of No. 3, and would fain hear it.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
—NOVEMBER 3 [illegible]07.

MUSICAL MATTERS

Mme Schumann-Heink Symphony Soloist.

Recitals This Week by Paderewski and Mme Sembrich.

Other Events of the Near Future—Current Gossip.

The fourth Symphony program began with Bruckner's D minor, or unfinished symphony; then followed a group of Schubert songs, with Mme Schumann-Heink as soloist, and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 1, for the third and last number. The great contralto returns with her voice apparently unimpaired, her vocal style unchanged, and the splendor of tone and power undiminished. She is still prone to exaggeration which at times mars the beauty of her phrasing, but the fervor of her delivery, the glorious warmth of her declamation and the wonderfully rich and resonant quality of her lower tones enthrall her auditors as in the past.

Her selections were "The Young Nun," "Death and the Maiden" and the familiar "Erlking." She sang them with excellent contrasting effects, deep expression and tenderness, though less intensity would have made the songs sufficiently dramatic. The rapturous applause that greeted the singer's interpretations attested the well-deserved popularity of the distinguished artist, who was recalled many times to the platform.

The accompaniments to madam's songs were thoroughly good, and on account of her big voice the tonal balances twixt singer and orchestra was preserved unusually well. Dr Muck opened his program with the unfinished symphony by Bruckner, an incomplete and bewildering work filled with cross harmonies, dissonants and puzzling modulations and changes in key.

It is a massive composition that seemingly defies an attempt to unravel its significance, save that it typifies the spirit of unrest, doubt and disappointment of a man whose life is embittered by his misfortunes. In the first part there are climaxes and anticlimaxes in profusion, the full orchestra being given numerous fortissimo episodes, with the brasses prominent in almost every instance. Opposing themes by different groups also are frequent. In the second section the violin parts, which are very difficult in scoring, were admirably brought out, the strange character of this movement making it interesting despite the chaotic nature of the scherzo. The violins, too, were very effective in the figurations of the last movement. But the whole work is so puzzling and formless that it does not appeal to the average concert attendant, and its cool reception by the audience was a repetition of the former one some three years ago. The "Leonore" overture was interpreted in a sympathetic manner and won much applause.

As the orchestra will make its first trip this week there will be no public rehearsal and concert until Nov 15 and 16. Paderewski will be the soloist and play Rubinstein's D minor concerto. The program will open with the overture, "Christ-Elflein," given here for the first time, and close with Brahms' D minor symphony.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
NOVEMBER 3, 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY OLIN DOWNES

The opening number, and the "piece de resistance" of the fourth Symphony rehearsal and concert was Bruckner's ninth symphony (unfinished), which had received its first and only previous performances in this city at the hands of Mr. Gericke in 1904.

This is the symphony of which Bruckner said, when its composition was brought to a stop by approaching death, "If I never finish it, then my 'Te Deum' may be used as a finale. . . . This work belongs to my Lord God." And a more pathetically appropriate monument to its creator, who fearlessly, and with the naivete of a child, committed the thoughts of his soul to his manuscripts in the solitude of his chamber, could hardly be conceived.

Dr. Muck exerted himself to the utmost, and rarely have his searching intelligence, keen perceptions and excellent control of his orchestra manifested themselves to greater advantage. The performance, so far as one might judge on the second hearing of such a colossal work, was a remarkably fine one, a worthy complement to the splendid reading of the seventh symphony last season. All, apparently, that could be said for the composer was said, and other than this, little can be written that essentially differs from the verdict pronounced on the occasion of the first performance.

The same sublimity of thought and pontifical splendor of utterance, the sonority of the orchestra, particularly in the many instances of masterly scoring for the brass choir, gave many passages of the music an impressiveness that, once felt, is never forgotten by the hearer. And again—alas! that it should be so—cheek by jowl with these wondrous conceptions came passages of what one can only call tiresome, incoherent, pedantic twaddle.

The first movement is the most concise of the three. There are few more magnificent passages, moreover, in modern music than the preparation and introduction of the opening theme. As we go on, one glorious moment follows another, and as theme succeeds theme (notably the superbly powerful motive in D minor and the finely contrasted one in A major) there arises in the listener a sense of extraordinary richness of invention and fantasy. We are transported for a time with the sumptuousness of the composer's imagination; but there is dross in the gold, and a full third of the section could well be spared.

The scherzo is a not unworthy descendant of the form that Beethoven brought to life. It is wholly original, and with an application of the blue pencil would be very effective, having a certain brusquerie, a harsh harmonic bite and an ironical, Jean Paul-like humor all its own.

Bruckner, in this his last great work, has not at all strayed from his hero worship of Richard Wagner. The orchestral coloring is often reminiscent and the melodies have frequently a very Wagnerian contour, as in the case of the opening theme of the adagio, which in its first five notes is synonymous with the theme of the introduction of the "Faust Overture." This adagio is of incomparable nobility, and it would surely stand the test of the ages, were it not that, like a millstone around the neck, there is still more of verbosity, of tedious reiteration.

Bruckner unquestionably holds out much to appeal to the modern man, but it is very questionable whether he will ever, with such strangely incongruous virtues and defects, find appreciation with the general musical public. Nevertheless, such great thoughts, such sublime conceptions come but too rarely in these days, whatever their surrounding discrepancies. Let us thank Dr. Muck for uttering such messages.

Mme. Schumann-Heink was soloist on this occasion, and her numbers were three Schubert lieder—"The Young Nun" (orchestration by Liszt), "Death and the Maiden" (orchestration by Mottl), "The Erlking" (orchestration by Berlioz).

Mme. Schumann-Heink's great voice has its peculiar qualities, which are as they have always been. Of her singing it can be said that it was worthy of the songs that she sang, and greater praise hath no man than this. She vocalized with the utmost care and interpreted with an artistic reserve which doubly enhanced the effect of her nobly sincere performances. The various orchestrations were reassuringly discreet and in consonance with the spirit of the text.

Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture brought the concert to an end.

[illegible] NOV 3 - 1907

That famous band of musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, comes to town next week for its first pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. There will be no soloist at either concert. Bruckner's unfinished ninth symphony, in three movements, the last written in October, 1904, will be the feature on Thursday night. The composer died before he could complete the work. The Saturday afternoon programme will consist only of two symphonies, Mozart's, in G minor, and Beethoven's sixth, the "Pastoral."

[39]

m ..... NEW YORK WORLD
dress .....
to .....
NOV 3- 1907

COMING EVENTS IN MUSICAL WORLD. 1884

A Solid Week of Concerts with Many Notable First Appearances.

DEBUT OF PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA AND POHLIG.

Vocal and Instrumental Programme of a High Order for New York Music Lovers.

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At neither concert will there be a soloist. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme will be Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony. This work is in three movements, its completion having been prevented by Bruckner's death, and although sketches of the last movement are in existence, they give but small evidence of the composer's intentions. The other works on the programme are Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, Mr. Andre Maquarre being the flutist, and Beethoven's overture "Leonore No. 1." For Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck is making a very bold innovation. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor (E. 550), and Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral." At the first concert in Boston this fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major suite, but the programme was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinee he has cut out the Bach Suite.

ess .....
e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At neither concert will there be a soloist. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme will be Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony. This work is in three movements, its completion having been prevented by Bruckner's death, and although sketches of the last movement are in existence, they give but small evidence of the composer's intentions. 18[illegible]

The first movement was begun in the end of April, 1891, and was finished in October, 1892. The Scherzo was completed on Feb. 15, 1894, but the Trio was finished as early as Feb. 13, 1893. The Adagio was completed on Oct. 31, 1894. The first performance was by the Vienna Academic Wagner Society and the Vienna Concert Society at Vienna on Feb. 11, 1903. The conductor was Löwe, and as an act of piety Bruckner's "Te Deum" was used as a final movement. The work was brought out in Germany in Berlin by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Nikisch on Oct. 26, 1903. Its first performance in America was by the Chicago Orchestra under Theodore Thomas, Feb. 20, 1904. Mr. Gericke performed it in Boston on March 31 and April 2 of the same year.

The other works on the programme are Bachs's Suite in B minor for Flute and String Orchestra, Mr. André Maquarre being the flutist, and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore, No. 1."

Saturday afternoon the programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor, (K. 550,) and Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral." At his first concert in Boston this Fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major Suite, but the programme was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinee he has cut out the Bach Suite.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)

dress .....
te .....

MUSIC NOTES.

'stabl

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season of New York concerts on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall. Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, and there will be an absence of soloists. The programme will be made up of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore Overture" and Bach's B minor suite for flute and string orchestra. In the latter number Mr. Andre Maquarre will be the flutist. The Bruckner Symphony is a work of extraordinary importance, its scherzo being reckoned as among the most interesting single movements in symphonic literature.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM

(See other side.)

Address .....

Date NOV 2 1907

Strings, Wood, Winds and Brasses,

THE first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At neither concert will there be a soloist. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme will be Bruckner's unfinished "Ninth Symphony."

The other works on the programme are Bach's "Suite in B Minor," for flute and string orchestra, Mr. Andre Maquarre being the flutist, and Beethoven's overture "Leonore, No. 1."

For Saturday afternoon, Dr. Muck is making a very bold innovation. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's, in G minor (K. 550), and Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral."

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, with Carl Pohlig conducting. The soloists are Karl Klein, violin, and Richard Buhlig, piano.

Elkan's Band will give a second concert at the Lenox Lyceum to-morrow night.

Arnold Foldesy, a young Hungarian 'cellist, who is to make his first American appearance Tuesday evening, at Mendelssohn Hall, is to be assisted by Miss Cecilia Winter, contralto.

Jan Jemkacsy, a young Hungarian violinist, will make his United States and Canadian debut under the management of J. [illegible] concert will take place in Mendelssohn Hall, Saturday evening, November 9. Jan Munkacsy is the nephew of the famous painter, Michael Munkacsy.

Gounod's "Faust" will be given by the Aborn Opera Company at Bailey's Lincoln Square Theatre next week.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK EV'G POST

NOV 2 1907

There will be no soloist at next week's Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the Thursday concert will bring an extremely interesting novelty—Bruckner's ninth symphony (unfinished). There will also be a Bach suite and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. For Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck is making a bold innovation. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor (K. 550), and Beethoven's sixth, the "Pastoral." At his first concert in Boston this fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major suite, but the programme was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinée he has cut out the Bach suite. Apropos this programme may be repeated his remark last year when some persons said that they thought three symphonies on one programme, as he once gave in Cambridge, was too much. He smiled and asked: "If we cannot give three symphonies at Harvard University where can we give them?"

At the Brooklyn concert of the Boston Orchestra, Friday evening, Baptist Temple, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and a Bach suite will be played besides the symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein" by Vincent d'Indy, one of the earlier and less abstruse works of the eminent Parisian composer. The work was completed in 1881.

NEW YORK MAIL

NOV 2 1907

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be welcomed again by a large audience in Carnegie hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck will offer as his chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme the Bruckner unfinished ninth symphony. There are three movements, its completion having been prevented by Bruckner's death. Mr. Gericke performed the Bruckner work in Boston in 1904 and it has also been heard under Theodore Thomas, who gave the first production in America.

The other numbers to be heard Thursday night are Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, with Andre Maquarre as flautist. The Leonore overture, No. 1, by Beethoven, will complete the programme. Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will offer two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's sixth, commonly known as the Pastoral.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG

Nachdem gestern Abend das erste Konzert der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft stattgefunden hat, also das erste Symphonie-Konzert der Saison, kann dieses als in aller Form eröffnet angesehen werden. Am kommenden Donnerstag Abend werden die Bostoner ihr erstes Konzert in Carnegie Hall veranstalten, dem am Samstag Nachmittag das zweite folgen wird. In keinem der beiden Konzerte wirken Solisten mit. Dr. Muck hat als Pièce de résistance des ersten Konzerts Bruckner's unvollendet gebliebene 9. Symphonie gewählt, welche ihre erste Aufführung am 11. Februar 1903 in Wien erlebte. In Amerika hat Theodor Thomas sie zuerst am 20. Februar 1904 in Chicago zur Wiedergabe gebracht. Bach's B-moll-Suite für Flöte und Streicher (Flötist Herr Maquarre) und Beethoven's „Leonoren"Ouverture No. 1" vervollständigen das Programm des Donnerstag-Konzerts. Das Samstags-Konzert besteht nur aus zwei Nummern, Mozart's G-moll und Beethoven's „Pastoral"-Symphonie, ein Programm, dessen Zusammenstellung den Reiz der Neuheit für

New York Tribune.

154 Nassau St.

NOV 3- 1907

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, at 8:15 o'clock:

Suite in B minor ..... Bach
André Maquarre, flautist.
Symphony No. 9, in D minor (unfinished) ..... Bruckner
Overture, "Leonore" No. 1 ..... Beethoven

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, November 9:

Symphony in G minor ..... Mozart
Symphony in F, No. 6, "Pastoral" ..... Beethoven

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple, Borough of Brooklyn, Friday evening, November 8:

Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein" ..... d'Indy
Suite in B minor ..... Bach
André Maquarre, flautist.
Overture, "Genoveva" ..... Schumann

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y. EV'G SUN

NOV 2- 1907

Brooklyn is to hear Karl Muck's chief Boston Symphony novelty, the "Wallenstein" trilogy of D'Indy, at the Baptist Temple on Firday next, while Carnegie Hall has Bruckner's symphony on Thursday and two symphonies, Mozart's and Beethoven's, at the matinée. Apropos of the last pair is repeated a remark of Dr. Muck last year when some persons said that three symphonies on one programme in Cambridge was too much. He smiled and asked: "If we cannot give three symphonies at Harvard University, where can we give them?"

[40]

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The programme will consist on Thursday night of Bruckner's ninth symphony, Bach's suite in B minor for flute and orchestra and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. On Saturday afternoon the list will be Mozart's G minor symphony and Beethoven's "Pastoral."

From NEW YORK WORLD

Address .....

Date NOV 3- 1907

On Thursday evening the first concert of the twenty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall. Next week come the Philharmonic concerts, the afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony and the Russian Symphony concert.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser.

NEW YORK'S GREAT NEWSPAPER.

Date NOV 3- 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following programmes at its first pair of New York concerts Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, at Carnegie Hall: Thursday evening—Bruckner's ninth symphony (unfinished), Bach's B minor suite for flute and strings, Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. Saturday afternoon—Mozart's G minor symphony, and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony ("Pastoral").

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.) NOV 3- 1907

Address .....

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinees will take place on Saturday in Carnegie Hall. Again will there be no soloists, and the programme is decidedly novel in that it is composed only of two symphonies—Mozart's G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral." Dr. Karl Muck will conduct.

Established London, 1881; New York, 1884

Address NEW YORK TIMES.

Date NOV 3- 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn on Friday evening, Nov. 8. There will be no soloist on this occasion. The programme includes d'Indy's Symphonic triology, "Wallenstein," Bach's Suite in B minor, and Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva."

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

Address .....

Date NOV 3- 1907

MUSIC events for the coming week under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences are the first of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening in the Baptist Temple, and an organ recital by Scott Wheeler in Plymouth Church on Wednesday evening, November 6.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES.

From .....

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 2 1907

The late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler on having all his violins bow exactly the same and it certainly was a very beautiful and soothing sight to see the bows of the first violins and the second, rise and fall, with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Mr. Gericke did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion." Dr. Muck is not alone in this, as nearly all the great conductors of the day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

FIRST CONCERT NEXT

Sembrich to Give a Recital in Brooklyn Institute.

OTHER LOCAL PROGRAMMES.

New Adelphi Philharmonic Orchestra of Strings to Give Series of Concerts.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences offers a fine series of musical events for the coming month. On Friday evening is the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple. It will be purely an orchestral programme. On Thursday evening, Nov. 14, is the second great song recital of the year, with Mme. Sembrich as the soloist. The Arion Singing Society announces a choral concert on Thursday, the 21st, and the first concert of the New York Symphony will be on the 23d at Baptist Temple. This last event will mark the reappearance of Josef Hofmann, whose recital on Thursday was so well received.

In full, the first Philharmonic concert programme is as follows: "Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, Op. 12 (V. D'Indy); Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings (J. S. Bach); Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81 (Schumann).

The coming of Mme. Sembrich is of especial interest to music lovers and to her hosts of admirers in Brooklyn. Her accompanist is Mr. Luckstone and the concert will be given on Thursday evening, Nov. 14, at Baptist Temple. The programme consists of three parts, a group of old airs and songs, a number of classical german lieder and a collection of modern songs.

In full the programme comprises: Old Airs and Songs—Air from "Nozze di Figaro," "Deh vieni non taraar" (Mozart); "Oh! had I Jubal's Lyre" (Handel); "Ein neues andachtiges Kinderwiegen" (David Corner); A Pastoral (Henry Carey). Classical German Lieder—"Liebesbotschaft" (Schubert); "Meine Rose" (Schumann); "Er Ist's" (Schumann); "Glockenthurmers Tochterlein" (Loewe); "Feldeinsamkeit" (Brahms); "Vorschneller Schwur" (Brahms). Miscellaneous Modern Songs—"Mein Leben ertont," "In den weiten breiten luftigen Leinen Kleider," "Als die alte Mutter," "Reingestimmt die Saiten," "Dart des Falken Schwinge," "Zigeuner Melodien" (Dvorak); "The Dark Now Leaves" (Parker); "Love Has Wings" (Rogers).

Although Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason completed his lecture-recital course last Friday evening, he will be heard again at Association Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 4 p. m. when he will explain the Philharmonic programme for Nov. 8. A series of these explanatory talks will precede the concerts. The different lecturers will be announced later.

The first organ recital of the season will be given as in previous years at Plymouth Church. Mr. Scott Wheeler, the well-known organist, of the church will play. The programme for Wednesday evening, Nov. 6, is as follows:

Peluder in B minor, Dethier; Barcarolle, Faulkes; sonate in B flat, Mendelssohn; Allegro con brio; Andante religioso; Allegretto; Allegro Maestoso; Soveig's song, Grieg; Moonshine, MacDowell; Menuett, Boccherini; Fugue in C minor, Bach; Cantilene, Rogers; allegretto grazioso, triumphal march, Hollins.

The ticket office at No. 502 Fulton street will be open on Election day from 8:30 a. m., until 6:30 p. m., for the sale of tickets to Mme. Sembrich's song recital and other events.

Standard Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 3- 1907

The season of Boston Symphony concerts will open on Friday evening, Nov. 8, when the first concert will be given in the Baptist Temple. Dr. Muck has arranged a most catholic programme, as the three works to be played represent three great periods of music, the ultra-classical, the neo-romantic and the modern. Brooklyn will hear for the first time Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein," which had its first performance in Boston on Oct. 18 and 19, when it won the enthusiastic approval of all that heard it. The second number will be Bach's Suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and the last number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva."

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At neither concert will there be a soloist. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme will be Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony. This work is in three movements, its completion having been prevented by Bruckner's death, and although sketches of the last movement are in existence, they give but small evidence of the composer's intentions. The first movement was begun in the end of April, 1891, and was finished in October, 1892. The scherzo was completed on February 15, 1894, but the trio was finished as early as February 13, 1893. The adagio was completed on October 31, 1894. The first performance was by the Vienna Academic Wagner Society and the Vienna Concert Society at Vienna on February 11, 1903. The conductor was Lowe, and as an act of piety Bruckner's Te Duem was used as a final movement. The other works on the programme are Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, Mr. Andre Maquarre being the flutist, and Beethoven's overture "Leonore, No. 1."

For Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck is making a very bold innovation. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor (K 550), and Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral." At his first concert in Boston this Fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major suite, but the programme was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinee he has cut out the Bach suite. Apropos of this programme may be repeated his remark last year when some persons said that they thought three symphonies on one programme, as he once gave in Cambridge, was too much. He smiled and asked: "If we cannot give three symphonies at Harvard University, where can we give them?"

e First, Established and Most Complete wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

s

NOV 2 1903

There will be no soloist at next week's Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the Thursday concert will bring an extremely interesting novelty—Bruckner's ninth symphony (unfinished). There will also be a Bach suite and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. For Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck is making a bold innovation. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor (K. 550), and Beethoven's sixth, the "Pastoral." At his first concert in Boston this fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major suite, but the programme was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinée he has cut out the Bach suite. Apropos this programme may be repeated his remark last year when some persons said that they thought three symphonies on one programme, as he once gave in Cambridge, was too much. He smiled and asked: "If we cannot give three symphonies at Harvard University where can we give them?"

At the Brooklyn concert of the Boston Orchestra, Friday evening, Baptist Temple, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and a Bach suite will be played besides the symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein" by Vincent d'Indy, one of the earlier and less abstruse works of the eminent Parisian composer. The work was completed in 1881.

s

NOV 2 1903

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be welcomed again by a large audience in Carnegie hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck will offer as his chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme the Bruckner unfinished ninth symphony. There are three movements, its completion having been prevented by Bruckner's death. Mr. Gericke performed the Bruckner work in Boston in 1904 and it has also been heard under Theodore Thomas, who gave the first production in America.

The other numbers to be heard Thursday night are Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, with Andre Maquarre as flautist. The Leonore overture, No. 1, by Beethoven, will complete the programme. Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will offer two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's sixth, commonly known as the Pastoral.

* * *

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)

ldress

te NOV 2 1903

Strings, Wood, Winds and Brasses,

THE first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At neither concert will there be a soloist. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. The chief item of interest on Thursday night's programme will be Bruckner's unfinished "Ninth Symphony."

The other works on the programme are Bach's "Suite in B Minor," for flute and string orchestra, Mr. Andre Maquarre being the flutist, and Beethoven's overture "Leonore, No. 1."

For Saturday afternoon, Dr. Muck is making a very bold innovation. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's, in G minor (K. 550), and Beethoven's Sixth, the "Pastoral."

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, with Carl Pohlig conducting. The soloists are Karl Klein, violin, and Richard Buhlig, piano.

Elliott's Band will give a second concert at the Hippodrome to-morrow night.

Arnold Foldesy, a young Hungarian 'cellist, who is to make his first American appearance Tuesday evening, at Mendelssohn Hall, is to be assisted by Miss Cecilia Winter, contralto.

Jan Munkacsy, the young Hungarian violinist, who is the United States and Canada under the management of C. J. Whitehill, will give a concert will take place at Mendelssohn Hall, Saturday evening, November 9. Jan Munkacsy is the nephew of the famous painter, Michael Munkacsy.

Gounod's "Faust" will be given by the Aborn Opera Company at Bonney's Lincoln Square Theatre next week.

ss NEW YORK

Nachdem gestern Abend das erste Konzert der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft stattgefunden hat, also das erste Symphonie-Konzert der Saison, kann dieses als in aller Form eröffnet angesehen werden. Am kommenden Donnerstag Abend werden die Bostoner ihr erstes Konzert in Carnegie Hall veranstalten, dem am Samstag Nachmittag das zweite folgen wird. In keinem der beiden Konzerte wirken Solisten mit. Dr. Muck hat als Pièce de résistance des ersten Konzerts Bruckner's unvollendet gebliebene 9. Symphonie gewählt, welche ihre erste Aufführung am 11. Februar 1903 in Wien erlebte. In Amerika hat Theodor Thomas sie zuerst am 20. Februar 1904 in Chicago zur Wiedergabe gebracht. Bach's B-moll-Suite für Flöte und Streicher (Flötist Herr Maquarre) und Beethoven's „Leonoren"-Ouverture No. 1" vervollständigen das Programm des Donnerstag-Konzerts. Das Samstags-Konzert besteht nur aus zwei Nummern, Mozart's G-moll und Beethoven's „Pastoral"-Symphonie, ein Programm, dessen Zusammenstellung den Reiz der Neuheit für

New York Tribune.
154 Nassau St.

NOV - 1903

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, at 8:15 o'clock:

Suite in B minor ..... Bach
André Maquarre, flautist.
Symphony No. 9, in D minor (unfinished) ..... Bruckner
Overture, "Leonore" No. 1 ..... Beethoven

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, November 9:

Symphony in G minor ..... Mozart
Symphony in F, No. 6, "Pastoral" ..... Beethoven

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Baptist Temple, Borough of Brooklyn, Friday evening, November 8:

Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein" ..... d'Indy
Suite in B minor ..... Bach
André Maquarre, flautist.
Overture, "Genoveva" ..... Schumann

paper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK

Brooklyn is to hear Karl Muck's chief Boston Symphony novelty, the "Wallenstein" trilogy of D'Indy, at the Baptist Temple on Firday next, while Carnegie Hall has Bruckner's symphony on Thursday and two symphonies, Mozart's and Beethoven's, at the matinée. Apropos of the last pair is repeated a remark of Dr. Muck last year when some persons said that three symphonies on one programme in Cambridge was too much. He smiled and asked: "If we cannot give three symphonies at Harvard University, where can we give them?"

[40]

From NEW YORK SUN

Address

Date

The first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The programme will consist on Thursday night of Bruckner's ninth symphony, Bach's suite in B minor for flute and orchestra and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. On Saturday afternoon the list will be Mozart's G minor symphony and Beethoven's "Pastoral."

rk, 18

rom NEW YORK WORLD

ddress

ate NOV 3 1903

On Thursday evening the first concert of the twenty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall. Next week come the Philharmonic concerts, the afternoon concert by the Boston Symphony and the Russian Symphony concert.

The Globe
AND Commercial Advertiser. Est'd 1797
NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER.

Date 1903

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present the following programmes at its first pair of New York concerts Thursday evening, Nov. 7, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 9, at Carnegie Hall: Thursday evening—Bruckner's ninth symphony (unfinished), Bach's B minor suite for flute and strings, Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. Saturday afternoon—Mozart's G minor symphony, and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony ("Pastoral").

Esta

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)

ldress

ate

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinees will take place on Saturday in Carnegie Hall. Again will there be no soloists, and the programme is decidedly novel in that it is composed only of two symphonies—Mozart's G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral." Dr. Karl Muck will conduct.

Established London, 1881; New York, 1884

ess

s

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn on Friday evening, Nov. 8. There will be no soloist on this occasion. The programme includes d'Indy's Symphonic triology, "Wallenstein," Bach's Suite in B minor, and Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva."

884

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)

ldress

ate

MUSIC events for the coming week under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences are the first of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening in the Baptist Temple, and an organ recital by Scott Wheeler in Plymouth Church on Wednesday evening, November 6.

Esta

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES

om

ldress Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate NOV 2 1903

The late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler on having all his violins bow exactly the same and it certainly was a very beautiful and soothing sight to see the bows of the first violins and the second, rise and fall, with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Mr. Gericks did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion." Dr. Muck is not alone in this, as nearly all the great conductors of the day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

ss

The season of Boston Symphony concerts will open on Friday evening, Nov. 8, when the first concert will be given in the Baptist Temple. Dr. Muck has arranged a most catholic programme, as the three works to be played represent three great periods of music, the ultra-classical, the neo-romantic and the modern. Brooklyn will hear for the first time Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein," which had its first performance in Boston on Oct. 18 and 19, when it won the enthusiastic aproval of all that heard it. The second number will be Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and the last number will be Schumann's ovetrue "Genoveva."

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S FIRST CONCERT NEXT WEEK

Brooklyn, N. Y.

1

Sembrich to Give a Recital in Brooklyn Institute.

OTHER LOCAL PROGRAMMES.

New Adelphi Philharmonic Orchestra of Strings to Give Series of Concerts.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences offers a fine series of musical events for the coming month. On Friday evening is the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple. It will be purely an orchestral programme. On Thursday evening, Nov. 14, is the second great song recital of the year, with Mme. Sembrich as the soloist. The Arion Singing Society announces a choral concert on Thursday, the 21st, and the first concert of the New York Symphony will be on the 23d at Baptist Temple. This last event will mark the reappearance of Josef Hofmann, whose recital on Thursday was so well received.

In full, the first Philharmonic concert programme is as follows: "Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, Op. 12 (V. D'Indy); Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings (J. S. Bach); Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81 (Schumann).

The coming of Mme. Sembrich is of especial interest to music lovers and to her hosts of admirers in Brooklyn. Her accompanist is Mr. Luckstone and the concert will be given on Thursday evening, Nov. 14, at Baptist Temple. The programme consists of three parts, a group of old airs and songs, a number of classical german lieder and a collection of modern songs.

In full the programme comprises: Old Airs and Songs—Air from "Nozze di Figaro," "Deh vieni non taraar" (Mozart); "Oh! had I Jubal's Lyre" (Handel); "Ein neues andachtiges Kinderwiegen" (David Corner); A Pastoral (Henry Carey). Classical German Lieder—"Liebesbotschaft" (Schubert); "Meine Rose" (Schumann); "Er Ist's" (Schumann); "Glockenthurmers Tochterlein" (Loewe); "Feldeinsamkeit" (Brahms); "Vorschneller Schwur" (Brahms). Miscellaneous Modern Songs—"Mein Leben ertont," "In den weiten breiten luftigen Leinen Kleider," "Als die alte Mutter," "Reingestimmt die Saiten," "Dart des Falken Schwinge," "Zigeuner Melodien" (Dvorak); "The Lark Now Leaves" (Parker); "Love Has Wings" (Rogers).

Although Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason completed his lecture-recital course last Friday evening, he will be heard again at Association Hall next Wednesday afternoon at 4 p. m. when he will explain the Philharmonic programme for Nov. 8. A series of these explanatory talks will precede the concerts. The different lecturers will be announced later.

The first organ recital of the season will be given as in previous years at Plymouth Church. Mr. Scott Wheeler, the well-known organist, of the church will play. The programme for Wednesday evening, Nov. 6, is as follows:

Prelude in E minor, Dethier; Barcarolle, Faulkes; sonate in B flat, Mendelssohn; Allegro con brio; Andante religioso; Allegretto; Allegro Maestoso; Soveig's song, Grieg; Moonshine, MacDowell; Menuett, Boccherini; Fugue in C minor, Bach; Cantilene, Rogers; allegretto grazioso, triumphal march, Hollins.

The ticket office at No. 502 Fulton street will be open on Election day from 8:30 a. m., until 6:30 p. m., for the sale of tickets to Mme. Sembrich's song recital and other events.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 2 1907

ORCHESTRA AND OPERA TO OPEN NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Will Give D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy in Brooklyn.

MANHATTAN OPERA HOUSE

Has a Strong Bill—Fine Orchestral and Other Concerts Pending.

Starting its twentieth season in Brooklyn with one of the largest subscriptions in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, November 8, at 8:15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Brooklyn audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Brooklyn, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic descent from Cesar Franck, and while he does not push his modern tendencies so far as Debussy, he is as far advanced as any men that are writing in Germany.

This particular work, it is amusing to note, is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact the first and second parts of the Trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston a fortnight ago, it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines laid out in this than in the lines that he has followed.

The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement of Wallenstein's Camp was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The first performance of the Trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The Trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed by the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati Orchestras.

The other works on the programme will be Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Schumann's overture "Genoveva."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address BUFFALO, N. Y.
Date NOV 3 - 1907

As to Harmonious Bowing.

The late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler on having all his violins bow exactly the same, and it certainly was a very beautiful and soothing sight to see the bows of the first violins and the second rise and fall, with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Mr. Gericke did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion." Dr. Muck is not alone in this, as nearly all the great conductors of the day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

Standard Union
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 3 - 1907

Starting its twentieth season in Brooklyn with one of the largest subscriptions in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will give the first concert of the year in the Baptist Temple on Friday evenin, Nov. 8, at[illegible]k, 1 8:15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Brooklyn audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Brooklyn, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic bent from Cesar Franck, and while he does not push his modern tendencies so far as Debussy, he is as far advanced as any men that are writing in Germany. This particular work, it is amusing to note, is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact the first and second parts of the trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany, and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston, a fortnight ago, it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more on the lines laid out in this than in the lines that he has followed. The composer has drawn his inspiration for the wor kfrom Schiller's trilogy of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The work was begun in 1873-4. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, Wallenstein's Camp, was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, Dec. 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed by the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati Orchestras. The other works on the programme will be Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

The late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler on having all his violins bow exactly the same and it certainly was a very beautiful and soothing sight to see the bows of the first violins and the second rise and fall, with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Mr. Gericke did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion." Dr. Muck is not alone in this, as nearly all the great conductors of the day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

Illustrated TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 3 - 1907

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England, for which the orchestra had to make special trips, has been cut down entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford, and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these regular concerts, the usual two Pension Fund concerts will be given in

TIMES
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 2 1907

The musical event of leading importance in Brooklyn next week will be the first of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Brooklyn audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Brooklyn. The distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, and his music was bewildering to the conventional ear of the Brooklynites who heard it. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic descent from Cesar Franck, and while he does not push his tendencies so far as Debussy, he is as far advanced as any men who are writing in Germany. This particular work is one which, as much as anything he has written, has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact, the first and second parts of the trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany, and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston a fortnight ago it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines laid out in this than in the lines he has followed.

The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," the "Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The work is in three movements, and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, December 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed by the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati Orchestras. The other works on the programme will be Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." The twentieth season of the orchestra in Brooklyn opens with one of the largest subscriptions in its history.

[illegible] N. Y. AMERICAN
Address Brooklyn
Date NOV 3 - 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA COMING THIS WEEK

[illegible], 188

Season's First Philharmonic Concert Is Set for Friday Evening.

MME. SEMBRICH HERE SOON

Her Song Recital Is Arranged for Next Week at the Temple.

Easily the most interesting function on the music calendar this week is the first Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been set for Friday evening in the Baptist Temple.

The concert will be given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Music Department of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

This will be the programme:

W. D'Indy ..... "Wallenstein" Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12.
Wallenstein's Camp.
Max and Tekla (The Piccolomini)
The Death of Wallenstein.

J. S. Bach..... Suite No. 2, in B Minor For Flute and Strings. (Hans von Bulow's Arrangement)
Overture; Largo; Allegro;
Rondo; Allegretto expressivo;
Sarabande; Andante;
Bourree I and Bourree II; Allegro molto;
Polonaise with Double; Moderato;
Minuet;
Badinerie; Presto;

Schumann .....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81

Dr. Karl Muck will be the conductor.

[41]

TIMES
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NOV 3 - 1907

Starting its twenty-third season in Philadelphia with the largest subscription it has had in five years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give a concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. There will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a program of more than ordinary interest, the chief work of which will be new to Philadelphia audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Philadelphia, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic descent from Cæsar Franck.

This particular work is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. It is declared that as a matter of fact the first and second parts of the trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements and the first and last movements bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, Wallenstein's Camp, was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed in the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati orchestras.

(Photograph by "Garo.")
DR. KARL MUCK.

The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D major, and Beethoven's Overture, "Leonore" No. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
[illegible] PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NOV 3 - 1907

—The late Theodore Thomas was a stickler on having all his violins bow exactly the same, and it certainly was entrancing to see the bows of the first violins and the second rise and fall with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Gericke did not go so far as Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "I want tone and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. The men are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion." Nearly all the great conductors of to-day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 2 1907

ORCHESTRA AND OPERA TO OPEN NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Will Give D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy in Brooklyn.

MANHATTAN OPERA HOUSE

Has a Strong Bill—Fine Orchestral and Other Concerts Pending.

Starting its twentieth season in Brooklyn with one of the largest subscriptions in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year in the Baptist Temple on Friday evening, November 8, at 8:15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Brooklyn audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Brooklyn, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic descent from Cesar Franck, and while he does not push his modern tendencies so far as Debussy, he is as far advanced as any men that are writing in Germany.

This particular work, it is amusing to note, is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact the first and second parts of the Trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston a fortnight ago, it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines laid out in this than in the lines that he has followed.

The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement of Wallenstein's Camp was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The first performance of the Trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The Trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed by the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati Orchestras.

The other works on the programme will be Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Schumann's overture "Genoveva."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om NEWS
ddress BUFFALO, N. Y.
ate

As to Harmonious Bowing.

The late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler on having all his violins bow exactly the same, and it certainly was a very beautiful and soothing sight to see the bows of the first violins and the second rise and fall, with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Mr. Gericke did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion." Dr. Muck is not alone in this, as nearly all the great conductors of the day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

Illustrated TIMES
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 3 - 1907

The annual route book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has just been published, shows that this famous organization will give an even hundred concerts this year, considerably less than the total in past years. It is understood that the policy of the management of the orchestra in the future will be to cut down as much as possible the number of the smaller concerts given outside of Boston. This is due to the belief that the hardship of travel these "one night stands" entail more than offsets the financial benefit which comes from these concerts. In the past it has been the custom of the orchestra to give two concerts on the way home from its monthly visit to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, at least four times in the winter. This year only one concert will be given, and the number of concerts in the smaller cities of New England, for which the orchestra had to make special trips, has been cut down entirely. Outside of its regular series of concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the orchestra will give one concert in each of the following cities: Waterbury, Conn.; Newark, N. J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus, Troy, Hartford, and two in Cincinnati. In addition to these regular concerts, the usual two Pension Fund concerts will be given in

Stamford
Broadway
Nov

Starting its twentieth season in Brooklyn with one of the largest subscriptions in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Carl Muck, will give the first concert of the year in the Baptist Temple on Friday evenin, Nov. 8, at 8:15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Brooklyn audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Brooklyn, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic bent from Cesar Franck, and while he does not push his modern tendencies so far as Debussy, he is as far advanced as any men that are writing in Germany. This particular work, it is amusing to note, is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact the first and second parts of the trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany, and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston, a fortnight ago, it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more on the lines laid out in this than in the lines that he has followed. The composer has drawn his inspiration for the wor kfrom Schiller's trilogy of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The work was begun in 1873-4. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, Wallenstein's Camp, was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, Dec. 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed by the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati Orchestras. The other works on the programme will be Bach's suite in B minor for flute and string orchestra, and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

The late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler on having all his violins bow exactly the same and it certainly was a very beautiful and soothing sight to see the bows of the first violins and the second rise and fall, with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Mr. Gericke did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion." Dr. Muck is not alone in this, as nearly all the great conductors of the day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

TIMES
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 2 1907

The musical event of leading importance in Brooklyn next week will be the first of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Brooklyn audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Brooklyn. The distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, and his music was bewildering to the conventional ear of the Brooklynites who heard it. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic descent from Cesar Franck, and while he does not push his tendencies so far as Debussy, he is as far advanced as any men who are writing in Germany. This particular work is one which, as much as anything he has written, has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact, the first and second parts of the trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany, and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it yas played in Boston a fortnight ago it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines laid out in this than in the lines he has followed.

The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," the "Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The work is in three movements, and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, December 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed by the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati Orchestras. The other works on the programme will be Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." The twentieth season of the orchestra in Brooklyn opens with one of the largest subscriptions in its history.

m
dress
te

BOSTON ORCHESTRA COMING THIS WEEK

Season's First Philharmonic Concert Is Set for Friday Evening.

MME. SEMBRICH HERE SOON

Her Song Recital Is Arranged for Next Week at the Temple.

Easily the most interesting function on the music calendar this week is the first Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been set for Friday evening in the Baptist Temple.

The concert will be given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Music Department of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

This will be the programme:

V. D'Indy ..... "Wallenstein" Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12.
Wallenstein's Camp
Max and Tekla (The Piccolomini)
The Death of Wallenstein

J. S. Bach.....Suite No. 2, in B Minor For Flute and Strings. (Hans von Bulow's Arrangement)
Overture; Largo; Allegro;
Rondo; Allegretto expressivo;
Sarabande; Andante;
Bourree I and Bourree II; Allegro molto;
Polonaise with Double; Moderato;
Minuet;
Badinerie; Presto;

Schumann .....Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81

Dr. Karl Muck will be the conductor.

[41]

NOV 3 - 1907

Starting its twenty-third season in Philadelphia with the largest subscription it has had in five years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give a concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. There will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a program of more than ordinary interest, the chief work of which will be new to Philadelphia audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remmbered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Philadelphia, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic descent from Cæsar Franck.

This particular work is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. It is declared that as a matter of fact the first and second parts of the trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements and the first and last movements bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, Wallenstein's Camp, was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880. The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed in the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati orchestras.

(Photograph by "Garo.")
DR. KARL MUCK.

The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D major, and Beethoven's Overture, "Leonore" No. 1.

* * *

paper Cutting Bureau in the World
NOV

—The late Theodore Thomas was a stickler on having all his violins bow exactly the same, and it certainly was entrancing to see the bows of the first violins and the second rise and fall with an exactness, it sometimes seemed, of a quarter of an inch. Gericke did not go so far as Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "I want tone and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. The men are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion." Nearly all the great conductors of to-day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
From PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date NOV 5- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Famous Orchestra Ably Presents Vincent d'Indy's Masterpiece.

A programme of uncommon interest marked the opening in the Academy of Music of the twenty-third season of concerts given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The assured place of this splendid organization in the musical life of Philadelphia was never more evident than last night, when its return was welcomed by thousands of music-lovers.

The orchestra returns to us enlarged and strengthened by the new players, especially chosen by Conductor Carl Muck. Concertmeister Wendling occupied the place of Willy Hess at the first desk, and there were unfamiliar faces in the brass choir. Entering upon his second year of office, the conductor's command of the orchestra is as ever sure, firm, yet elastic, and ready on occasions to give rein to the numerical strength and instrumental diversity which contribute so markedly to the glorious ensemble work in the great climaxes.

No soloist interfered with the unity of programme. This ranged from Bach to Beethoven, and then a longer step to the subtle and intricate harmonies of Vincent d'Indy. D'Indy's Wallenstein symphonic triology is, both in intent and result, programme music of advanced type. The "book" chosen for illustration or for expression in a related medium is a loosely compiled story based upon the Schiller play, the poet furnishing a framework upon which d'Indy wove a tapestry of gorgeous sound. Seven years of work and thought are represented. The mood of both poet and musician was romantic and heroic.

The first movement represents Wallenstein's camp, and is a tone picture of the rough life and the sometimes rougher pleasures of such an existence. It is dominated by great episodes descriptive of Wallenstein's granite personality. This Wallenstein motive overshadows again the lyric second movement, wherein the tragic loves of Max and Thekla find lamentable defeat. The last movement is melancholy and sombre, a dirge of sorrow and death. Each theme in the symphony is not a mere sequence of gracefully related notes, but the result of intellectual search and selection to the end of greater expressive power. Doctor Muck brought from this intricate score an infinity of detail and illuminating effects, the playing of his orchestra being always richly colored, with vivacious utterance for the lighter moods and a spirit of romance that was almost mediaeval for the whole.

The orchestra may have been holding back for the exactions of the D'Indy score which was to follow, but certainly it has played the Bach D major suite with a more ingratiating charm for the overture and the final numbers, though the singing quality of the violins during the famous air for the G string left nothing to be desired. The Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 1 was given dignified presentment.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address NOV 5- 1907
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Opening of the Season Introduces a Vincent d'Indy Trilogy.

From Johann Sebastian Bach to Vincent d'Indy is a long journey musically, yet the ancient classicist as well as the modern Frenchman were both represented on the program of the Boston Symphony's concert last evening at the Academy of Music. This was the orchestra's first concert of the local season, and interest centred in the d'Indy number—a musical setting of Schiller's "Wallenstein;" which was heard for the first time in this city last evening. A greater contrast is harder to imagine than that which exists between the Bach suite in D major, with which the concert opened, and this musical trilogy of the French master, with which the program closed. On the one hand was the precise form of the old German musician, on the other the orchestral coloring and freedom of the modern school.

The Wagnerian method is very evident in this symphonic form in three parts, which paints with much vividness the various episodes in Schiller's dramas, beginning with the scene in Wallenstein's camp and ending with the death of the hero.

In the first part we have the slow syncopateal valse, the sermon of the Caupchin monk quaintly delivered by the bassoons, and the riot of an encampment crowded with movement; the second part is a passionate love scene between Max and Thekla, then an ominous introduction begins the third part, which paints Wallenstein's death.

Although capable of an interpretation of this sort, this work of d'Indy's is not "program music" in the ordinary acceptance of the term, but a symphonic work of great beauty and much originality.

In addition to the numbers just mentioned last evening's program included Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the best organization of its kind in America, it is scarcely necessary to say that its playing last evening was superb. Dr. Karl Muck's men show no falling off in the quality of their work—which was much appreciated by the audience.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date NOV 3- 1907

STARTING its 23d season in this city with the largest subscription it has had in five years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloists at this concert, but Doctor Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Philadelphia audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Philadelphia. He is the leader of the school of modern French composers who trace their artistic descent from Cesar Franck, and while he does not push his modern tendencies so far as Debussy, he is yet emphatically of this day and its artistic thought.

This particular work is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact the first and second parts of the Trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston a fortnight ago it was greeted with enthusiasm by both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines laid out in this than in the lines that he has followed.

The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's triology of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements, and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1890.

The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed by the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati Orchestras.

The other works on the programme will be Bach's suite in D major and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date NOV 3- 1907

Starting its twenty-third season in Philadelphia with the largest subscription it has had in five years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year at the Academy of Music on to-morrow evening. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a program of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Philadelphia audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of concerts, one of which was given in Philadelphia, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least.

This particular work, it is amusing to note, is one which as much as anything he has written, has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact, the first and second parts of the Trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas.

The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled I Piccolomini, is now called Max and Thekla.

The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamouroux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888.

The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D Major, Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 1.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 3- 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Starting its twenty-third season in Philadelphia with the largest subscription it has had in five years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck will give the first concert of the year in the Academy of Music on tomorrow (Monday) evening at 8.15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a program of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Philadelphia audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy entitled "Wallerstein." The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D major, Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 1.

KARL MUCK
Conductor Boston Symphony.
—Photo by Gare.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 3 - 1907

The Lyric Theater.

Starting its twenty-third season in Baltimore with one of the largest subscriptions in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, at 8:15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a program of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Baltimore audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Baltimore, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic descent from Cesar Franck, and, while he does not push his modern tendencies so far as Debussy, he is as far advanced as any men that are writing in Germany.

This particular work, it is amusing to note, is one which, as much as anything he has written, has brought to D'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact, the first aand second parts of the trilogy were written before D'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston a fortnight ago it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that D'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines layed out in this than in the lines that he has followed. The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D major and Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 3 - 1907

FIRST BOSTON CONCERT

Will Take Place At The Lyric Next Wednesday Evening.

Starting its twenty-third season in Baltimore with one of the largest subscriptions in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year at the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, at 8.15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Baltimore audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." The other works on the programme will be Bach's Suite in D major, Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 1.

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 3- 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season with its first concert in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, with a subscription which is larger than that of last year, and considerably larger than that of the year before, when the orchestra returned to this city, after an absence of several seasons. This means that there are very few desirable seats to be had for the individual concerts, and it means that this organization will have crowded houses each time it comes to the Capital City.

As announced early in the fall, there will be no soloist at this first concert, but, in response to numerous requests from patrons of the orchestra, Dr. Muck has built up a programme which consists entirely of the classics, for Mendelssohn is now reckoned in that category. Last year there were many letters received by Dr. Muck, asking him to put more familiar music on his Washington programmes, and this year it is his purpose to respond to this request so far as it is possible.

The first number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," a wildly romantic work in its day and generation, but, in comparison with the modern Frenchman and the modern Germans, it is almost severe. It embodies many of Schumann's loveliest fancies and has the warmth of feeling and of color that gives to his music its intimate charm.

The second number will be truly classical—Bach's "Suite in B Minor," for flute and string orchestra. This will give Washington an opportunity to hear Mr. Andre Maquarre, who is one of the greatest musicians on the flute that has ever come from France.

The final number will be warmly welcomed, as it is Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, better known as the "Scotch Symphony." By one of those curious freaks of fashion and change of taste, Mendelssohn has become an almost forgotten name in symphonic music, having been pushed aside by his more strenuous successors. The concert will begin at 4:30 o'clock p. m.

STAR
NOV 3- 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start its season in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 with a subscription larger than that of last year and considerably larger than that of the year before, when the orchestra returned to this city after an absence of several seasons. As announced early in the fall, there will be no soloist at this first concert, but in response to numerous requests Dr. Muck has built up a program which consists entirely of the classics, for Mendelssohn compositions are now reckoned in that category. Last year there were many letters received by Dr. Muck asking him to put more familiar music on his Washington programs, and this year it is his purpose to respond to this request so far as it is possible. The first number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva," a widely romantic work in its day and generation, but in comparison with the modern Frenchmen and the modern Germans it is almost severe. The second number will be truly classical, Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and will give an opportunity to hear Mr. Andre Maquarre, who is one of the greatest masters of the flute ever brought from France.

The final number is Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, better known as the "Scotch" symphony. By one of those curious freaks of fashion and change of taste Mendelssohn has become an almost forgotten name in symphonic music, having been pushed aside by his more robust successors, and not having the might or genius of a Beethoven to hold his own. None the less he has written much pleasing music, and so long as symphonies are played, so long will Mendelssohn hold a warm corner of the heart of the music lover; and the chances are that as in literature an author is from time to time revived in the favor of the public, so in music, as the wheel goes around, Mendelssohn will come into general favor again.

From
Address
Date NOV 3- 1907

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Washington season on Tuesday afternoon at the National Theater. In accordance with the custom inaugurated last year by Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist, the real virtuosos of the afternoon being the conductor and his players. The programme will include Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and a suite in B minor by John Sebastian Bach.

[42]

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER PHILADELPHIA PA

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Famous Orchestra Ably Presents Vincent d'Indy's Masterpiece.

A programme of uncommon interest marked the opening in the Academy of Music of the twenty-third season of concerts given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The assured place of this splendid organization in the musical life of Philadelphia was never more evident than last night, when its return was welcomed by thousands of music-lovers.

The orchestra returns to us enlarged and strengthened by the new players, especially chosen by Conductor Carl Muck. Concertmeister Wendling occupied the place of Willy Hess at the first desk, and there were unfamiliar faces in the brass choir. Entering upon his second year of office, the conductor's command of the orchestra is as ever sure, firm, yet elastic, and ready on occasions to give rein to the numerical strength and instrumental diversity which contribute so markedly to the glorious ensemble work in the great climaxes.

No soloist interfered with the unity of programme. This ranged from Bach to Beethoven, and then a longer step to the subtle and intricate harmonies of Vincent d'Indy. D'Indy's Wallenstein symphonic triology is, both in intent and result, programme music of advanced type. The "book" chosen for illustration or for expression in a related medium is a loosely compiled story based upon the Schiller play, the poet furnishing a framework upon which d'Indy wove a tapestry of gorgeous sound. Seven years of work and thought are represented. The mood of both poet and musician was romantic and heroic.

The first movement represents Wallenstein's camp, and is a tone picture of the rough life and the sometimes rougher pleasures of such an existence. It is dominated by great episodes descriptive of Wallenstein's granite personality. This Wallenstein motive overshadows again the lyric second movement, wherein the tragic loves of Max and Thekla find lamentable defeat. The last movement is melancholy and sombre, a dirge of sorrow and death. Each theme in the symphony is not a mere sequence of gracefully related notes, but the result of intellectual search and selection to the end of greater expressive power. Doctor Muck brought from this intricate score an infinity of detail and illuminating effects, the playing of his orchestra being always richly colored, with vivacious utterance for the lighter moods and a spirit of romance that was almost mediaeval for the whole.

The orchestra may have been holding back for the exactions of the D'Indy score which was to follow, but certainly it has played the Bach D major suite with a more ingratiating charm for the overture and the final numbers, though the singing quality of the violins during the famous air for the G string left nothing to be desired. The Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 1 was given dignified presentment.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om

dress

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Opening of the Season Introduces a Vincent d'Indy Trilogy.

From Johann Sebastian Bach to Vincent d'Indy is a long journey musically, yet the ancient classicist as well as the modern Frenchman were both represented on the program of the Boston Symphony's concert last evening at the Academy of Music. This was the orchestra's first concert of the local season, and interest centred in the d'Indy number—a musical setting of Schiller's "Wallenstein:" which was heard for the first time in this city last evening. A greater contrast is harder to imagine than that which exists between the Bach suite in D major, with which the concert opened, and this musical trilogy of the French master, with which the program closed. On the one hand was the precise form of the old German musician, on the other the orchestral coloring and freedom of the modern school.

The Wagnerian method is very evident in this symphonic form in three parts, which paints with much vividness the various episodes in Schiller's dramas, beginning with the scene in Wallenstein's camp and ending with the death of the hero.

In the first part we have the slow syncopateal valse, the sermon of the Caupchin monk quaintly delivered by the bassoons, and the riot of an encampment crowded with movement: the second part is a passionate love scene between Max and Thekla, then an ominous introduction begins the third part, which paints Wallenstein's death.

Although capable of an interpretation of this sort, this work of d'Indy's is not "program music" in the ordinary acceptance of the term, but a symphonic work of great beauty and much originality.

In addition to the numbers just mentioned last evening's program included Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the best organization of its kind in America, it is scarcely necessary to say that its playing last evening was superb. Dr. Karl Muck's men show no falling off in the quality of their work—which was much appreciated by the audience.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC LEDGER PHILADELPHIA PA

Address

Date

STARTING its 23d season in this city with the largest subscription it has had in five years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloists at this concert, but Doctor Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Philadelphia audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Philadelphia. He is the leader of the school of modern French composers who trace their artistic descent from Cesar Franck, and while he does not push his modern tendencies so far as Debussy, he is yet emphatically of this day and its artistic thought.

This particular work is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact the first and second parts of the Trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston a fortnight ago it was greeted with enthusiasm by both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines laid out in this than in the lines that he has followed.

The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's triology of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements, and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." The work was begun in 1873-74. It was completed about 1881. The third movement was first performed at a concert in Paris, March 14, 1880. The first movement, "Wallenstein's Camp," was first performed at a concert of the National Society, Paris, April 12, 1880.

The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamoureux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888. His whole work has been performed by the Chicago Orchestra in 1901, and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a fortnight ago, and parts of it have been played by the Chicago and Cincinnati Orchestras.

The other works on the programme will be Bach's suite in D major and Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. 1.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m

ess

e

NOV 3-

Starting its twenty-third season in Philadelphia with the largest subscription it has had in five years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year at the Academy of Music on to-morrow evening. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a program of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Philadelphia audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of concerts, one of which was given in Philadelphia, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least.

This particular work, it is amusing to note, is one which as much as anything he has written, has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact, the first and second parts of the Trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas.

The composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled I Piccolomini, is now called Max and Thekla.

The first performance of the trilogy complete was at a Lamouroux concert in Paris, March 4, 1888. The trilogy had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, December 1, 1888.

The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D Major, Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 1.

* * *

[42]

PHILADELPHIA PA

NOV 3-

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Starting its twenty-third season in Philadelphia with the largest subscription it has had in five years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck will give the first concert of the year in the Academy of Music on tomorrow (Monday) evening at 8.15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a program of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Philadelphia audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy entitled "Wallerstein." The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D major, Beethoven's overture "Leonore" No. 1.

KARL MUCK
Conductor Boston Symphony.
—Photo by Gare.

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The Lyric Theater.

Starting its twenty-third season in Baltimore with one of the largest subscriptions in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, at 8:15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a program of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Baltimore audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." Vincent d'Indy, it will be remembered, was brought to America two years ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct a series of its concerts, one of which was given in Baltimore, and if the distinguished Frenchman did not leave a deep impression as a conductor, the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. D'Indy is the leader of the school of modern French composers that trace their artistic descent from Cesar Franck, and, while he does not push his modern tendencies so far as Debussy, he is as far advanced as any men that are writing in Germany.

This particular work, it is amusing to note, is one which, as much as anything he has written, has brought to D'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact, the first aand second parts of the trilogy were written before D'Indy had been in Germany and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston a fortnight ago it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that D'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines layed out in this than in the lines that he has followed. The other works on the program will be Bach's Suite in D major and Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 1.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD WASHINGTON D C

NOV 3- 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season with its first concert in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, with a subscription which is larger than that of last year, and considerably larger than that of the year before, when the orchestra returned to this city, after an absence of several seasons. This means that there are very few desirable seats to be had for the individual concerts, and it means that this organization will have crowded houses each time it comes to the Capital City.

As announced early in the fall, there will be no soloist at this first concert, but, in response to numerous requests from patrons of the orchestra, Dr. Muck has built up a programme which consists entirely of the classics, for Mendelssohn is now reckoned in that category. Last year there were many letters received by Dr. Muck, asking him to put more familiar music on his Washington programmes, and this year it is his purpose to respond to this request so far as it is possible.

The first number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," a wildly romantic work in its day and generation, but, in comparison with the modern Frenchman and the modern Germans, it is almost severe. It embodies many of Schumann's loveliest fancies and has the warmth of feeling and of color that gives to his music its intimate charm.

The second number will be truly classical—Bach's "Suite in B Minor," for flute and string orchestra. This will give Washington an opportunity to hear Mr. Andre Maquarre, who is one of the greatest musicians on the flute that has ever come from France.

The final number will be warmly welcomed, as it is Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, better known as the "Scotch Symphony." By one of those curious freaks of fashion and change of taste, Mendelssohn has become an almost forgotten name in symphonic music, having been pushed aside by his more strenuous successors. The concert will begin at 4:30 o'clock p. m.

NOV 3- 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start its season in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 with a subscription larger than that of last year and considerably larger than that of the year before, when the orchestra returned to this city after an absence of several seasons. As announced early in the fall, there will be no soloist at this first concert, but in response to numerous requests Dr. Muck has built up a program which consists entirely of the classics, for Mendelssohn compositions are now reckoned in that category. Last year there were many letters received by Dr. Muck asking him to put more familiar music on his Washington programs, and this year it is his purpose to respond to this request so far as it is possible. The first number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva," a wide-ly romantic work in its day and genera-tion, but in comparison with the modern Frenchmen and the modern Germans it is almost severe. The second number will be truly classical, Bach's suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and will give an opportunity to hear Mr. Andre Maquarre, who is one of the great-est masters of the flute ever brought from France.

The final number is Mendelssohn's sym-phony in A minor, better known as the "Scotch" symphony. By one of those curious freaks of fashion and change of taste Mendelssohn has become an almost forgotten name in symphonic music, hav-ing been pushed aside by his more robust successors, and not having the might or genius of a Beethoven to hold his own. None the less he has written much pleas-ing music, and so long as symphonies are played, so long will Mendelssohn hold a warm corner of the heart of the music lover; and the chances are that as in liter-ature an author is from time to time re-vived in the favor of the public, so in music, as the wheel goes around, Men-delssohn will come into general favor again.

NEWS BOSTON MASS

BUREAU

rom

ddress

ate NOV 3- 1907

FIRST BOSTON CONCERT

Will Take Place At The Lyric Next Wednesday Evening.

Starting its twenty-third season in Baltimore with one of the largest subscriptions in its history, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the first concert of the year at the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, at 8.15 o'clock. In accordance with the announcement made earlier in the season, there will be no soloist at this concert, but Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of more than ordinary interest, the chief work on which will be new to Baltimore audiences. This is Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, entitled "Wallenstein." The other works on the programme will be Bach's Suite in D major. Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 1.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Washington season on Tuesday afternoon at the National Theater. In accordance with the custom inaugurated last year by Dr. Muck, there will be no soloist, the real virtuosos of the afternoon being the conductor and his players. The programme will include Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, and a suite in B minor by John Sebastian Bach.

POST
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 3- 1907

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start its season with its first concert in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon. The first number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva," a wildly romantic work in its day and generation, but in comparison with the modern Frenchman and the modern Germans, it is almost severe.

The second number will be truly classical, Bach's Suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and this will give Washington an opportunity to hear Mr. Andre Maquarre, who is one of the greatest musicians of the flute that has ever been brought from France.

The final number will be warmly welcomed, as it is Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, better known as the "Scotch" symphony. By one of those curious freaks of fashion and change of taste, Mendelssohn has become an almost forgotten name in symphonic music, having been pushed aside by his more strenuous successors, and not having the might of genius of a Beethoven to hold his own. None the less he has written much pleasing music, and so long as symphonies are played, so long will Mendelssohn hold a warm corner of the heart of the music lovers.

The concert will begin at 4:30 p. m.

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 3- 1907

The late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler on having all his violin bows exactly the same, and it was a very beautiful sight to see the bows of the great violins and the second rise and fall with exactness.

Mr. Gericke did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, datly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone, and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel, and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion."

Dr. Muck is not alone in this, as nearly all the great conductors of the day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

STAR.
NOV 3- 1907

The program for the first Boston Symphony concert will comprise Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," Bach's "Suite in B Minor" and the "Scotch Symphony," by Mendelssohn.

Boston, 1881; New York, 1884

NEWARK, N. J.
NOV 2- 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski.

The most important and interesting event that will mark the musical season here will be the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9. This famous organization, which has no superior and few equals of its kind in the world, never has appeared in this city or near neighborhood, and its coming must be regarded as a red-letter event. Outside of its home city, and New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, the Boston Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, is seldom heard, and in [illegible] cities the management is secured [illegible] financial loss by a large subscription [illegible]. Last year, Rochester, N. Y., was the only city besides those regularly visited by it to be included in the tour, and so keen was the interest felt in its appearance there that all the seats in the concert hall were subscribed for [illegible] days after the announcement was made. The inclusion of Newark this season is a cause for congratulation on the part of all who desire to hear this city as perfect and noble [illegible] performances as it is possible [illegible] musicians to give.

TIMES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 4- 1907

Symphony Concert At National

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start its season with its first concert in the new National Theater tomorrow afternoon, with a subscription which is larger than that of last year, and considerably larger than that of the year before, when the orchestra returned to this city after an absence of several seasons.

As announced early in the fall, there will be no soloists at this first concert, but in response to numerous requests from patrons of the orchetra, Dr. Muck has built up a program which consists entirely of the classics, for Mendelssohn is now reckoned in that category. Last year there were many letters received by Dr. Muck, asking him to put more familiar music on his Washington programs, and this year it is his purpose to respond to this request so far as it is possible. The first number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," a wildly romantic work in its day and generation.

The second number will be truly classical, Bach's Suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and this will give Washington an opportunity to hear Andre Maquarre, who is considered one of the greatest musicians of the flute that has ever been brought from France. The final number in question will be warmly welcomed, as it is Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, better known as the "Scotch" Symphony.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N. Y. EVG SUN
NOV 6- 1907

Programme makers will do well to take a leaf out of Dr. Karl Muck's American notebook. Next Saturday afternoon, it is true, he is making a bold innovation here. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral." At his first concert in Boston this fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major suite, but the concert was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinée he cut out the Bach suite.

Dr. Muck has learned much about New York in his five flying visits last year.

NEW YORK HERALD,
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1907.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS ARTISTICALLY

Its First New York Concert This Season Is Given in Carnegie Hall Before Large Audience.

LACKS POPULAR INTEREST

Programme Makes No Concession to Public Taste, but Is Presented in Fine Style.

With Dr. Karl Muck at its head, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was an enormous and a fashionable one, but it was sparing in its applause.

The reason for the latter circumstance might be found in the fact that the programme contained little or no concession to public taste. It was composed of music by those famous B's in music, Bach, Beethoven and Bouckner. The latter much neglected master was represented by his Ninth Symphony, a work that is unfinished, but still takes an hour to perform.

It was evident the audience took precious little interest in the work, applauding gingerly even the wonderful Scherzo. But the remaining two movements are works that afford more material for study than for enjoyment. There is a beautiful moment to be enjoyed here, especially in the third movement, but the intervals are of uninteresting lengths and obvious unevenness.

Like a breeze of fresh air came the Bach Suite No. 2, the solo flute part being exquisitely played by Mr. Andre Maduarre, first flautist of the orchestra. The final number was Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 1 overture.

Dr. Muck conducted masterfully, and the playing of the orchestra was a joy. During the summer some changes have been made in the personnel, but last night's concert seemed to prove that these changes were if anything for the better.

MORE BRUCKNER PROBLEMS

HIS LAST SYMPHONY GIVEN BY DR. MUCK.

The Boston Orchestra Wastes Its Sweetness on the Desert Air—A Suite by Bach Heard With Relief by a Puzzled and Wearied Audience—Beethoven Also Performed.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to town again. It gave the first concert of its season last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony, in D minor; Bach's B minor suite for strings and flute, with Andre Maquarre, first flute of the organization, as the solo performer, and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. The Bruckner composition was heard for the first time in New York, having been unusually slow among new things in reaching this city.

The first movement of this symphony was begun toward the end of April, 1891. The composer had advanced as far as the completion of the scherzo by February, 1894. The adagio was finished on October 31, 1894. Bruckner died in 1896, leaving some shadowy sketches of the last movement. The first performance of the three parts left by him took place in Vienna in 1903. Bruckner's "Te Deum" was employed as a conclusion to the symphony. The first performance in this country was by the Chicago Orchestra, under Theodore Thomas, on February 20, 1904. It was given in Boston under Mr. Gericke on March 31 and April 2 of the same year.

For the instruction and uplifting of this public Dr. Muck has already produced the seventh symphony of Bruckner, a work which contained at least one movement worthy of a seat before the throne of Beethoven and Brahms, but the three movements heard last night were sorry and depressing companions to the thoughts of Beethoven and Bach with which they were associated.

An analytical description of this composition would be almost as tiresome as the music itself. Rather let the performance pass into the limbo of all sad things with a fleeting record of impressions. The solemn presentation of final and unfinished works by misunderstood masters sometimes palls upon even the most indefatigable listener, and the frequent parade of the morituri te salutamus becomes distasteful to delicate sensibilities.

If it be necessary to the preservation of the peace of nations, let us grant that Bruckner was a genius. If we must do so let us admit that he was the champion of Wagnerism in symphonic guise. We cannot by either process rid ourselves of the conviction that he was an artistic ascetic, dwelling in a region of melancholy brooding, shut out from that touch of nature which makes the world kin.

A dreamer of dreams, he was not a seer of visions. A worshipper of ideals, he was not a creator of ideas. He conceived his compositions in the sterility of an emotionless love, brought them to birth in the labor of a stern determination and reared them under the rod of an almost fanatic self-flagellation.

The results were children of fancy, pallid, intellectual, anæmic. Weingartner admired the man for his unswerving devotion to his own unpopular ideals, but sometimes such ideals, as in the case of Wagner's, have in them the potentiality of a world compelling force. Like Emerson's perfect reform, they begin as private opinions and end as such.

But Bruckner's ideals are individual. At least so they seem now. Conductors, carried away by wonder at the rigorous continence of the musical treatment of the theme, the anchoritic abstinence from every thing that can appeal to mere sense and the scholastic hold of all that seems abstruse and abstractly scientific in the art of musical construction labor to endear him to the populace, but the populace, as a part of it did last night, turns a cold shoulder upon it and revels in the simple, hearty, direct utterance of old Bach.

One could well fancy last night that he heard the auditors saying with one accord: "We are sorry that this earnest and hard working person died before he wrote the last movement, but nevertheless we wish that since this had to happen it had happened before he wrote the first." Even the scherzo, which contains some flashes of melodic grace and some sweetness of instrumental diction, did not suffice to lift the lethargy into which the acidulous first movement sank the hearers. The final adagio invited to darkness and slumber, and doubtless there were many who wished that they dared to sleep openly in the sight of men.

We trust that Dr. Muck will spare this public further hearings of Bruckner's demonstrations of thematic theorems with corollaries on harmonic coefficients. There is enough beautiful music to provide New York with entertainment less narcotic. Let these learned proclamations be reserved for the academic consideration of the Bostonians.

After the Bruckner composition the second of Bach's four orchestral "partien" came with a benison of sweetness and light. Mr. Maquarre played the flute part exquisitely and Rudolph Krasselt also commanded praise for his treatment of the 'cello obligato. The arrangement used was that of Dr. von Bülow. The audience signified its pleasure in no uncertain manner.

There was a time when Bach was thought to be somewhat [illegible]

It remains only to be said that Dr. Muck conducted last night with his unfailing insight and that the orchestra, though disclosing some important changes in its ranks, played like the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE.
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1907.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Why Dr. Muck should have exacted a penance from his subscribers at the first concert of this year's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it would be difficult to explain. To endure it was sufficient; there is neither desire nor energy left for the inquiry. Few of the subscribers were prepared for the blow, and few for that half of the panacea which came with the concluding number of the programme—the third of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his one opera. The other half was reasonably familiar, for it consisted of Bach's Suite in B minor, in which the grand old man of Leipsic, unmindful of the prejudice against the flute which future generations were to feel, gave that mellifluous instrument a leading part. The affliction, which endured an hour by the watch, was Bruckner's unfinished Symphony in D minor. It is a part of history that the composer, feeling his vital forces ebbing away, remarked to a friend that his "Te Deum" might be performed as a concluding number. A pious feeling, with which it would be churlish to quarrel, has prompted a compliance with this suggestion on at least one occasion in Germany; last night it was left for the audience to feel "Te Deum laudamus," that as much of the symphony as was written had been disposed of. The work is not new: it has been given a hearing by the Boston Orchestra in its own city, under Mr. Gericke, and by Mr. Theodore Thomas's band in Chicago, and at a Cincinnati festival. Two of these performances the present reviewer listened to with all the patient interest entailed upon him by duty; and he has never felt disposed to quarrel with the conductors who declined to put it into their schemes. Their reasons were doubtless ample to satisfy their artistic consciences, nor were they, necessarily, influenced by the easy wit which suggested that the symphony, being its composer's ninth and being in the key of Beethoven's ninth, should, like the latter, have a choral ending. But there is no reason why criticism should close its mouth in the presence of this work. There is no reason why—in spite of the simple, unaffected personal character of the composer, of which his champions make so much—it should not say that instead of being dedicated as he wished to the "dear Lord Almighty," it ought to be dedicated to the ineffable merit of the Rule of Three or the arithmetical table of Land or Square Measure. If ever there was a symphony built up by rule of thumb—no less rule of thumb because it is that of a master technician—this is one. In invention of theme it is scarcely worthy of discussion, because when it presents a really pregnant thought that thought is not original. The composer's high imaginativeness has been lauded by no less an authority than Mr. Weingartner, but what praise ought we to have for an imagination which exhausts itself in mere reiteration of a thought—not developing its psychological contents, but simply presenting it over and over again with change of color—not moving it onward through a gamut of emotions, but simply piling it up, block on top of block until the composer's skill is exhausted and the hearer's endurance exhausted? It is a timid criticism which becomes dumb in the presence of a work of art only because it gives evidence of technical mastery. What the entire art-world—not only the musical—is suffering from is too much (heaven save the word!) virtuosity.

It was a fine audience that heard Bruckner's symphony last night, though not as numerous as most of its predecessors last year. It heard the work respectfully, and got all the recompense it could out of the Bach suite and the Beethoven overture. In the former M. Maquarre distinguished himself greatly by his performance of the flute part. He dignified the instrument and put to shame the ancient jests about the want of dignity in the flute. The jests are hoary with age. "What is worse than a flute?" is an old German conundrum, and the popular answer is attributed to Mozart, "Two." "As the Greeks say," remarks Cicero somewhere, "when one cannot play the kithara he takes up the flute." But the flute is a noble orchestral instrument, as all who heard Mr. Maquarre last night will allow. The overture, "Leonore No. 1," ought to be heard more frequently. It is impressed all over with the master's individuality. It has none of the stature of the "Leonore" overtures which preceded it, but it is beautiful; it has character, and why it should not take a place of prominence in the concert lists, it would be difficult to explain. It is the proper introduction to the opera for which it was written.

H. E. K.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
VOGUE.
NEW YORK
NOV 7- 1907

ADVANCE PROGRAMMES

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, will give its opening New York concerts at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, 7 and 9 November. The programme of the first concert will include Bruckner's unfinished ninth symphony, a Bach suite and Beethoven's first Leonore overture. The matinée programme will be devoted to Mozart's G minor symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral symphony.

[43]

POST

35

NOV 3- 1907

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start its season with its first concert in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon. The first number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva," a wildly romantic work in its day and generation, but in comparison with the modern Frenchman and the modern Germans, it is almost severe.

The second number will be truly classical, Bach's Suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and this will give Washington an opportunity to hear Mr. Andre Maquarre, who is one of the greatest musicians of the flute that has ever been brought from France.

The final number will be warmly welcomed, as it is Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, better known as the "Scotch" symphony. By one of those curious freaks of fashion and change of taste, Mendelssohn has become an almost forgotten name in symphonic music, having been pushed aside by his more strenuous successors, and not having the might of genius of a Beethoven to hold his own. None the less he has written much pleasing music, and so long as symphonies are played, so long will Mendelssohn hold a warm corner of the heart of the music lovers.

The concert will begin at 4:30 p. m.

HERALD

WASHINGTON, D. C.

8

The late Theodore Thomas was a great stickler on having all his violin bows exactly the same, and it was a very beautiful sight to see the bows of the first violins and the second rise and fall with exactness.

Mr. Gericke did not go so far as Mr. Thomas, but he used to tell the strings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to keep together as well as they conveniently could, as the public had been educated to like that sort of thing. Dr. Muck, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, flatly says that he does not want his violins to bow together. "It is not so beautiful to look at," he says, "but that is not the kind of beauty we are after. I want tone, and I want each one of the violins to be unhampered in securing tone. They are of different schools and different teachers. Some will play a passage best with the toe of the bow, others with the heel, and others with the middle. I want them to play in their own way to secure the best tone, and that end cannot be attained by compelling all of them to bow exactly in the same fashion."

Dr. Muck is not alone in this, as nearly all the great conductors of the day believe in giving their violinists the widest latitude in their methods of bowing.

TIMES,

WASHINGTON, D. C.

NOV 4- 1907

Symphony Concert At National

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start its season with its first concert in the new National Theater tomorrow afternoon, with a subscription which is larger than that of last year, and considerably larger than that of the year before, when the orchestra returned to this city after an absence of several seasons.

As announced early in the fall, there will be no soloists at this first concert, but in response to numerous requests from patrons of the orchetra, Dr. Muck has built up a program which consists entirely of the classics, for Mendelssohn is now reckoned in that category. Last year there were many letters received by Dr. Muck, asking him to put more familiar music on his Washington programs, and this year it is his purpose to respond to this request so far as it is possible. The first number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," a wildly romantic work in its day and generation.

The second number will be truly classical, Bach's Suite in B minor, for flute and string orchestra, and this will give Washington an opportunity to hear Andre Maquarre, who is considered one of the greatest musicians of the flute that has ever been brought from France. The final number in question will be warmly welcomed, as it is Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, better known as the "Scotch" Symphony.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

ress .....

Programme makers will do well to take a leaf out of Dr. Karl Muck's American notebook. Next Saturday afternoon, it is true, he is making a bold innovation here. The programme will consist solely of two symphonies, Mozart's G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral." At his first concert in Boston this fall he gave these two symphonies and Bach's D major suite, but the concert was found to run over two hours, so for the New York matinée he cut out the Bach suite.

Dr. Muck has learned much about New York in his five flying visits last year.

NEW YORK HERALD,

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1907.

NOV 3- 1907

the program for the first Boston Symony concert will comprise Schumann's erture, "Genoveva," Bach's "Suite in Minor" and the "Scotch Symphony," by ndelssohn.

...ton, 1881; New York, 1884

NEW YORK CITY

NOV 2- 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski.

The most important and interesting event that will mark the musical season here will be the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9. This famous organization, which has no superior and few equals among its kind in the world, never has appeared in this city or near neighborhood, and its coming must be regarded as a red-letter event. Outside of its home city, and New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, the Boston orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, is seldom heard, and in those cities the management is secured against financial loss by a large subscription guarantee. Last year, Rochester, N. Y., was the only city besides those regularly visited by it to be included in its tour, and so keen was the interest felt in its appearance there that all the seats in the concert hall were subscribed for within two days after the announcement of its coming. The inclusion of Newark in its tour this season is a cause for congratulation on the part of all who desire to have in this city as perfect and noble orchestral performances as it is possible for any band of musicians to give.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS ARTISTICALLY

Its First New York Concert This Season Is Given in Carnegie Hall Before Large Audience.

LACKS POPULAR INTEREST

Programme Makes No Concession to Public Taste, but Is Presented in Fine Style.

With Dr. Karl Muck at its head, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was an enormous and a fashionable one, but it was sparing in its applause.

The reason for the latter circumstance might be found in the fact that the programme contained little or no concession to public taste. It was composed of music by those famous B's in music, Bach, Beethoven and Bouckner. The latter much neglected master was represented by his Ninth Symphony, a work that is unfinished, but still takes an hour to perform.

It was evident the audience took precious little interest in the work, applauding gingerly even the wonderful Scherzo. But the remaining two movements are works that afford more material for study than for enjoyment. There is a beautiful moment to be enjoyed here, especially in the third movement, but the intervals are of uninteresting lengths and obvious unevenness.

Like a breeze of fresh air came the Bach Suite No. 2, the solo flute part being exquisitely played by Mr. Andre Maduarre, first flautist of the orchestra. The final number was Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 1 overture.

Dr. Muck conducted masterfully, and the playing of the orchestra was a joy. During the summer some changes have been made in the personnel, but last night's concert semed to prove that these changes were if anything for the better.

MORE BRUCKNER PROBLEMS

HIS LAST SYMPHONY GIVEN BY DR. MUCK.

The Boston Orchestra Wastes Its Sweetness on the Desert Air—A Suite by Bach Heard With Relief by a Puzzled and Wearied Audience—Beethoven Also Performed.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to town again. It gave the first concert of its season last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony, in D minor; Bach's B minor suite for strings and flute, with Andre Maquarre, first flute of the organization, as the solo performer, and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. The Bruckner composition was heard for the first time in New York, having been unusually slow among new things in reaching this city.

The first movement of this symphony was begun toward the end of April, 1891. The composer had advanced as far as the completion of the scherzo by February, 1894. The adagio was finished on October 31, 1894. Bruckner died in 1896, leaving some shadowy sketches of the last movement. The first performance of the three parts left by him took place in Vienna in 1903. Bruckner's "Te Deum" was employed as a conclusion to the symphony. The first performance in this country was by the Chicago Orchestra, under Theodore Thomas, on February 20, 1904. It was given in Boston under Mr. Gericke on March 31 and April 2 of the same year.

For the instruction and uplifting of this public Dr. Muck has already produced the seventh symphony of Bruckner, a work which contained at least one movement worthy of a seat before the throne of Beethoven and Brahms, but the three movements heard last night were sorry and depressing companions to the thoughts of Beethoven and Bach with which they were associated.

An analytical description of this composition would be almost as tiresome as the music itself. Rather let the performance pass into the limbo of all sad things with a fleeting record of impressions. The solemn presentation of final and unfinished works by misunderstood masters sometimes palls upon even the most indefatigable listener, and the frequent parade of the morituri te salutamus becomes distasteful to delicate sensibilities.

If it be necessary to the preservation of the peace of nations, let us grant that Bruckner was a genius. If we must do so let us admit that he was the champion of Wagnerism in symphonic guise. We cannot by either process rid ourselves of the conviction that he was an artistic ascetic, dwelling in a region of melancholy brooding, shut out from that touch of nature which makes the world kin.

A dreamer of dreams, he was not a seer of visions. A worshipper of ideals, he was not a creator of ideas. He conceived his compositions in the sterility of an emotionless love, brought them to birth in the labor of a stern determination and reared them under the rod of an almost fanatic self-flagellation.

The results were children of fancy, pallid, intellectual, anæmic. Weingartner admired the man for his unswerving devotion to his own unpopular ideals, but sometimes such ideals, as in the case of Wagner's, have in them the potentiality of a world compelling force. Like Emerson's perfect reform, they begin as private opinions and end as such.

But Bruckner's ideals are individual. At least so they seem now. Conductors, carried away by wonder at the rigorous continence of the musical treatment of the theme, the anchoritic abstinence from every thing that can appeal to mere sense and the scholastic hold of all that seems abstruse and abstractly scientific in the art of musical construction labor to endear him to the populace, but the populace, as a part of it did last night, turns a cold shoulder upon it and revels in the simple, hearty, direct utterance of old Bach.

One could well fancy last night that he heard the auditors saying with one accord: "We are sorry that this earnest and hard working person died before he wrote the last movement, but nevertheless we wish that since this had to happen it had happened before he wrote the first." Even the scherzo, which contains some flashes of melodic grace and some sweetness of instrumental diction, did not suffice to lift the lethargy into which the acidulous first movement sank the hearers. The final adagio invited to darkness and slumber, and doubtless there were many who wished that they dared to sleep openly in the sight of men.

We trust that Dr. Muck will spare this public further hearings of Bruckner's demonstrations of thematic theorems with corollaries on harmonic coefficients. There is enough beautiful music to provide New York with entertainment less narcotic. Let these learned proclamations be reserved for the academic consideration of the Bostonians.

After the Bruckner composition the second of Bach's four orchestral "partien" came with a benison of sweetness and light. Mr. Maquarre played the flute part exquisitely and Rudolph Krasselt also commanded praise for his treatment of the 'cello obbligato. The arrangement used was that of Dr. von Bülow. The audience signified its pleasure in no uncertain manner.

There was a time when Bach was thought to be somewhat too serious a composer for such a light minded public as ours, but it has been one of the singular and beneficial triumphs of the "intensely modern" Teutons that they have shown us that Bach was no orator like Antony, but a plain, blunt man speaking that which he did know.

It remains only to be said that Dr. Muck conducted last night with his unfailing insight and that the orchestra, though disclosing some important changes in its ranks, played like the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1907.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Why Dr. Muck should have exacted a penance from his subscribers at the first concert of this year's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it would be difficult to explain. To endure it was sufficient; there is neither desire nor energy left for the inquiry. Few of the subscribers were prepared for the blow, and few for that half of the panacea which came with the concluding number of the programme—the third of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his one opera. The other half was reasonably familiar, for it consisted of Bach's Suite in B minor, in which the grand old man of Leipsic, unmindful of the prejudice against the flute which future generations were to feel, gave that mellifluous instrument a leading part. The affliction, which endured an hour by the watch, was Bruckner's unfinished Symphony in D minor. It is a part of history that the composer, feeling his vital forces ebbing away, remarked to a friend that his "Te Deum" might be performed as a concluding number. A pious feeling, with which it would be churlish to quarrel, has prompted a compliance with this suggestion on at least one occasion in Germany; last night it was left for the audience to feel "Te Deum laudamus," that as much of the symphony as was written had been disposed of. The work is not new: it has been given a hearing by the Boston Orchestra in its own city, under Mr. Gericke, and by Mr. Theodore Thomas's band in Chicago, and at a Cincinnati festival. Two of these performances the present reviewer listened to with all the patient interest entailed upon him by duty; and he has never felt disposed to quarrel with the conductors who declined to put it into their schemes. Their reasons were doubtless ample to satisfy their artistic consciences, nor were they, necessarily, influenced by the easy wit which suggested that the symphony, being its composer's ninth and being in the key of Beethoven's ninth, should, like the latter, have a choral ending. But there is no reason why criticism should close its mouth in the presence of this work. There is no reason why—in spite of the simple, unaffected personal character of the composer, of which his champions make so much—it should not say that instead of being dedicated as he wished to the "dear Lord Almighty," it ought to be dedicated to the ineffable merit of the Rule of Three or the arithmetical table of Land or Square Measure. If ever there was a symphony built up by rule of thumb—no less rule of thumb because it is that of a master technician—this is one. In invention of theme it is scarcely worthy of discussion, because when it presents a really pregnant thought that thought is not original. The composer's high imaginativeness has been lauded by no less an authority than Mr. Weingartner, but what praise ought we to have for an imagination which exhausts itself in mere reiteration of a thought—not developing its psychological contents, but simply presenting it over and over again with change of color—not moving it onward through a gamut of emotions, but simply piling it up, block on top of block until the composer's skill is exhausted and the hearer's endurance exhausted? It is a timid criticism which becomes dumb in the presence of a work of art only because it gives evidence of technical mastery. What the entire art-world—not only the musical—is suffering from is too much (heaven save the word!) virtuosity.

It was a fine audience that heard Bruckner's symphony last night, though not as numerous as most of its predecessors last year. It heard the work respectfully, and got all the recompense it could out of the Bach suite and the Beethoven overture. In the former M. Maquarre distinguished himself greatly by his performance of the flute part. He dignified the instrument and put to shame the ancient jests about the want of dignity in the flute. The jests are hoary with age. "What is worse than a flute?" is an old German conundrum, and the popular answer is attributed to Mozart, "Two." "As the Greeks say," remarks Cicero somewhere, "when one cannot play the kithara he takes up the flute." But the flute is a noble orchestral instrument, as all who heard Mr. Maquarre last night will allow. The overture, "Leonore No. 1," ought to be heard more frequently. It is impressed all over with the master's individuality. It has none of the stature of the "Leonore" overtures which preceded it, but it is beautiful; it has character, and why it should not take a place of prominence in the concert lists, it would be difficult to explain. It is the proper introduction to the opera for which it was written.

H. E. K.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

VOGUE.

n .....

ress .....

NEW YORK CITY

NOV 7- 1907

e .....

ADVANCE PROGRAMMES

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Carl Muck, conductor, will give its opening New York concerts at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, 7 and 9 November. The programme of the first concert will include Bruckner's unfinished ninth symphony, a Bach suite and Beethoven's first Leonore overture. The matinée programme will be devoted to Mozart's G minor symphony and Beethoven's Pastoral symphony.

k, 18

[43]

Paper Times
City New York
Date State N Y
NOV - 8 1907

THE music-lover, the concertgoer, the frequenter of opera, again confront the New York musical season. They again attempt to estimate what is before them, and once again, as they have so often been in the past, they are filled with amazement and wonder at the prospect, with perhaps something of foreboding as to what is likely to happen to a community to which so much music is to be administered in less than six months. Will the financial trouble that has come to New York have a disastrous effect upon a musical season upon which so many people have staked so much? New York has always shown a voracious appetite for music; but the provender that is supplied it is generally somewhat in excess of what it can swallow, even in a state of financial robustness. Some of the enterprises based on subscription were assured of success before the trouble came. Will the others be equally fortunate? The kindly disposed will hope that so much as is good will meet with all its deserts.

The recitals have already begun. The orchestral concerts began yesterday with Mr. Damrosch's series of eight Saturday night orchestra concerts, and will be continued to-day with the first of his twenty Sunday afternoon ones. One of the operatic seasons begins to-morrow night, and the other one begins a fortnight later. Both seasons will number many more performances than have been given in recent years. The orchestral concerts already arranged for are much more numerous than have ever before been heard in New York in a single season. The virtuosos that propose to visit New York are many; and a singular and not easily explicable feature of their descent is the vast preponderance among them of pianists—pianists of all grades of fame, from those with whose glory the world rings to those who are making almost their first application for public approval. Why the pianists should thus flock together, birds of a feather though they may be, toward America has not yet been explained. It is necessary to mention, without pretending to complete the list, only Paderewski, Hofmann, Hambourg, De Pachmann, Carreño, Bauer, Schelling, Katharine Goodson, Olga Samaroff, not to speak—though they should be spoken of—of American pianists who are now at home and who will not have to journey to this country to be heard. The expectations as to violinists, with Kreisler and Kubelik at their head, are less extensive; but there is no reason to despond, even here.

***

The most important element of the concert season must needs be the orchestral concerts; and of these it is correct to say that more will be given than have ever been heard before in New York. There will be the sixteen of the Philharmonic Society, (in late years increased by two extra concerts to eighteen;) the ten of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the six of the Russian Symphony, the ten of the People's Orchestra, the ten of the Young People's Society, Sam Franko's three, Arnold Volpe's three; and now Mr. Walter Damrosch has determined to plunge boldly into a great extension of his Sunday afternoon experiment of the last two or three years and give a series of twenty Sunday concerts of good orchestral music, besides eight evening concerts. There are also the Sunday night concerts by which the proprietors of the two opera houses keep their plant going and their orchestras occupied, furnishing their public with good music of a more or less popular character. Of these the Metropolitan will offer twenty, and the Manhattan a still larger number. There will also be other orchestral concerts not at present to be fully enumerated; as of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and of various soloists who wish to present themselves with the dignity and prestige that an orchestra is supposed to give. If all these things come to pass, it is very easy to reach 130 in the enumeration of the orchestral concerts of the season.

The New York Press.
NEW YORK CITY.
NOV 8 1907

CLAMMY COLDNESS FOR WORK OF MUSICAL ART

Bruckner's Ninth Symphony Given by Boston Orchestra.

CARNEGIE CROWD NOT STIRRED

Similar Strange Indifference for Other Compositions, Though Muck's Men Play with Skill.

After the clammy greeting Anton Bruckner's Ninth Symphony received last night in Carnegie Hall from a Boston Symphony audience, one was almost tempted to sympathize with certain utterances ascribed to Geraldine Farrar recently. Here was a great work of a great man played for the first time in New York, yet only a few persons in the big audience that heard it were sufficiently aware of that fact to give a show of approval. True, it may be asking too much to expect any crowd, even of moderately musical listeners, to appreciate at first hearing so tremendous a composition as this unfinished symphony. But would not one suppose that an audience of the reputed Boston Symphony type would recognize the importance of a performance like that of last night and show its gratitude to the conductor and his men for their painstaking labors?

Happily, a New York audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not typical of this city's musical culture, however representative it may be of social refinement. So it is unnecessary to despair of our public's musical taste. There are thousands of persons in New York and its suburbs capable of appreciating Bruckner. A pity that not more of them were present last night.

A mitigating circumstance, as far as Bruckner was concerned, lay in the fact that this crowd did not awaken even when Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings, in Von Bulow's arrangement, was given, except for a little fluttering of delight among occupants of first-tier boxes in the dainty final Presto, and that it failed to respond to Dr. Muck's eloquent reading of Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 1 overture. Nevertheless, the chronicler is compelled to set down the mortifying record that in the year 1907, thirteen years after its creation, Bruckner's Ninth Symphony, performed excellently for the first time in New York, had a frigid reception.

This is hardly the place to attempt a detailed exposition of the beauties of Bruckner's work, if such a thing were possible, or even to essay an elaborate pen picture of one's first impressions. It may be said, however, that a few in yesterday's audience were vividly conscious throughout the hour and ten minutes of the performance of being in the presence of a great genius, of having the first glimpse of a masterpiece which deserves a place among the very greatest compositions, and that although Bruckner died before writing the finale.

Opposing opinions no doubt will be put forward. Attacks may be made, venomous in character, such as were aimed at the Seventh Symphony. But those who felt last night the pulsating immensity of Bruckner's swan song are willing to stake their most precious possessions that this man's music will come to its own even in New York.

Was it the first gigantic movement that loomed up highest, the tragically playful Scherzo, which, by the way, would lend itself well to concert performance alone, or the grandly pathetic Adagio? Who shall say? What was there in each of these musical tone poems that made them so impressive? The thematic material; the harmonic substance; the contrapuntal workmanship; the rhythm; the instrumentation? Yes, every one of these elements, and all combined, forming a potent emotional language such as few masters of music have possessed, a mode of tonal expression that surprised, seized, dumfounded by reason of its extreme modernity, its strange anticipation of Strauss, even Debussy.

But what stamps Bruckner's work as immensely and superbly significant is not so much these qualities alone and combined as the really great ideas he puts forward, the vast poetic vistas which he communicates to those who understand him, and that in spite of his one big fault, his lack of formal sense, his awkwardness in musical architectonics. Who shall say just how these miracles of suggestion are accomplished? Analysis always falls short of the ultimate reason. But there are moments in the first movement which seem to give to the listener a conception of eternity. There are times when in his mind's eye he penetrates into experiences hitherto unknown. Great spaces open before him as he hearkens to these sounds, throwing into light things inexplicable, unaccountable, things great, awe-inspiring and beautiful.

What a scherzo! No expression this of simple mirthfulness or caprice, but a veritable whirl of gigantic ideas storming heavenward with an intensity of aspiration almost tragic. And does not the adagio touch a tenderness of feeling and pathos almost superhuman, a poignancy of emotional utterance that approaches the sublime? To write such music requires not only a nature great and incorruptible in its naivete, but the inspiration of things outside of self.

In his Ninth Symphony Bruckner reveals himself a genius worthy of a place beside Bach, Beethoven and Wagner. His niche is among the immortals.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser.
NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER.
Date NOV 9 - 1907

THE music for to-day is "Carmen" at the Manhattan Opera House, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, and Richard Buhlig's piano recital at Mendelssohn Hall this afternoon, and "Il Trovatore" at the Manhattan Opera House and Mr. Munkacsy's violin recital at Mendelssohn Hall this evening.

884.

...LKS ZEITUNG
...ress
...te NOV 8 - 1907

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Bei den Bostonern gab es gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall einen regelrechten Durchfall, ein bei diesem Elite-Corps gewiß nicht häufig vorkommendes Ereignis. Als Eröffnungsnummer des ersten Konzertes der laufenden Saison hatte der Dirigent Dr. Muck Brückner's unvollendet gebliebene 9. Symphonie gewählt, die vor Kurzem in Boston einen ehrlichen Erfolg davongetragen hatte, und siehe da, das Publikum des ausverkauften Saales ist vor diesem Koloß unrettbar durchgefallen. Es war kein Achtungsmißerfolg, kein Begräbnis erster Klasse, das Bruckner's Neunten bereitet wurde, sondern eine Arme-Leute-Affaire.

Nach dem gewaltigen ersten Satz des Werkes versuchten etwa 50 Hände einen Armen-Sünder-Applaus, der jedoch mangels Unterstützung kläglich zerfloß. Die Edsätze der Bruckner'schen Symphonien sind komplizirte, selbst für gebildetere Laien abstrus erscheinende musikalische Gebilde, die gespannteste Aufmerksamkeit erfordern, aber daß das Stammpublikum einer solch' erlesenen Organisation das geniale Scherzo und das verklärte Adagio nicht begreifen soll — das ist und bleibt unverständlich. Nach Schluß der Nummer konnte Dr. Muck sich gerade einmal dankend verneigen. Bruckner hat für die Unsterblichkeit geschrieben, nicht für das New Yorker Publikum.

An Dr. Muck und seiner Musterschaar lag es nicht. Die Aufführung durch die Bostoner war eine mustergiltige. Den ersten Satz legte Muck mit einer Klarheit und Uebersichtlichkeit dar, welche das komplicirte Gewebe dieser musikalischen Struktur deutlich bloslegte. Die drei Themen, die trotzige Wucht des ersten, das sanfte Widerspiel dazu, die tändelnde Anmuth des zweiten, und die schwärmerisch-innige Melancholie des dritten, konnten nicht prächtiger herausgebracht werden. Das Scherzo fand in Muck einen kongenialen Ausbeuter an Esprit, Schwung und Humor und das Adagio (wer anders als Bruckner hat nach Beethoven noch ein solches Adagio geschrieben?) ließ er nach den Zuckungen tiefsten Wehs seraphisch verhauchen, in edler Ruhe und Verklärtheit.

Die zweite Nummer, Bach's H-Moll-Suite für Streichorchester und Soloflöte, fand dankbarere Zuhörer.

Bach stützt sich in seinen Orchester-Suiten auf die Tanzformen. Nur der erste Satz, dreisätzig mit einer regelrechten Fuge in der Mitte, gehört der Kunstmusik an. Dann kommen Gavotten, Menuetten, Bourées, Giguen und andere Tanzweisen, gewöhnlich schlicht und einfach und nur wenig verarbeitet. Die Eigenthümlichkeit der 2. Suite besteht in der Verwendung der Flöte als Solo-Instrument, welche dem Streichorchester gegenüber gestellt ist.

Die H-Moll-Suite steckt voll Grazien. Dem ersten kunstvoll durchgeführten Satz folgt ein Rondeau, das in seiner kunstgemäßen Ausführung das einfache Suitenmaß etwas überschreitet. Es folgt eine Sarabande, in welcher die Oberstimmen mit dem Baß einen Canon in der Unterquinte durchführen. Die ferneren Sätze sind zwei Bourées, eine Polonaise, bei der ausnahmsweise eine Tempobezeichnung angegeben ist: „Moderato", ein Beweis dafür, daß Bach auf dieses Tempo besonderes Gewicht legte. Nach dem Menuett schließt eine keck rhythmisirte „Badinerie" die Suite ab.

Die H-Moll-Suite besitzt als künstlerischer Beitrag zur Kulturgeschichte noch ihren Nebenwerth, indem darin das geschniegelte, gebügelte Wesen der Gesellschaft in der Zeit des Reifrocks und der Perrücke mit dem feinsten und behaglichsten Humor musikalisch illustrirt wird. „Den Verfasser der Matthäus-Passion, den Schoepfer der protestantischen Kirchen-Kantate", so sagt Hermann Kretzschmar, „zeigt die H-Moll-Suite von seiner seltneren Seite, als einen vollendeten Kenner und Darsteller höfischen Geistes und höfischer Künste, als einen Weltkundigen, der die Etikette bis auf den raschenbarsten Pas beherrscht."

Die Bostoner spielten diese klassischen Nippesächelchen entzückend liebenswürdig und stilgerecht. Der gravitätische Humor der Zopfzeit kam bald behäbig-trippelnd, bald lebhaft-bewegt, bald duftig-aristokratisch zur Geltung. Herr André Maquarre, der Flötist, verfügt über einen nicht sonderlich großen, aber einschmeichelnd-süßen Ton und über große technische Fertigkeit. Er wurde durch Beifall ausgezeichnet.

Zum Schluß durchbrauste Beethoven's Leonoren-Ouverture, die erste der großen Vierzahl, den Saal. Dr. Muck, der zu Beginn des Konzerts herzlich begrüßt worden war, wurde lebhaft gefeiert.

H.

New York Tribune.
154 Nassau St.
NOV 8 - 1907
Date

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Why Dr. Muck should have exacted a penalty from his subscribers at the first concert of this year's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it would be difficult to explain. To endure it was sufficient; there is neither desire nor energy left for the inquiry. Few of the subscribers were prepared for the blow, and few for that half of the panacea which came with the concluding number of the programme—the third of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his one opera. The other half was reasonably familiar, for it consisted of Bach's suite in B minor, in which the grand old man of Leipsic, unmindful of the prejudice against the flute which future generations were to feel, gave that mellifluous instrument a leading part. The affliction, which endured an hour by the watch, was Bruckner's unfinished symphony in D minor. It is a part of history that the composer, feeling his vital forces ebbing away, remarked to a friend that his "Te Deum" might be performed as a concluding number. A pious feeling, with which it would be churlish to quarrel, has prompted a compliance with this suggestion on at least one occasion in Germany; last night it was left for the audience to feel "te Deum laudamus" that as much of the symphony as was written had been disposed of. The work is not new; it has been given a hearing by the Boston Orchestra in its own city, under Mr. Gericke, and by Mr. Theodore Thomas's band in Chicago, and at a Cincinnati festival. Two of these performances the present reviewer listened to with all the patient interest entailed upon him by duty; and he has never felt disposed to quarrel with the conductors who declined to put it into their schemes. Their reasons were doubtless ample to satisfy their artistic consciences, nor were they, necessarily, influenced by the easy wit which suggested that the symphony, being its composer's ninth and being in the key of Beethoven's ninth, should, like the latter, have a choral ending. But there is no reason why criticism should close its mouth in the presence of this work. There is no reason why—in spite of the simple, unaffected personal character of the composer, of which his champions make so much—it should not say that instead of being dedicated as he wished to the "dear Lord Almighty," it ought to be dedicated to the ineffable merit of the Rule of Three or the arithmetical table of Land or Square Measure. If ever there was a symphony built up by rule of thumb—no less rule of thumb because it is that of a master technician—this is one. In invention of theme it is scarcely worthy of discussion, because when it presents a really pregnant thought that thought is not original. The composer's high imaginativeness has been lauded by no less an authority than Mr. Weingartner, but what praise ought we to have for an imagination which exhausts itself in mere reiteration of a thought—not developing its psychological contents, but simply presenting it over and over again with change of color—not moving it onward through a gamut of emotions, but simply piling it up, block on top of block until the composer's skill is exhausted and the hearer's endurance exhausted? It is a timid criticism which becomes dumb in the presence of a work of art only because it gives evidence of technical mastery. What the entire art-world—not only the musical—is suffering from is too much (heaven save the word!) virtuosity.

It was a fine audience that heard Bruckner's symphony last night, though not as numerous as most of its predecessors last year. It heard the work respectfully, and got all the recompense it could out of the Bach suite and the Beethoven overture. In the former M. Maquarre distinguished himself greatly by his performance of the flute part. He dignified the instrument and put to shame the ancient jests about the want of dignity in the flute. The jests are hoary with age. "What is worse than a flute?" is an old German conundrum, and the popular answer is attributed to Mozart, "Two." "As the Greeks say," remarks Cicero somewhere, "when one cannot play the kithara he takes up the flute." But the flute is a noble orchestral instrument, as all who heard Mr. Maquarre last night will allow. The overture, "Leonore No. 1," ought to be heard more frequently. It is impressed all over with the master's individuality. It has none of the stature of the "Leonore" overtures which preceded it; but it is beautiful, it has character, and why it should not take a place of prominence in the concert lists it would be difficult to explain. It is the proper introduction to the opera for which it was written.

H. E. K.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
...s

Anton Seidl at old Steinway Hall on Dec. 10, 1888, according to Mr. Philip Hale's Boston Symphony programme notes, gave the first performance in America of Vincent D'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy," op. 12, after the dramatic poem of Schiller. Nearly nineteen years have left the music new to Twentieth century concert-goers. In the West it was done later by Theodore Thomas, also last season by Frank Van der Stücken, and this year by Frederick Stock. The new interest in this composer led Dr. Karl Muck to play the "Wallenstein" at his second Boston concert two weeks ago. He makes it his chief novelty to-night at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn.

D'Indy's three divisions of his music are entitled "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla or the Piccolomini," and "The Death of Wallenstein." The Bach suite and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture complete the Brooklyn bill.

Paper Times
City New York
Date NOV - 3 1907
State N Y

THE music-lover, the concertgoer, the frequenter of opera, again confront the New York musical season. They again attempt to estimate what is before them, and once again, as they have so often been in the past, they are filled with amazement and wonder at the prospect, with perhaps something of foreboding as to what is likely to happen to a community to which so much music is to be administered in less than six months. Will the financial trouble that has come to New York have a disastrous effect upon a musical season upon which so many people have staked so much? New York has always shown a voracious appetite for music; but the provender that is supplied it is generally somewhat in excess of what it can swallow, even in a state of financial robustness. Some of the enterprises based on subscription were assured of success before the trouble came. Will the others be equally fortunate? The kindly disposed will hope that so much as is good will meet with all its deserts.

The recitals have already begun. The orchestral concerts began yesterday with Mr. Damrosch's series of eight Saturday night orchestra concerts, and will be continued to-day with the first of his twenty Sunday afternoon ones. One of the operatic seasons begins to-morrow night, and the other one begins a fortnight later. Both seasons will number many more performances than have been given in recent years. The orchestral concerts already arranged for are much more numerous than have ever before been heard in New York in a single season. The virtuosos that propose to visit New York are many; and a singular and not easily explicable feature of their descent is the vast preponderance among them of pianists—pianists of all grades of fame, from those with whose glory the world rings to those who are making almost their first application for public approval. Why the pianists should thus flock together, birds of a feather though they may be, toward America has not yet been explained. It is necessary to mention, without pretending to complete the list, only Paderewski, Hofmann, Hambourg, De Pachmann, Carreño, Bauer, Schelling, Katharine Goodson, Olga Samaroff, not to speak—though they should be spoken of—of American pianists who are now at home and who will not have to journey to this country to be heard. The expectations as to violinists, with Kreisler and Kubelik at their head, are less extensive; but there is no reason to despond, even here.

***

The most important element of the concert season must needs be the orchestral concerts; and of these it is correct to say that more will be given than have ever been heard before in New York. There will be the sixteen of the Philharmonic Society, (in late years increased by two extra concerts to eighteen;) the ten of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the six of the Russian Symphony, the ten of the People's Orchestra, the ten of the Young People's Society, Sam Franko's three, Arnold Volpe's three; and now Mr. Walter Damrosch has determined to plunge boldly into a great extension of his Sunday afternoon experiment of the last two or three years and give a series of twenty Sunday concerts of good orchestral music, besides eight evening concerts. There are also the Sunday night concerts by which the proprietors of the two opera houses keep their plant going and their orchestras occupied, furnishing their public with good music of a more or less popular character. Of these the Metropolitan will offer twenty, and the Manhattan a still larger number. There will also be other orchestral concerts not at present to be fully enumerated; as of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and of various soloists who wish to present themselves with the dignity and prestige that an orchestra is supposed to give. If all these things come to pass, it is very easy to reach 130 in the enumeration of the orchestral concerts of the season.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
Date NOV 8 1907

CLAMMY COLDNESS FOR WORK OF MUSICAL ART

Bruckner's Ninth Symphony Given by Boston Orchestra.

CARNEGIE CROWD NOT STIRRED

Similar Strange Indifference for Other Compositions, Though Muck's Men Play with Skill.

After the clammy greeting Anton Bruckner's Ninth Symphony received last night in Carnegie Hall from a Boston Symphony audience, one was almost tempted to sympathize with certain utterances ascribed to Geraldine Farrar recently. Here was a great work of a great man played for the first time in New York, yet only a few persons in the big audience that heard it were sufficiently aware of that fact to give a show of approval. True, it may be asking too much to expect any crowd, even of moderately musical listeners, to appreciate at first hearing so tremendous a composition as this unfinished symphony. But would not one suppose that an audience of the reputed Boston Symphony type would recognize the importance of a performance like that of last night and show its gratitude to the conductor and his men for their painstaking labors?

Happily, a New York audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not typical of this city's musical culture, however representative it may be of social refinement. So it is unnecessary to despair of our public's musical taste. There are thousands of persons in New York and its suburbs capable of appreciating Bruckner. A pity that not more of them were present last night.

A mitigating circumstance, as far as Bruckner was concerned, lay in the fact that this crowd did not awaken even when Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings, in Von Bulow's arrangement, was given, except for a little fluttering of delight among occupants of first-tier boxes in the dainty final Presto, and that it failed to respond to Dr. Muck's eloquent reading of Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 1 overture. Nevertheless, the chronicler is compelled to set down the mortifying record that in the year 1907, thirteen years after its creation, Bruckner's Ninth Symphony, performed excellently for the first time in New York, had a frigid reception.

This is hardly the place to attempt a detailed exposition of the beauties of Bruckner's work, if such a thing were possible, or even to essay an elaborate pen picture of one's first impressions. It may be said, however, that a few in yesterday's audience were vividly conscious throughout the hour and ten minutes of the performance of being in the presence of a great genius, of having the first glimpse of a masterpiece which deserves a place among the very greatest compositions, and that although Bruckner died before writing the finale.

Opposing opinions no doubt will be put forward. Attacks may be made, venomous in character, such as were aimed at the Seventh Symphony. But those who felt last night the pulsating immensity of Bruckner's swan song are willing to stake their most precious possessions that this man's music will come to its own even in New York.

Was it the first gigantic movement that loomed up highest, the tragically playful Scherzo, which, by the way, would lend itself well to concert performance alone, or the grandly pathetic Adagio? Who shall say? What was there in each of these musical tone poems that made them so impressive? The thematic material: the harmonic substance; the contrapuntal workmanship; the rhythm; the instrumentation? Yes, every one of these elements, and all combined, forming a potent emotional language such as few masters of music have possessed, a mode of tonal expression that surprised, seized, dumfounded by reason of its extreme modernity, its strange anticipation of Strauss even Debussy.

But what stamps Bruckner's work as immensely and superbly significant is not so much these qualities alone and combined as the really great ideas he puts forward, the vast poetic vistas which he communicates to those who understand him, and that in spite of his one big fault, his lack of formal sense, his awkwardness in musical architectonics. Who shall say just how these miracles of suggestion are accomplished?. Analysis always falls short of the ultimate reason. But there are moments in the first movement which seem to give to the listener a conception of eternity. There are times when in his mind's eye he penetrates into experiences hitherto unknown. Great spaces open before him as he hearkens to these sounds, throwing into light things inexplicable, inaccountable, things great, awe-inspiring and beautiful.

What a scherzo! No expression this of simple mirthfulness or caprice, but a veritable whirl of gigantic ideas storming heavenward with an intensity of aspiration almost tragic. And does not the adagio touch a tenderness of feeling and pathos almost superhuman, a poignancy of emotional utterance that approaches the sublime? To write such music requires not only a nature great and incorruptible in its naivete, but the inspiration of things outside of self.

In his Ninth Symphony Bruckner reveals himself a genius worthy of a place beside Bach, Beethoven and Wagner. His niche is among the immortals.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. 1873
NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER
Date NOV 9 - 1907

THE music for to-day is "Carmen" at the Manhattan Opera House, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, and Richard Buhlig's piano recital at Mendelssohn Hall this afternoon, and "Il Trovatore" at the Manhattan Opera House and Mr. Munkacsy's violin recital at Mendelssohn Hall this evening.

884.

[44]

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Bei den Bostonern gab es gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall einen regelrechten Durchfall, ein bei diesem Elite-Corps gewiß nicht häufig vorkommendes Ereignis. Als Eröffnungsnummer des ersten Konzertes der laufenden Saison hatte der Dirigent Dr. Muck Bruckner's unvollendet gebliebene 9. Symphonie gewählt, die vor Kurzem in Boston einen ehrlichen Erfolg davongetragen hatte, und siehe da, das Publikum des ausverkauften Saales ist vor diesem Koloß unrettbar durchgefallen. Es war kein Achtungsmißerfolg, kein Begräbnis erster Klasse, das Bruckner's Neunten bereitet wurde, sondern eine Arme-Leute-Affaire.

Nach dem gewaltigen ersten Satz des Werkes versuchten etwa 50 Hände einen Armen-Sünder-Applaus, der jedoch mangels Unterstützung kläglich zerfloß. Die Ecksätze der Bruckner'schen Symphonien sind komplizirte, selbst für gebildetere Laien abstrus erscheinende musikalische Gebilde, die gespannteste Aufmerksamkeit erfordern, aber daß das Stammpublikum einer solch' erlesenen Organisation das geniale Scherzo und das verklärte Adagio nicht begreifen soll — das ist und bleibt unverständlich. Nach Schluß der Nummer konnte Dr. Muck sich gerade einmal dankend verneigen. Bruckner hat für die Unsterblichkeit geschrieben, nicht für das New Yorker Publikum.

An Dr. Muck und seiner Musterschaar lag es nicht. Die Aufführung durch die Bostoner war eine mustergiltige. Den ersten Satz legte Muck mit einer Klarheit und Uebersichtlichkeit dar, welche das komplicirte Gewebe dieser musikalischen Struktur deutlich bloslegte. Die drei Themen, die trotzige Wucht des ersten, das sanfte Widerspiel dazu, die tändelnde Anmuth des zweiten, und die schwärmerisch-innige Melancholie des dritten, konnten nicht prächtiger herausgebracht werden. Das Scherzo fand in Muck einen kongenialen Ausdeuter an Esprit, Schwung und Humor und das Adagio (wer anders als Bruckner hat nach Beethoven noch ein solches Adagio geschrieben?) ließ er nach den Zuckungen tiefsten Wehs seraphisch verhauchen, in edler Ruhe und Verklärtheit.

Die zweite Nummer, Bach's H-Moll-Suite für Streichorchester und Soloflöte, fand dankbarere Zuhörer.

Bach stützt sich in seinen Orchester-Suiten auf die Tanzformen. Nur der erste Satz, dreifätzig mit einer regelrechten Fuge in der Mitte, gehört der Kunstmusik an. Dann kommen Gavotten, Menuetten, Bourées, Giguen und andere Tanzweisen, gewöhnlich schlicht und einfach und nur wenig verarbeitet. Die Eigenthümlichkeit der 2. Suite besteht in der Verwendung der Flöte als Solo-Instrument, welche dem Streichorchester gegenüber gestellt ist.

Die H-Moll-Suite steckt voll Grazien. Dem ersten kunstvoll durchgeführten Satz folgt ein Rondeau, das in seiner kunstgemäßen Ausführung das einfache Suitenmaß etwas überschreitet. Es folgt eine Sarabande, in welcher die Oberstimmen mit dem Baß einen Canon in der Unterquinte durchführen. Die ferneren Sätze sind zwei Bourées, eine Polonaise, bei der ausnahmsweise eine Tempobezeichnung angegeben ist: „Moderato", ein Beweis dafür, daß Bach auf dieses Tempo besonderes Gewicht legte. Nach dem Menuett schließt eine keck rhythmisirte „Badinerie" die Suite ab.

Die H-Moll-Suite besitzt als künstlerischer Beitrag zur Kulturgeschichte noch ihren Nebenwerth, indem darin das geschniegelte, gebügelte Wesen der Gesellschaft in der Zeit des Reifrocks und der Perrücke mit dem feinsten und behaglichsten Humor musikalisch illustrirt wird. „Den Verfasser der Matthäus-Passion, den Schoepfer der protestantischen Kirchen-Kantate", so sagt Hermann Kretzschmar, „zeigt die H-Moll-Suite von seiner seltneren Seite, als einen vollendeten Kenner und Darsteller höfischen Geistes und höfischer Künste, als einen Weltkundigen, der die Etikette bis auf den unscheinbarsten Pas beherrscht."

Die Bostoner spielten diese klassischen Nippesächelchen entzückend liebenswürdig und stilgerecht. Der gravitätische Humor der Zopfzeit kam bald behäbig-trippelnd, bald lebhaft-bewegt, bald duftig-aristokratisch zur Geltung. Herr André Maquarre, der Flötist, verfügt über einen nicht sonderlich großen, aber einschmeichelnd-süßen Ton und über große technische Fertigkeit. Er wurde durch Beifall ausgezeichnet.

Zum Schluß durchbrauste Beethoven's Leonoren-Ouverture, die erste der großen Vierzahl, den Saal. Dr. Muck, der zu Beginn des Konzerts herzlich begrüßt worden war, wurde lebhaft gefeiert.

H.

New York Tribune
154 Nassau St.
Date NOV 8 - 1907

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Why Dr. Muck should have exacted a penance from his subscribers at the first concert of this year's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it would be difficult to explain. To endure it was sufficient; there is neither desire nor energy left for the inquiry. Few of the subscribers were prepared for the blow, and few for that half of the panacea which came with the concluding number of the programme—the third of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his one opera. The other half was reasonably familiar, for it consisted of Bach's suite in B minor, in which the grand old man of Leipsic, unmindful of the prejudice against the flute which future generations were to feel, gave that mellifluous instrument a leading part. The affliction, which endured an hour by the watch, was Bruckner's unfinished symphony in D minor. It is a part of history that the composer, feeling his vital forces ebbing away, remarked to a friend that his "Te Deum" might be performed as a concluding number. A pious feeling, with which it would be churlish to quarrel, has prompted a compliance with this suggestion on at least one occasion in Germany; last night it was left for the audience to feel "te Deum laudamus" that as much of the symphony as was written had been disposed of. The work is not new; it has been given a hearing by the Boston Orchestra in its own city, under Mr. Gericke, and by Mr. Theodore Thomas's band in Chicago, and at a Cincinnati festival. Two of these performances the present reviewer listened to with all the patient interest entailed upon him by duty; and he has never felt disposed to quarrel with the conductors who declined to put it into their schemes. Their reasons were doubtless ample to satisfy their artistic consciences, nor were they, necessarily, influenced by the easy wit which suggested that the symphony, being its composer's ninth and being in the key of Beethoven's ninth, should, like the latter, have a choral ending. But there is no reason why criticism should close its mouth in the presence of this work. There is no reason why—in spite of the simple, unaffected personal character of the composer, of which his champions make so much—it should not say that instead of being dedicated as he wished to the "dear Lord Almighty," it ought to be dedicated to the ineffable merit of the Rule of Three or the arithmetical table of Land or Square Measure. If ever there was a symphony built up by rule of thumb—no less rule of thumb because it is that of a master technician—this is one. In invention of theme it is scarcely worthy of discussion, because when it presents a really pregnant thought that thought is not original. The composer's high imaginativeness has been lauded by no less an authority than Mr. Weingartner, but what praise ought we to have for an imagination which exhausts itself in mere reiteration of a thought—not developing its psychological contents, but simply presenting it over and over again with change of color—not moving it onward through a gamut of emotions, but simply piling it up, block on top of block until the composer's skill is exhausted and the hearer's endurance exhausted? It is a timid criticism which becomes dumb in the presence of a work of art only because it gives evidence of technical mastery. What the entire art-world—not only the musical—is suffering from is too much (heaven save the word!) virtuosity.

It was a fine audience that heard Bruckner's symphony last night, though not as numerous as most of its predecessors last year. It heard the work respectfully, and got all the recompense it could out of the Bach suite and the Beethoven overture. In the former M. Maquarre distinguished himself greatly by his performance of the flute part. He dignified the instrument and put to shame the ancient jests about the want of dignity in the flute. The jests are hoary with age. "What is worse than a flute?" is an old German conundrum, and the popular answer is attributed to Mozart, "Two." "As the Greeks say," remarks Cicero somewhere, "when one cannot play the kithara he takes up the flute." But the flute is a noble orchestral instrument, as all who heard Mr. Maquarre last night will allow. The overture, "Leonore No. 1," ought to be heard more frequently. It is impressed all over with the master's individuality. It has none of the stature of the "Leonore" overtures which preceded it; but it is beautiful, it has character, and why it should not take a place of prominence in the concert lists it would be difficult to explain. It is the proper introduction to the opera for which it was written.

H. E. K.

SUN

Anton Seidl at old Steinway Hall on Dec. 10, 1888, according to Mr. Philip Hale's Boston Symphony programme notes, gave the first performance in America of Vincent D'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy," op. 12, after the dramatic poem of Schiller. Nearly nineteen years have left the music new to Twentieth century concert-goers. In the West it was done later by Theodore Thomas, also last season by Frank Van der Stücken, and this year by Frederick Stock. The new interest in this composer led Dr. Karl Muck to play the "Wallenstein" at his second Boston concert two weeks ago. He makes it his chief novelty to-night at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn.

D'Indy's three divisions of his music are entitled "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla, or the Piccolomini," and "The Death of Wallenstein." The Bach suite and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture complete the Brooklyn bill.

NEW YORK SUN
rom
ddress
NOV 8 1903
ate

MORE BRUCKNER PROBLEMS

HIS LAST SYMPHONY GIVEN BY DR. MUCK.

The Boston Orchestra Wastes Its Sweetness on the Desert Air—A Suite by Bach Heard With Relief by a Puzzled and Wearied Audience—Beethoven Also Performed.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to town again. It gave the first concert of its season last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony, in D minor; Bach's B minor suite for strings and flute, with Andre Maquarre, first flute of the organization, as the solo performer, and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. The Bruckner composition was heard for the first time in New York, having been unusually slow among new things in reaching this city.

The first movement of this symphony was begun toward the end of April, 1891. The composer had advanced as far as the completion of the scherzo by February, 1894. The adagio was finished on October 31, 1894. Bruckner died in 1896, leaving some shadowy sketches of the last movement. The first performance of the three parts left by him took place in Vienna in 1903. Bruckner's "Te Deum" was employed as a conclusion to the symphony. The first performance in this country was by the Chicago Orchestra, under Theodore Thomas, on February 20, 1904. It was given in Boston under Mr. Gericke on March 31 and April 2 of the same year.

For the instruction and uplifting of this public Dr. Muck has already produced the seventh symphony of Bruckner, a work which contained at least one movement worthy of a seat before the throne of Beethoven and Brahms, but the three movements heard last night were sorry and depressing companions to the thoughts of Beethoven and Bach with which they were associated.

An analytical description of this composition would be almost as tiresome as the music itself. Rather let the performance pass into the limbo of all sad things with a fleeting record of impressions. The solemn presentation of final and unfinished works by misunderstood masters sometimes palls upon even the most indefatigable listener, and the frequent parade of the morituri te salutamus becomes distasteful to delicate sensibilities.

If it be necessary to the preservation of the peace of nations, let us grant that Bruckner was a genius. If we must do so let us admit that he was the champion of Wagnerism in symphonic guise. We cannot by either process rid ourselves of the conviction that he was an artistic ascetic, dwelling in a region of melancholy brooding, shut out from that touch of nature which makes the world kin.

A dreamer of dreams, he was not a seer of visions. A worshipper of ideals, he was not a creator of ideas. He conceived his compositions in the sterility of an emotionless love, brought them to birth in the labor of a stern determination and reared them under the rod of an almost fanatic self-flagellation.

The results were children of fancy, pallid, intellectual, anæmic. Weingartner admired the man for his unswerving devotion to his own unpopular ideals, but sometimes such ideals, as in the case of Wagner's, have in them the potentiality of a world compelling force. Like Emerson's perfect form, they begin as private opinions and end as such.

But Bruckner's ideals are individual. At least so they seem now. Conductors, carried away by wonder at the rigorous continence of the musical treatment of the theme, the anchoritic abstinence from every thing that can appeal to mere sense and the plastic hold of all that seems abstruse and abstractly scientific in the art of musical construction, labor to endear him to the populace, but the populace, as a part of it did last night, turns a cold shoulder upon it and revels in the simple, hearty, direct utterance of old Bach.

One could well fancy last night that he heard the auditors saying with one accord: "We are sorry that this earnest and hard working person died before he wrote the last movement, but nevertheless we wish that since this had to happen it had happened before he wrote the first." Even the scherzo, which contains some flashes of melodic grace and some sweetness of instrumental diction, did not suffice to lift the lethargy into which the acidulous first movement sank the hearers. The final adagio invited to darkness and slumber, and doubtless there were many who wished that they dared to sleep openly in the sight of men.

We trust that Dr. Muck will spare this public further hearings of Bruckner's demonstrations of thematic theorems with corollaries on harmonic coefficients. There is enough beautiful music to provide New York with entertainment less narcotic. Let these learned proclamations be reserved for the academic consideration of the Bostonians.

After the Bruckner composition the second of Bach's four orchestral "partien" came with a benison of sweetness and light. Mr. Maquarre played the flute part exquisitely and Rudolph Krasselt also commanded for his treatment of the 'cello obbligato. The arrangement used was that [illegible] audience signified to be somewhat too serious a composer for such a light minded public as this, but it has been one of the singular and beneficial triumphs of the "intensely modern" Teutons that they have shown us that Bach was no orator like Antony, but a plain, blunt man speaking that which he did know.

It remains only to be said that Dr. Muck conducted last night with his unfailing insight and that the orchestra, though disclosing some important changes in its ranks, played like the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. EV'G SUN
ss

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SAID THE ANTI-WAGNERIANS TO THE ANTI-BRAHMS.

Bruckner's Ninth Symphony Caps the Climax of a Dead Old World Musical War at Which Dr. Karl Muck's New York Audience Yawns and Runs Away—Even Boston Orchestra Men Smile to Hear the Cheers for Bach—A Lottery in Numbered "Leonoras" of Beethoven.

Dr. Karl Muck saluted the dawn of a tomorrow this morning in New York by gently but firmly folding away, to sleep forever in the pages of Boston Symphony programmes, the name and fame of Anton Bruckner. No prima donna orchestra likes a slap in the face. The best band that ever discarded soloists, harmonious bowing and all other pomps and vanities of a wickedly unmusical world, liked it considerably less when fully two rows of vacuousness greeted their season's opening at Carnegie Hall last night, and least of all were they pleased when an audience that defied the north wind in automobile and opera bus fell easy prey to the wood-wind and brass of Bruckner's Unfinished Ninth Symphony. The house nodded at the scherzo. At the adagio it slumbered, and Evacuation Day in New York may have resembled the exodus when the abrupt pause woke everybody up.

Seven old dances of a Bach suite after that had their only ovation in years, and the audience made Andre Maquarre, who pirouetted with a flute, bow and blush like a solo star. Even Heinrich Warnke, who had a 'cello obligato, deserved better than to have his name in the morning papers printed Krasselt. Two successors to Hess and Adamowski were seen if not heard. But where was the famous eighth bass viol?

A Beethoven "Leonora" overture, misprinted "X" in the exiled Boston programmes and "No. 1" in the Carnegie Hall leaflets, had the characteristic finish long drawn out. You can't mistake Beethoven, though you may his "Leonoras" four. Even his next biographer, Mr. Krehbiel, writes both Nos. III. and I. in to-day's record. It was a No. I.

Bach, Beethoven and —— who shall be third of the "three B's"? There is Brahms, for example, whom the anti-Wagnerians made their unwilling hero. And the anti-Brahms party arose straightway and dug up the veiled prophet, Bruckner.

When the Wagner-Brahms war was a live issue there was a reason for Bruckner. A long generation ago the poor teacher from Windhag was printing his own symphonies, starving to do it, and dedicating them to Liszt, to Wagner, and again to the Emperor Francis Joseph. Tradition says he found nothing on earth to inscribe the Ninth to.

That symphony war is over, never to be fought again, though both Brahms and Bruckner lost more than they gained by it. Who shall decide when Dr. Muck disagrees? Not Muck nor Weingartner nor any other brave man where Gericke and our Thomas failed. Bruckner's name has had its fighting chance. His "Te Deum" was sung as long ago as 1891 at an Archbishop's jubilee in St. Louis. Dr. Muck did his Seventh symphony last year.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)
dress
te NOV. 8 1903

OF the three symphony directors heard this week in New York, the third, Dr. Muck, is undoubtedly the greatest. Damrosch seems a sculptor carving his ideas in air, Pohlig is like a gymnast swinging about in time to his instruments, but Muck stands passive, permitting the composer to speak through him and the instruments of the Boston Symphony.

The first concert of the season by the band from the Hub last night at Carnegie Hall was a disappointment at first. Bruckner's unfinished G Symphony seemed ponderous and unwieldy in the first movement, which might well be labelled "Adagio Ponderoso." In the second, the fairies seemed striving to dance with the Titans to the rout of both. After listening to the work, one concludes that although Bruckner may be praised for his peasant honesty, he must be forgiven his peasant awkwardness.

In sharp contrast came Bach's Suite No. 2 for flute and strings, with its suave measures suggestive of the court where it first played to satin clad, periwig pated followers. Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 1, brought the concert to a melodic close.

NEW YORK MAIL
NOV 8 1903

BRUCKNER'S SYMPHONY NOT WELL RECEIVED

Great Admiration for the Manner in Which Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra Played, but Not Much for the Work Itself.

The Boston Symphony orchestra made its first visit of the season to New York last night, to the delight of all lovers of the greatest and best in orchestral playing. Since the last appearance of this organization here, it has undergone many changes, and now, properly speaking, it belongs more fully to Dr. Muck than it did when he took it from the hands of Mr. Gericke.

With Carl Wendling in the concert master's chair, the remodeled orchestra played with refreshing vitality and vigor in response to Dr. Muck's demands. There were some moments of roughness last night, but there was a full joyous abandon that promises well for the day when the body will have become a plastic mass in the hands of its great director.

Dr. Muck is attempting to modify the inclusion of soloists on his programmes, to as great an extent as possible, and to offer instead orchestral works of unusual interest. He did not gain much with the audience last night because Bruckner's Ninth Symphony hardly received more than a polite recognition of the skill of Dr. Muck and the orchestra in its rendition, nothwithstanding the fact that in Boston the work itself received most enthusiastic demonstrations.

This symphony was left unfinished, the death of the Austrian composer having occurred before its completion. It lasted, nevertheless, for one hour, making it evident that the composer was following his theory that symphony could be developed and given the same interest as opera. It was his desire to do for this form of writing what Wagner had done for opera, and it is also apparent that he was strongly influenced by the Wagner style and characteristics.

It is certain that the audience last night did not take kindly to the work, and if the hearer did not, or could not, follow every theme, every development, if he did not appreciate from the beginning the massiveness and in a certain sense the message of the over wordy composition, its length must have palled upon him. But for those who could appreciate it there were great beauty and nobility in the work, which is rich in thematic material and of rare interest in its working out, and especially in the scoring and orchestral effects. Dr. Muck did not leave one idea covered. His reading was wonderfully lucid and convincing.

The second number was refreshing and seemed to be accepted in the nature of a peace offering by the audience. This was Bach's orchestral suite in B minor for strings and flute, played with all the charm to be expected from the Boston Symphony orchestra. The flute was played by Mr. Maquarre, first flautist of the organization, with remarkable shadings and quality of tone.

The programme closed with Beethoven's rather discursive "Leonore" overture, No. 1, not to be compared in worth to the No. 3, which more frequently finds its way into the programmes of to-day.

* * *

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. EST'D 1797. NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER.
Date

BRUCKNER AGAIN.

WHAT would Hans von Bülow have said to find Dr. Muck tampering with the three B's of his musical trinity and exchanging the sacred B of Brahms for the B abhorred of all true Brahmsites—the B of Anton Bruckner? But there stood the name of Bruckner as headliner on the Boston Orchestra's programme, with Bach in second place, and Beethoven a belated third. For Dr. Muck performed the same pious duty in Carnegie Hall last night that he performed a week ago in Symphony Hall, Boston—he conducted in public Bruckner's ninth (unfinished) symphony, while the audience sat in sackcloth. After an hour or more of this Bruckner penance had earned orchestra and audience ten minutes of sorely needed rest, one of those best qualified to speak was heard to say that the part of the symphony he had liked best was the unfinished part. No one contradicted him.

Bruckner disposed of, Dr. Muck filled out the evening with a little music. Bach's B minor suite for flute and strings came first, and as played by Mr. Maquarre and the Boston strings it was an unalloyed delight. Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture closed the concert. Of the three "Leonore" overtures it is easy to say that the third is so much the greatest that one never hears either of the others without wishing it were the third. And yet had the third not been written the second would probably be performed often. And even the first (which, as every one knows, or ought to know, was really written last) merits an occasional hearing, especially when it is played as effectively as it was last night.

n
ess
e blished.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's First Concert of the Season

OF all the big orchestras that play for the delectation of New York music lovers, none has or deserves to have a greater or a better following than the Boston Symphony. The first of its first pair of concerts for the season was given at Carnegie Hall last evening, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, to a crowded house. The programme was most conservative. Offered by any other band, it might be called dull. But the excellence of its individual components, the marvellous manner in which they play together, and the distinctive grace of the conductor combined to make the occasion memorable. At the beginning of a season richer in possibilities than any within living memory the visit of the men from the Hub served to whet the appetite for the feast that is to come.

Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony in D minor was the principal offering. The first movement was begun in 1891. The trio was finished in 1893, the scherzo early in 1894, and the adagio in the fall of the same year. The composer died in 1896, with only sugestions of his intentions for the finale left among his manuscripts. The first performance of the work as it stands was given in Vienna in 1903. It is a scholarly production, full of originality, but at no point does it disclose the greatness or the charm that compels admiration from the music lover who is not a devotee. It is unlikely to figure as a popular programme number.

Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, which followed, served to show the musicianship of the band and to compel a special recognition of Andre Maquarre, the flute soloist, who played with a clarity of tone and a grace of execution wholly admirable.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 1 was the last number. It is not as familiar or as attractive as No. 3 or "The Fidelio," but it was played beautifully.

Dr. Muck showed himself more than ever averse to personal exploitation. His courage was manifested by dispensing with a soloist.

At the matinee on Saturday again there will be no soloist, and the programme is remarkable in that it will consist of two symphonies—Mozart's in G and Beethoven's sixth, the "Pastoral."

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

[45]

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

MORE BRUCKNER PROBLEMS

HIS LAST SYMPHONY GIVEN BY DR. MUCK.

The Boston Orchestra Wastes Its Sweetness on the Desert Air—A Suite by Bach Heard With Relief by a Puzzled and Wearied Audience—Beethoven Also Performed.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to town again. It gave the first concert of its season last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony, in D minor; Bach's B minor suite for strings and flute, with Andre Maquarre, first flute of the organization, as the solo performer, and Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture. The Bruckner composition was heard for the first time in New York, having been unusually slow among new things in reaching this city.

The first movement of this symphony was begun toward the end of April, 1891. The composer had advanced as far as the completion of the scherzo by February, 1894. The adagio was finished on October 31, 1894. Bruckner died in 1896, leaving some shadowy sketches of the last movement. The first performance of the three parts left by him took place in Vienna in 1903. Bruckner's "Te Deum" was employed as a conclusion to the symphony. The first performance in this country was by the Chicago Orchestra, under Theodore Thomas, on February 20, 1904. It was given in Boston under Mr. Gericke on March 31 and April 2 of the same year.

For the instruction and uplifting of this public Dr. Muck has already produced the seventh symphony of Bruckner, a work which contained at least one movement worthy of a seat before the throne of Beethoven and Brahms, but the three movements heard last night were sorry and depressing companions to the thoughts of Beethoven and Bach with which they were associated.

An analytical description of this composition would be almost as tiresome as the music itself. Rather let the performance pass into the limbo of all sad things with a fleeting record of impressions. The solemn presentation of final and unfinished works by misunderstood masters sometimes palls upon even the most indefatigable listener, and the frequent parade of the morituri te salutamus becomes distasteful to delicate sensibilities.

If it be necessary to the preservation of the peace of nations, let us grant that Bruckner was a genius. If we must do so let us admit that he was the champion of Wagnerism in symphonic guise. We cannot by either process rid ourselves of the conviction that he was an artistic ascetic, dwelling in a region of melancholy brooding, shut out from that touch of nature which makes the world kin.

A dreamer of dreams, he was not a seer of visions. A worshipper of ideals, he was not a creator of ideas. He conceived his compositions in the sterility of an emotionless love, brought them to birth in the labor of a stern determination and reared them under the rod of an almost fanatic self-flagellation.

The results were children of fancy, pallid, intellectual, anæmic. Weingartner admired the man for his unswerving devotion to his own unpopular ideals, but sometimes such ideals, as in the case of Wagner's, have in them the potentiality of a world compelling force. Like Emerson's perfect form, they begin as private opinions and end as such.

But Bruckner's ideals are individual. At least so they seem now. Conductors, carried away by wonder at the rigorous continence of the musical treatment of the theme, the anchoritic abstinence from everything that can appeal to mere sense and the scholastic hold of all that seems abstruse and abstractly scientific in the art of musical construction labor to endear him to the populace, but the populace, as a part of it did last night, turns a cold shoulder upon it and revels in the simple, hearty, direct utterance of old Bach.

One could well fancy last night that he heard the auditors saying with one accord: "We are sorry that this earnest and hard working person died before he wrote the last movement, but nevertheless we wish that since this had to happen it had happened before he wrote the first." Even the scherzo, which contains some flashes of melodic grace and some sweetness of instrumental diction, did not suffice to lift the lethargy into which the acidulous first movement sank the hearers. The final adagio invited to darkness and slumber, and doubtless there were many who wished that they dared to sleep openly in the sight of men.

We trust that Dr. Muck will spare this public further hearings of Bruckner's demonstrations of thematic theorems with corollaries on harmonic coefficients. There is enough beautiful music to provide New York with entertainment less narcotic. Let these learned proclamations be reserved for the academic consideration of the Bostonians.

After the Bruckner composition the second of Bach's four orchestral "partien" came with a benison of sweetness and light. Mr. Maquarre played the flute part exquisitely and Rudolph Krasselt also commanded praise for his treatment of the 'cello obbligato. The arrangement used was that of Bülow. The audience signified its thought to be somewhat too serious a composer for such a light minded public as this, but it has been one of the singular and beneficial triumphs of the "intensely modern" Teutons that they have shown us that Bach was no orator like Antony, but a plain, blunt man speaking that which he did know.

It remains only to be said that Dr. Muck conducted last night with his unfailing insight and that the orchestra, though disclosing some important changes in its ranks, played like the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

. . . . . SUN

. . . . . .

ss . . . . . .

. . . . . .

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

SAID THE ANTI-WAGNERIANS TO THE ANTI-BRAHMS.

Bruckner's Ninth Symphony Caps the Climax of a Dead Old World Musical War at Which Dr. Karl Muck's New York Audience Yawns and Runs Away—Even Boston Orchestra Men Smile to Hear the Cheers for Bach—A Lottery in Numbered "Leonoras" of Beethoven.

Dr. Karl Muck saluted the dawn of a tomorrow this morning in New York by gently but firmly folding away, to sleep forever in the pages of Boston Symphony programmes, the name and fame of Anton Bruckner. No prima donna orchestra likes a slap in the face. The best band that ever discarded soloists, harmonious bowing and all other pomps and vanities of a wickedly unmusical world, liked it considerably less when fully two rows of vacuousness greeted their season's opening at Carnegie Hall last night, and least of all were they pleased when an audience that defied the north wind in automobile and opera bus fell easy prey to the wood-wind and brass of Bruckner's Unfinished Ninth Symphony. The house nodded at the scherzo. At the adagio it slumbered, and Evacuation Day in New York may have resembled the exodus when the abrupt pause woke everybody up.

Seven old dances of a Bach suite after that had their only ovation in years, and the audience made Andre Maquarre, who pirouetted with a flute, bow and blush like a solo star. Even Heinrich Warnke, who had a 'cello obligato, deserved better than to have his name in the morning papers printed Krasselt. Two successors to Hess and Adamowski were seen if not heard. But where was the famous eighth bass viol?

A Beethoven "Leonora" overture, misprinted "X" in the exiled Boston programmes and "No. 1" in the Carnegie Hall leaflets, had the characteristic finish long drawn out. You can't mistake Beethoven, though you may his "Leonoras" four. Even his next biographer, Mr. Krehbiel, writes both Nos. III. and I. in to-day's record. It was a No. I.

Bach, Beethoven and —— who shall be third of the "three B's"? There is Brahms, for example, whom the anti-Wagnerians made their unwilling hero. And the anti-Brahms party arose straightway and dug up the veiled prophet, Bruckner.

When the Wagner-Brahms war was a live issue there was a reason for Bruckner. A long generation ago the poor teacher from Windhag was printing his own symphonies, starving to do it, and dedicating them to Liszt, to Wagner, and again to the Emperor Francis Joseph. Tradition says he found nothing on earth to inscribe the Ninth to.

That symphony war is over, never to be fought again, though both Brahms and Bruckner lost more than they gained by it. Who shall decide when Dr. Muck disagrees? Not Muck nor Weingartner nor any other brave man where Gericke and our Thomas failed. Bruckner's name has had its fighting chance. His "Te Deum" was sung as long ago as 1891 at an Archbishop's jubilee in St. Louis. Dr. Muck did his Seventh symphony last year.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM

(See other side.)

dress . . . . . .

te . . . . . NOV. 8 . . . . . 1905 . . . . . .

OF the three symphony directors heard this week in New York, the third, Dr. Muck, is undoubtedly the greatest. Damrosch seems a sculptor carving his ideas in air, Pohlig is like a gymnast swinging about in time to his instruments, but Muck stands passive, permitting the composer to speak through him and the instruments of the Boston Symphony.

The first concert of the season by the band from the Hub last night at Carnegie Hall was a disappointment at first. Bruckner's unfinished G Symphony seemed ponderous and unwieldy in the first movement, which might well be labelled "Adagio Ponderoso." In the second, the fairies seemed striving to dance with the Titans to the rout of both. After listening to the work, one concludes that although Bruckner may be praised for his peasant honesty, he must be forgiven his peasant awkwardness.

In sharp contrast came Bach's Suite No. 2 for flute and strings, with its suave measures suggestive of the court where it first played to satin clad, periwig pated followers. Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 1, brought the concert to a melodic close.

NEW YORK MAIL

NOV 8 19[illegible]

BRUCKNER'S SYMPHONY NOT WELL RECEIVED

Great Admiration for the Manner in Which Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra Played, but Not Much for the Work Itself.

The Boston Symphony orchestra made its first visit of the season to New York last night, to the delight of all lovers of the greatest and best in orchestral playing. Since the last appearance of this organization here, it has undergone many changes, and now, properly speaking, it belongs more fully to Dr. Muck than it did when he took it from the hands of Mr. Gericke.

With Carl Wendling in the concert master's chair, the remodeled orchestra played with refreshing vitality and vigor in response to Dr. Muck's demands. There were some moments of roughness last night, but there was a full joyous abandon that promises well for the day when the body will have become a plastic mass in the hands of its great director.

Dr. Muck is attempting to modify the inclusion of soloists on his programmes, to as great an extent as possible, and to offer instead orchestral works of unusual interest. He did not gain much with the audience last night because Bruckner's Ninth Symphony hardly received more than a polite recognition of the skill of Dr. Muck and the orchestra in its rendition, nothwithstanding the fact that in Boston the work itself received most enthusiastic demonstrations.

This symphony was left unfinished, the death of the Austrian composer having occurred before its completion. It lasted, nevertheless, for one hour, making it evident that the composer was following his theory that symphony could be developed and given the same interest as opera. It was his desire to do for this form of writing what Wagner had done for opera, and it is also apparent that he was strongly influenced by the Wagner style and characteristics.

It is certain that the audience last night did not take kindly to the work, and if the hearer did not, or could not, follow every theme, every development, if he did not appreciate from the beginning the massiveness and in a certain sense the message of the over wordy composition, its length must have palled upon him. But for those who could appreciate it there were great beauty and nobility in the work, which is rich in thematic material and of rare interest in its working out, and especially in the scoring and orchestral effects. Dr. Muck did not leave one idea covered. His reading was wonderfully lucid and convincing.

The second number was refreshing and seemed to be accepted in the nature of a peace offering by the audience. This was Bach's orchestral suite in B minor for strings and flute, played with all the charm to be expected from the Boston Symphony orchestra. The flute was played by Mr. Maquarre, first flautist of the organization, with remarkable shadings and quality of tone.

The programme closed with Beethoven's rather discursive "Leonore" overture, No. 1, not to be compared in worth to the No. 3, which more frequently finds its way into the programmes of to-day.

* * *

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER

Date . . . . . .

BRUCKNER AGAIN.

Est

WHAT would Hans von Bülow have said to find Dr. Muck tampering with the three B's of his musical trinity and exchanging the sacred B of Brahms for the B abhorred of all true Brahmsites—the B of Anton Bruckner? But there stood the name of Bruckner as headliner on the Boston Orchestra's programme, with Bach in second place, and Beethoven a belated third. For Dr. Muck performed the same pious duty in Carnegie Hall last night that he performed a week ago in Symphony Hall, Boston—he conducted in public Bruckner's ninth (unfinished) symphony, while the audience sat in sackcloth. After an hour or more of this Bruckner penance had earned orchestra and audience ten minutes of sorely needed rest, one of those best qualified to speak was heard to say that the part of the symphony he had liked best was the unfinished part. No one contradicted him.

Bruckner disposed of, Dr. Muck filled out the evening with a little music. Bach's B minor suite for flute and strings came first, and as played by Mr. Maquarre and the Boston strings it was an unalloyed delight. Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture closed the concert. Of the three "Leonore" overtrures it is easy to say that the third is so much the greatest that one never hears either of the others without wishing it were the third. And yet had the third not been written the second would probably be performed often. And even the first (which, as every one knows, or ought to know, was really written last) merits an occasional hearing, especially when it is played as effectively as it was last night.

n . . . . . .

ess . . . . . .

e . . . . . .

Boston Symphony Orchestra's First Concert of the Season

blished

OF all the big orchestras that play for the delectation of New York music lovers, none has or deserves to have a greater or a better following than the Boston Symphony. The first of its first pair of concerts for the season was given at Carnegie Hall last evening, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, to a crowded house. The programme was most conservative. Offered by any other band, it might be called dull. But the excellence of its individual components, the marvellous manner in which they play together, and the distinctive grace of the conductor combined to make the occasion memorable. At the beginning of a season richer in possibilities than any within living memory the visit of the men from the Hub served to whet the appetite for the feast that is to come.

Bruckner's unfinished Ninth Symphony in D minor was the principal offering. The first movement was begun in 1891. The trio was finished in 1893, the scherzo early in 1894, and the adagio in the fall of the same year. The composer died in 1896, with only sugestions of his intentions for the finale left among his manusclipts. The first performance of the work as it stands was given in Vienna in 1903. It is a scholarly production, full of originality, but at no point does it disclose the greatness or the charm that compels admiration from the music lover who is not a devotee. It is unlikely to figure as a popular programme number.

Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, which followed, served to show the musicianship of the band and to compel a special recognition of Andre Maquarre, the flute soloist, who played with a clarity of tone and a grace of execution wholly admirable.

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 1 was the last number. It is not as familiar or as attractive as No. 3 or "The Fidelio," but it was played beautifully.

Dr. Muck showed himself more than ever averse to personal exploitation. His courage was manifested by dispensing with a soloist.

At the matinee on Saturday again there will be no soloist, and the programme is remarkable in that it will consist of two symphonies—Mozart's in G and Beethoven's sixth, the "Pastoral."

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

[45]

NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 8 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNS

First Concert of Its Season Given in Carnegie Hall.

BRUCKNER SYMPHONY GIVEN

His Ninth Heard for the First Time Here—A Suite by Bach and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday to New York, where it has long since ceased to appear as a stranger, and indeed has become one of the indispensable elements of the musical season. It returns again under the direction of Dr. Muck, who has impressed an individual quality of his own upon its performances. It returns also with a larger number of new faces in its ranks than has been the case at the beginning of any other season, but its beauty of tone, its pliancy as an instrument in the hands of its conductor, its skill and finesse in executing his wishes, are as they have ever been. Both the orchestra and Dr. Muck were welcomed with joy by an audience as large as the hall would hold.

It must be confessed that the joy was somewhat sobered by the first piece upon the programme. Dr. Muck returned to the propaganda he made for Anton Bruckner's music last season, when he put the Viennese composer's seventh symphony on one of his programmes, by producing in New York for the first time his ninth, an unfinished work of portentous dimensions. New York has never accepted any of this music with anything like patience; and it has not been for lack of opportunity, in years gone by, to become acquainted with the possibilities that a new and unfamiliar manifestation of art may hold within itself. However it may have seemed once, Bruckner's music has now nothing new, nothing that eludes the grasp of the concert-goer of the present day. It is all too easy to grasp the fact that it is, on the whole, a dull, uninspired groping after something that the composer was ambitious to attain but had not the power to.

He had the power to write for the orchestra in a sonorous and immediately imposing style—a power that many learn nowadays in almost an equal measure. He had at times ideas grandiose, pathetic, or vigorous; but they mostly fall sterile, because he had not the power to bring them to any issue, to develop them in any sustained flight of eloquence or charm. This minute symphony is an epitome of his impotence as a composer of symphonic music. There are themes of ponderous weight and imposing promise; the adagio opens with one of true significance and a certain nobility; but once they are stated, the composer is at once in a dilemma.

He goes on at the inordinate length which seems to be an indispensable part of his message; but nothing happens to hold the listener's attention or to satisfy his longing for some logical outcome. Phrases are carried through long strings of progressions like beads strung upon a necklace, with a total lack of connection except that of mere juxtaposition. They are reiterated with all the emphasis that the brass, reinforced by Wagner's tubas, can give; they are piled above long organ-points. They are put together like the pieces of a Chinese puzzle; but when the long task is done the result is no more inspiring or worth the doing than such a puzzle. The utterly arid results of all this are forcibly demonstrated in the two long slow movements of the symphony. The scherzo between them affords a certain relief, in its aerial lightness of orchestration, which is skillfully devised to give a factitious interest to ideas in themselves of little real value.

Bruckner is credited with an ambition to embody in symphonic music the principles upon which Wagner worked. What that may mean has never yet been satisfactorily explained, since Wagner's principles are concerned with the relation between the music and the action upon the stage in the lyric drama. Bruckner, like many another, has learned much from Wagner's orchestration. He has appropriated, with rather more effrontery than most, Wagner's actual property in musical ideas; witness in this last adagio some very obvious helpings from "Eine Faust Ouverture." It was his fortune, or misfortune, to be played off against Brahms, the great representative of modern symphonic art, as a champion of the Wagnerian side. But those squabbles have to-day only a historical interest; and the peasant composer cuts a pitiable figure to-day in the suggestion of any such comparison. His symphony was superbly played; nothing that Dr. Muck's devotion could do for it was left undone, and all its interminable length was expounded with anxious care and unflagging enthusiasm. The audience listened with amazing patience and attention, but the rustle of applause after the movements was but politeness toward Dr. Muck and his men.

There was refreshment then in two classical works little known: Bach's orchestral suite in B minor for strings and flute, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 1. Bach's suite was played with splendid muscularity and vigor, with delicacy and poetical feeling—not, it may be said, with absolute perfection of ensemble. Mr. Maquarre, the first flautist of the orchestra, played the flute part delightfully, which has practically the dignity and importance of a solo, and which is of entrancing color against the hushed strings. The "Leonore" overture, lacking though it does the superb dramatic sweep of its younger brother, the third, is yet a piece of the truest Beethovenian eloquence, and it was heard with satisfaction.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK EVE POST
NOV 8 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The late Anton Bruckner is one of the most pathetic figures in the gallery of unfortunate composers. Once, when the Austrian Emperor offered to grant him a favor, he exclaimed, "Please, your Majesty, ask Dr. Hanslick not to write so about me." Dr. Hanslick was the most influential critic of his time, the man who made Brahms, though he could not mar Wagner. He fiercely persecuted Bruckner and even tried to prevent his getting a professorship at the Conservatory. Nevertheless, the Bruckner camp gradually grew stronger. In it were such men as Nikisch, Mottl, Mahler, Paur, Schalk, Löwe, all of them his pupils, and prepared afterwards to preach his gospel in the concert hall. Were Bruckner living now, he would be overjoyed to see how often his symphonies are played in Austria and Germany.

A prominent champion of Bruckner is Dr. Muck. Last season the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave us, under his direction, a splendid performance of the seventh symphony, a work in which we found much to admire. Last night the same conductor interpreted the ninth symphony, which had never been played in this city. Bruckner did not finish this symphony—but it nearly finished the audience. The three movements lasted five minutes over an hour, and there is not enough food in them for a ten-minute meal. It is the old story—the less a composer has to say, the longer it takes him to say it. Of the three movements, the scherzo alone has individuality; the rest is for the most part tonal rambling of the vaguest, dreariest sort. There are some interesting dissonances, and not a few lovely bits of orchestration, but they do not atone for the almost complete lack of melodic pabulum. The solemn adagio owes most of its beauties to borrowings from Wagner's "Faust Overture," "Parsifal," "Siegfried," and "Rheingold," some of them almost as undisguised as the citation by means of which Brahms modestly intimated that his own first symphony was linked with Beethoven's nine as number ten.

Dr. Muck deserves thanks for giving us an opportunity to hear this work—but once is quite enough. Full amends for it were made by the next number, Bach's B minor suite, in which the solo flute part was excellently played by Mr. André Maquarre. The final number was Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture. Throughout the concert, the Boston players acquitted themselves nobly.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address .....
Date ..... NOV 8 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS ARTISTICALLY

Its First New York Concert This Season Is Given in Carnegie Hall Before Large Audience.

With Dr. Karl Muck at its head, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was an enormous and a fashionable one, but it was sparing in its applause.

The reason for the latter circumstance might be found in the fact that the programme contained little or no concession to public taste. It was composed of music by those famous B's in music, Bach, Beethoven and Bouckner. The latter much neglected master was represented by his Ninth Symphony, a work that is unfinished, but still takes an hour to perform.

It was evident the audience took precious little interest in the work, applauding gingerly even the wonderful Scherzo. But the remaining two movements are works that afford more material for study than for enjoyment. There is a beautiful moment to be enjoyed here, especially in the third movement, but the intervals are of uninteresting lengths and obvious unevenness.

Like a breeze of fresh air came the Bach Suite No. 2, the solo flute part being exquisitely played by Mr. Andre Maduarre, first flautist of the orchestra. The final number was Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 1 overture.

Dr. Muck conducted masterfully, and the playing of the orchestra was a joy. During the summer some changes have been made in the personnel, but last night's concert seemed to prove that these changes were if anything for the better.

Address .....
NOV 8 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AGAIN

First Concert of the Season in Carnegie Hall Has Bruckner's Ninth as Feature.

ANDRE MAQUERRE IS SOLOIST

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra delivered themselves of a somewhat peculiar programme last night in Carnegie Hall. The chief element in their offering was Bruckner's Ninth Symphony—a work strangely lacking in appeal, poetry, and human interest.

This same composer's Seventh Symphony was played last year by Dr. Muck, and its majesty, its warmth of feeling, and, to a certain extent, its pathos, made a profound impression. But the Ninth is as dry, arid, harsh and sometimes as irritating a composition as there is to be found in the literature of music.

One hesitates to speak of a work by such an author as Bruckner as wearisome, but this composition came perilously near justifying so unkind a characterization. It would seem as if the writer had deliberately avoided the green and fertile pastures of natural emotion and picturesque utterance and led his hearers deliberately into the rugged, thorny and vexatious wilderness of eccentric harmony and ear-torturing combinations.

Well as the instrumentalists played, and admirably as the Boston director led his splendid body of musicians, the general effect of the first part of the programme was that of irritation and depression.

The next number on the programme was the Bach Suite No. 2, for flute and string orchestra. The management had promised that there would be no soloists at these initial concerts, and all had rejoiced at the timely and sympathetic deliverance from the tempestuous lady with the songs, and the obvious and emphatic hairy man with the piano. They were presented last night all the same, with the amiable and executive M. Andre Maquarre and his flute, who did the solo work in the aforesaid Bach number. The flute is not exactly a wantonly exciting or psychopathic musical means, but M. Maquarre handled it most graciously and agreeably. The strings, of course, were delightful in their rich, ripe pleniude of tone and their spirited eloquence of diction.

The concert ended with Beethoven's "Leonore," Overture No. 1.

Address .....
EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ..... NOV 7 1907

EXPLAINS SYMPHONY MUSIC.

Daniel Gregory Mason Talks of D'Indy's "Wallenstein."

The first of five lectures preceding the Boston Symphony concerts and explaining the programmes to be given, was given by Daniel Gregory Mason at Association Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Mason had the good fortune to meet the composer D'Indy in Paris and had several delightful conversations with him and a few lessons, which gave him personal recollections of this well-known musical genius whose work "Wallenstein" is to be given for the first time to-morrow night as the opening number of the Philharmonic programme. D'Indy is, of course, remembered for his conducting of the Boston Symphony in 1905, but his personality, aside from his genius, as Mr. Mason described it, was modest and striking and his sincerity and genuineness were most impressive.

In the use of light motifs to represent persons, this composer is like Wagner. The themes for Wallenstein, Theckla and Max are most distinct and individual and the blending of the two last is the work of a great artist. Another quality of his work is the extreme beauty and brilliancy of the orchestration.

The story of the poet Schiller is closely allied to the underlying thought of the musical composition. Mr. Mason played each part of the Trilogy, explaining the various motifs and then gave the selection as a whole.

N. Y. AMERICAN
NOV 8 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREATLY IMPROVED

Dr. Muck and His Admirable Orchestra Present a Severe Programme.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

The programme which had been drawn up by Dr. Muck for the first concert in this city, during the present season, of the old and always admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra might have seemed a bit heavy of digestion to the general public.

But the habitual frequenters of the periodic functions for which we are indebted to Colonel Higginson and Mr. Ellis do not wince at even such severities as are implied in a programme beginning with Bruckner's (unfinished) Ninth Symphony (in D minor), continuing with a trifle like Bach's Suite (No. 2, in B minor), for flute and strings, and ending with a frivolity like Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 1.

Consequently, every corner of Carnegie Hall was filled last night, as it would probably have been if Dr. Muck had thought proper to administer even stiffer doses of classicism to his following. And every movement, every bar and every note played by the wonderful organization which for the second year he rules was listened to with an attention that might almost have been called religious.

Under the guidance of the eminent Berliner, the orchestra has gained enormously in delicacy as well as breadth, and is now vastly more eloquent as a whole than during the conductorship of the metronomic Mr. Gericke.

It played the first movement of the Bruckner symphony—a movement abounding in ideas and most difficult of interpretation—with much force and charm. In the Scherzo of the same symphony, which in a fitful and fanciful way suggests the flicker of flames, it was incomparably graceful. Dr. Muck, with his slim figure and speaking fingers, himself deepened the suggestion. As he flashed his behests to his followers with his baton, he seemed a reincarnation of the Wagnerian Loge.

The Buckner Adagio is valuable as a test of endurance. The orchestra stood the ordeal, and the audience is still living.

By comparison with the symphony, Bach's Suit was light and foolish. Yet it was grave enough, despite the fact that it was portioned out in the disguises of Rondes, Bourrees, Minuets and Sarabands. Mr. Andre Maquarre played the flute solo part in several of these dance movements with a fine feeling for tune and expression. He was warmly and deservedly applauded.

The concert gave much satisfaction of a rather solemn kind to the great audience.

The second function of the Boston Sym- Rondes, Bourrees, Minuets and Sarabands. rather solemn kind to the great audience phony orchestra (which will take place to- to symphonies—Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral."

TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 7 1907

Lecture on Symphony Programme.

The first of five lectures preceding the Boston Symphony concerts and explaining the programme to be used, was given by Daniel Gregory Mason at Association Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Mason had the good fortune to meet the composer, D'Indy, in Paris, and had several conservations with him and a few lessons from the writer of "Wallenstein," to be given for the first time to-morrow night as the opening number of the Philharmonic programme. Mr. Mason played each part of the Trilogy, explaining the various motifs, and then gave the selection as a whole. The story of the poet Schiller is closely allied to the underlying thought of the musical composition. In the use of light motifs to represent persons in this work the composer is like Wagner, Mr. Mason said. The themes for "Wallenstein," "Theckla" and "Max" are most distinct and individual, and the blending of the last two is the work of a great artist. Mr. Mason also referred to the orchestration as extremely beautiful and brilliant. The other numbers of to-morrow night's programme, Bach's Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, were briefly characterized.

Address .....
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date .....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is this week making the first of its five trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. At none of its concerts is there a soloist. The four symphonies chosen by Dr. Muck for these programmes are Mozart's in G minor, Beethoven's "Pastoral," Bruckner's in D minor (the Unfinished), and D'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy," which met with so great success in Boston when it was played there for the first time a few weeks ago. Dr. Muck did a very bold thing for his first matinee concert in New York yesterday afternoon; he placed on the programme two symphonies, and nothing but two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor and

NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 8 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNS

First Concert of Its Season Given in Carnegie Hall.

BRUCKNER SYMPHONY GIVEN

His Ninth Heard for the First Time Here—A Suite by Bach and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned yesterday to New York, where it has long since ceased to appear as a stranger, and indeed has become one of the indispensable elements of the musical season. It returns again under the direction of Dr. Muck, who has impressed an individual quality of his own upon its performances. It returns also with a larger number of new faces in its ranks than has been the case at the beginning of any other season, but its beauty of tone, its pliancy as an instrument in the hands of its conductor, its skill and finesse in executing his wishes, are as they have ever been. Both the orchestra and Dr. Muck were welcomed with joy by an audience as large as the hall would hold.

It must be confessed that the joy was somewhat sobered by the first piece upon the programme. Dr. Muck returned to the propaganda he made for Anton Bruckner's music last season, when he put the Viennese composer's seventh symphony on one of his programmes, by producing in New York for the first time his ninth, an unfinished work of portentous dimensions. New York has never accepted any of this music with anything like patience; and it has not been for lack of opportunity, in years gone by, to become acquainted with the possibilities that a new and unfamiliar manifestation of art may hold within itself. However it may have seemed once, Bruckner's music has now nothing new, nothing that eludes the grasp of the concert-goer of the present day. It is all too easy to grasp the fact that it is, on the whole, a dull, uninspired groping after something that the composer was ambitious to attain but had not the power to.

He had the power to write for the orchestra in a sonorous and immediately imposing style—a power that many learn nowadays in almost an equal measure. He had at times ideas grandiose, pathetic, or vigorous; but they mostly fall sterile, because he had not the power to bring them to any issue, to develop them in any sustained flight of eloquence or charm. This minute symphony is an epitome of his impotence as a composer of symphonic music. There are themes of ponderous weight and imposing promise; the adagio opens with one of true significance and a certain nobility; but once they are stated, the composer is at once in a dilemma.

He goes on at the inordinate length which seems to be an indispensable part of his message; but nothing happens to hold the listener's attention or to satisfy his longing for some logical outcome. Phrases are carried through long strings of progressions like beads strung upon a necklace, with a total lack of connection except that of mere juxtaposition. They are reiterated with all the emphasis that the brass, reinforced by Wagner's tubas, can give; they are piled above long organ-points. They are put together like the pieces of a Chinese puzzle; but when the long task is done the result is no more inspiring or worth the doing than such a puzzle. The utterly arid results of all this are forcibly demonstrated in the two long slow movements of the symphony. The scherzo between them affords a certain relief, in its aerial lightness of orchestration, which is skilfully devised to give a factitious interest to ideas in themselves of little real value.

Bruckner is credited with an ambition to embody in symphonic music the principles upon which Wagner worked. What that may mean has never yet been satisfactorily explained, since Wagner's principles are concerned with the relation between the music and the action upon the stage in the lyric drama. Bruckner, like many another, has learned much from Wagner's orchestration. He has appropriated, with rather more effrontery than most, Wagner's actual property in musical ideas; witness in this last adagio some very obvious helpings from "Eine Faust Ouverture." It was his fortune, or misfortune, to be played off against Brahms, the great representative of modern symphonic art, as a champion of the Wagnerian side. But those squabbles have to-day only a historical interest; and the peasant composer cuts a pitiable figure to-day in the suggestion of any such comparison. His symphony was superbly played; nothing that Dr. Muck's devotion could do for it was left undone, and all its interminable length was expounded with anxious care and unflagging enthusiasm. The audience listened with amazing patience and attention, but the rustle of applause after the movements was but politeness toward Dr. Muck and his men.

There was refreshment then in two classical works little known: Bach's orchestral suite in B minor for strings and flute, and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 1. Bach's suite was played with splendid muscularity and vigor, with delicacy and poetical feeling—not, it may be said, with absolute perfection of ensemble. Mr. Maquarre, the first flautist of the orchestra, played the flute part delightfully, which has practically the dignity and importance of a solo, and which is of entrancing color against the hushed strings. The "Leonore" overture, lacking though it does the superb dramatic sweep of its younger brother, the third, is yet a piece of the truest Beethovenian eloquence, and it was heard with satisfaction.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The late Anton Bruckner is one of the most pathetic figures in the gallery of unfortunate composers. Once, when the Austrian Emperor offered to grant him a favor, he exclaimed, "Please, your Majesty, ask Dr. Hanslick not to write so about me." Dr. Hanslick was the most influential critic of his time, the man who made Brahms, though he could not mar Wagner. He fiercely persecuted Bruckner and even tried to prevent his getting a professorship at the Conservatory. Nevertheless, the Bruckner camp gradually grew stronger. In it were such men as Nikisch, Mottl, Mahler, Paur, Schalk, Löwe, all of them his pupils, and prepared afterwards to preach his gospel in the concert hall. Were Bruckner living now, he would be overjoyed to see how often his symphonies are played in Austria and Germany.

A prominent champion of Bruckner is Dr. Muck. Last season the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave us, under his direction, a splendid performance of the seventh symphony, a work in which we found much to admire. Last night the same conductor interpreted the ninth symphony, which had never been played in this city. Bruckner did not finish this symphony—but it nearly finished the audience. The three movements lasted five minutes over an hour, and there is not enough food in them for a ten-minute meal. It is the old story—the less a composer has to say, the longer it takes him to say it. Of the three movements, the scherzo alone has individuality; the rest is for the most part tonal rambling of the vaguest, dreariest sort. There are some interesting dissonances, and not a few lovely bits of orchestration, but they do not atone for the almost complete lack of melodic pabulum. The solemn adagio owes most of its beauties to borrowings from Wagner's "Faust Overture," "Parsifal," "Siegfried," and "Rheingold," some of them almost as undisguised as the citation by means of which Brahms modestly intimated that his own first symphony was linked with Beethoven's nine as number ten.

Dr. Muck deserves thanks for giving us an opportunity to hear this work—but once is quite enough. Full amends for it were made by the next number, Bach's B minor suite, in which the solo flute part was excellently played by Mr. André Maquarre. The final number was Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture. Throughout the concert, the Boston players acquitted themselves nobly.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS ARTISTICALLY

Its First New York Concert This Season Is Given in Carnegie Hall Before Large Audience.

With Dr. Karl Muck at its head, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was an enormous and a fashionable one, but it was sparing in its applause.

The reason for the latter circumstance might be found in the fact that the programme contained little or no concession to public taste. It was composed of music by those famous B's in music, Bach, Beethoven and Bouckner. The latter much neglected master was represented by his Ninth Symphony, a work that is unfinished, but still takes an hour to perform.

It was evident the audience took precious little interest in the work, applauding gingerly even the wonderful Scherzo. But the remaining two movements are works that afford more material for study than for enjoyment. There is a beautiful moment to be enjoyed here, especially in the third movement, but the intervals are of uninteresting lengths and obvious unevenness.

Like a breeze of fresh air came the Bach Suite No. 2, the solo flute part being exquisitely played by Mr. Andre Maduarre, first flautist of the orchestra. The final number was Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 1 overture.

Dr. Muck conducted masterfully, and the playing of the orchestra was a joy. During the summer some changes have been made in the personnel, but last night's concert semed to prove that these changes were if anything for the better.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AGAIN

First Concert of the Season in Carnegie Hall Has Bruckner's Ninth as Feature.

ANDRE MAQUERRE IS SOLOIST

Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra delivered themselves of a somewhat peculiar programme last night in Carnegie Hall. The chief element in their offering was Bruckner's Ninth Symphony—a work strangely lacking in appeal, poetry, and human interest.

This same composer's Seventh Symphony was played last year by Dr. Muck, and its majesty, its warmth of feeling, and, to a certain extent, its pathos, made a profound impression. But the Ninth is as dry, arid, harsh and sometimes as irritating a composition as there is to be found in the literature of music.

One hesitates to speak of a work by such an author as Bruckner as wearisome, but this composition came perilously near justifying so unkind a characterization. It would seem as if the writer had deliberately avoided the green and fertile pastures of natural emotion and picturesque utterance and led his hearers deliberately into the rugged, thorny and vexatious wilderness of eccentric harmony and ear-torturing combinations.

Well as the instrumentalists played, and admirably as the Boston director led his splendid body of musicians, the general effect of the first part of the programme was that of irritation and depression.

The next number on the programme was the Bach Suite No. 2, for flute and string orchestra. The management had promised that there would be no soloists at these initial concerts, and all had rejoiced at the timely and sympathetic deliverance from the tempestuous lady with the songs, and the obvious and emphatic hairy man with the piano. They were presented last night all the same, with the amiable and executive M. Andre Maquarre and his flute, who did the solo work in the aforesaid Bach number. The flute is not exactly a wantonly exciting or psychopathic musical means, but M. Maquarre handled it most graciously and agreeably. The strings, of course, were delightful in their rich, ripe pleniude of tone and their spirited eloquence of diction.

The concert ended with Beethoven's "Leonore," Overture No. 1.

EXPLAINS SYMPHONY MUSIC.

Daniel Gregory Mason Talks of D'Indy's "Wallenstein."

The first of five lectures preceding the Boston Symphony concerts and explaining the programmes to be given, was given by Daniel Gregory Mason at Association Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Mason had the good fortune to meet the composer D'Indy in Paris and had several delightful conversations with him and a few lessons, which gave him personal recollections of this well-known musical genius whose work "Wallenstein" is to be given for the first time to-morrow night as the opening number of the Philharmonic programme. D'Indy is, of course, remembered for his conducting of the Boston Symphony in 1905, but his personality, aside from his genius, as Mr. Mason described it, was modest and striking and his sincerity and genuineness were most impressive.

In the use of light motifs to represent persons, this composer is like Wagner. The themes for Wallenstein, Theckla and Max are most distinct and individual and the blending of the two last is the work of a great artist. Another quality of his work is the extreme beauty and brilliancy of the orchestration.

The story of the poet Schiller is closely allied to the underlying thought of the musical composition. Mr. Mason played each part of the Trilogy, explaining the various motifs and then gave the selection as a whole.

NOV 8 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY GREATLY IMPROVED

Dr. Muck and His Admirable Orchestra Present a Severe Programme.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

The programme which had been drawn up by Dr. Muck for the first concert in this city, during the present season, of the old and always admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra might have seemed a bit heavy of digestion to the general public.

But the habitual frequenters of the periodic functions for which we are indebted to Colonel Higginson and Mr. Ellis do not wince at even such severities as are implied in a programme beginning with Bruckner's (unfinished) Ninth Symphony (in D minor), continuing with a trifle like Bach's Suite (No. 2, in B minor), for flute and strings, and ending with a frivolity like Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 1.

Consequently, every corner of Carnegie Hall was filled last night, as it would probably have been if Dr. Muck had thought proper to administer even stiffer doses of classicism to his following. And every movement, every bar and every note played by the wonderful organization which for the second year he rules was listened to with an attention that might almost have been called religious.

Under the guidance of the eminent Berliner, the orchestra has gained enormously in delicacy as well as breadth, and is now vastly more eloquent as a whole than during the conductorship of the metronomic Mr. Gericke.

It played the first movement of the Bruckner symphony—a movement abounding in ideas and most difficult of interpretation—with much force and charm. In the Scherzo of the same symphony, which in a fitful and fanciful way suggests the flicker of flames, it was incomparably graceful. Dr. Muck, with his slim figure and speaking fingers, himself deepened the suggestion. As he flashed his behests to his followers with his baton, he seemed a reincarnation of the Wagnerian Loge.

The Buckner Adagio is valuable as a test of endurance. The orchestra stood the ordeal, and the audience is still living.

By comparison with the symphony, Bach's Suit was light and foolish. Yet it was grave enough, despite the fact that it was portioned out in the disguises of Rondes, Bourrees, Minuets and Sarabands. Mr. Andre Maquarre played the flute solo part in several of these dance movements with a fine feeling for tune and expression. He was warmly and deservedly applauded.

The concert gave much satisfaction of a rather solemn kind to the great audience.

The second function of the Boston Symphony orchestra (which will take place to-morrow night's programme, Bach's Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, were briefly characterized.

Lecture on Symphony Programme.

The first of five lectures preceding the Boston Symphony concerts and explaining the programme to be used, was given by Daniel Gregory Mason at Association Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Mason had the good fortune to meet the composer, D'Indy, in Paris, and had several conservations with him and a few lessons from the writer of "Wallenstein," to be given for the first time to-morrow night as the opening number of the Philharmonic programme. Mr. Mason played each part of the Trilogy, explaining the various motifs, and then gave the selection as a whole. The story of the poet Schiller is closely allied to the underlying thought of the musical composition. In the use of light motifs to represent persons in this work the composer is like Wagner, Mr. Mason said. The themes for "Wallenstein," "Theckla" and "Max" are most distinct and individual, and the blending of the last two is the work of a great artist. Mr. Mason also referred to the orchestration as extremely beautiful and brilliant. The other numbers of to-morrow night's programme, Bach's Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, were briefly characterized.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is this week making the first of its five trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. At none of its concerts is there a soloist. The four symphonies chosen by Dr. Muck for these programmes are Mozart's in G minor, Beethoven's "Pastoral," Bruckner's in D minor (the Unfinished), and D'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy," which met with so great success in Boston when it was played there for the first time a few weeks ago. Dr. Muck did a very bold thing for his first matinee concert in New York yesterday afternoon; he placed on the programme two symphonies, and nothing but two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral."

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 9 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Programme Given at the Baptist Temple Last Night, Dr. Karl Muck Conducting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn last night for the first concert of its new season. The Baptist Temple was filled in its honor by an audience eager to welcome the great band and with high anticipations of pleasure not merely from this, but from the succeeding concerts of the winter. There have been some changes in the makeup of the orchestra, notably there is a new man, Carl Wendling, at the first violin desk. The changes, however, have not affected the beautiful balance of parts, the smoothness of tone, nor the quick and sure response to the intentions of the director which place this orchestra without a rival. Dr. Karl Muck, who made himself a favoite here and in all the cities where the orchestra appeared last year, returned as director and again proved himself as satisfactory a conductor as the orchestra has had.

If Dr. Muck was to be criticised at all last night, it was not for his leading, but for his programme making. Like most cities, Brooklyn has cried out for a soloist for these concerts. This winter it is to have several, but last night there was none, while the programme was one in which the injection of a potent personality would have been especially welcome. The programme was skillfully varied, but there was no music of strongly emotional fiber to rouse the audience to enthusiasm, so that the distraction and interest of personality might well have afforded a relief from an evening which, whatever its beauties, tended toward monotony.

The concert opened with the "Wallenstein" trilogy of Vincent D'Indy, which was entirely new here. D'Indy appeared here two years ago as the leader of this orchestra in a programme of extremely modern French music; the music which is not merely post-Wagner, but some of it post-Strauss. If expectations of an extremely difficult and confusing modern work had been based upon that introduction, they were happily disappointed in the "Wallenstein" trilogy. The music was written when D'Indy was about thirty and before he had gone to the extremities of tonal combination which mark the new school. This trilogy is modern, of course, but it is simply a well-made piece of "programme music," in which the resources of the modern orchestra are called into play. The music is well made, but if will never set on fire either the Seine or the Atlantic. Dr. Hale tells a story of asking Emerson to review Lowell's poem, "The Cathedral," when it came out. Emerson demurred and Hale insisted, saying "You like the poem, don't you?" To this Emerson responded: "Oh, yes, I like it." Then he added, "But how he had to pump!"

That is precisely the comment which one can imagine Dvorak, Tschaikowsky, Grieg or any of the moderns, with a full and spontaneous flow of melodic ideas, making upon this trilogy of D'Indy. It is good, but every little while you hear the pump going. That is especially true of the first movement. It pictures the riotous behavior of the soldiers in Wallenstein's camp, but truth to tell, it was carefully restrained rioting. You can get the sense of the clash and tumult if you listen for it, but at no point does it rise up, overwhelm you and compel recognition of its warlike and lawless character.

The second movement, which portrays the love story of Max and Theckla and the tragic fate of the young lover, has much more freedom and spontaneity. D'Indy's native gift seems to be tragic, and in his development of the Fate motive in this movement you become absorbed in listening to the music and forget all about the analysis which Mr. Hale has kindly provided. The Wallenstein motive, on the brass, which is one of the finest things in the first movement, comes in toward the close of this moving second part with a particularly impressive effect. In the third movement, supposed to portray Wallenstein's death, the composer returns to his pictures of the camp with greater freedom and power than he showed at first, while throughout that stirring call of the brass recurs, sometimes with a truly tragic effect. The movement would gain, however, by compression. Some of its working out is, not to put too fine a point upon the matter, dull.

The modern Frenchman was followed by a copious draught from that well of music undefiled, Bach. The selection chosen was the suite or overture in B minor, for flute and strings. The old dance forms are freely used, and the rondo is developed with the happy effect which comes from Bach's mastery of the fugue. The music is sweet and wholesome and good to hear.

Set in the middle of a modern orchestral programme, however, with the brasses and wood winds silenced, it does tend toward monotony. Especial interest was lent to it last night by the beautiful playing of the flute part by Andrew Maquerre of the orchestra. The interest of personality was shown in the three or four recalls which the audience insisted upon giving to the modest flutist.

If the Bach suite had been selected for the especial purpose of giving added emphasis to the noble harmonies and the tragic beauty of Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," it could not have been better placed. Upon ears hungry for the full harmonies and varied tone color of the modern orchestral palette those noble strains of Schumann fell like a benediction. The effect at the close was like a beautiful cathedral window upon which the sun suddenly falls, bringing out its glories. There was nothing coming new to be said about it, but the old, abiding, perpetual beauties of that score Dr. Muck brought out with the loving touch of a great interpretative artist.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 7 1907

WILL GIVE FIVE LECTURES HERE ON CLASSIC MUSIC

Daniel Gregory Mason Heard in Association Hall.

HE MET D'INDY IN PARIS.

Lecturer Tells of "Wallenstein," Bach's Compositions and Other Less-Known Works.

The first of five lectures preceding the Boston Symphony concerts and explaining the programmes to be used was given by Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason at Association Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Mason had the good fortune to meet the composer D'Indy in Paris, and had several delightful conversations with him and a few lessons, which gave him personal recollections of this well-known musical genius, whose work, "Wallenstein," is to be given for the first time to-morrow night as the opening number of the Philharmonic programme. D'Indy is, of course, remembered for his conducting of the Boston Symphony in 1905, but his personality, aside from his genius, as Mr. Mason described it, was modest and striking and his sincerity and genuineness were most impressive.

In the use of light motifs to represent persons, this composer is like Wagner. The themes for "Wallenstein," "Theckla" and "Max" are most distinct and individual, and the blending of the two last is the work of a great artist. Another quality of his work is the extreme beauty and brilliancy of the orchestration.

The story of the poet Schiller is closely allied to the underlying thought of the musical composition. Mr. Mason played each part of the "Trilogy," explaining the various motifs, and then gave the selection as a whole.

The first part, with the word picture of the chaos of camp life, the grotesque dance of the miners, with the "undergroundness" of the dancers well suggested; the expostulation of the Capuchin monks in the grotesque sermon where three bassos repeat the theme in succession and the clarionet and violins slide chromatically in sixths down the scale. This last is the best thing in the first movement. The miners' dance is represented by four groups of instruments with fine effect, and is also a wonderful depiction. The riot at the close of this part is a great climax.

The next part deals with the Piccolomini, father and son and the love of the latter for Teckla, Wallenstein's daughter. In this portion the separate themes are strongly emphasized and the dramatic ending is the telling of Octavio to his son Max of Wallenstein's treachery and Max's unbelief.

The third description opens with a beautiful passage symbolizing Wallenstein's consultation with the astrologers. While the preceding part was of slow movement, this is one of great force and action. Max learns of Wallenstein's treachery, is killed in battle while the general, whose superabundance of pride was his downfall, is assassinated. Again in the closing strains is the "Wallenstein" motif.

This composition is given in Brooklyn for the first time to-morrow night. It has been presented in several other cities as a whole or in part, and has aroused much enthusiasm by music lovers.

Of the rest of the Philharmonic programme there was so much to be said of "Wallenstein" and so many passages to be repeated that there was but little time. Mr. Mason briefly alluded to the second number, seven of Bach's compositions, and spoke for a few minutes of the less known work which concludes the programme. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," was written originally for his opera of the same name. The opera was not a success, but the overture was; so while one is heard often and is his best known composition of the kind, the other is seldom spoken of. The motif of this is composed of just four notes and is introduced early into the composition. He called attention to a wonderfully beautiful passage for the horns as an "example of melodic greatness."

This overture was played as a whole by Mr. Mason and was enthusiastically applauded.

TIMES
NOV 9 1907

MUSICAL.

First of the Philharmonic Concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last night's exclusively orchestral programme for the first of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Baptist Temple, was not a programme to conjure with in appealing to the general public interest. If a concert list is to be entirely orchestral there is no good reason for not uniting the engaging interest of musical beauty and charm with the ever-desirable excellence of sound artistic worth. These elements were present last night, but the list was one to claim the interest of studehts rather than of the average music lover.

The Wallenstein trilogy by the French composer, Vincent D'Indy, voices the modern spirit in orchestral writing, yet is more definitely suggestive than most of the music written by this composer since he produced this work twenty years ago. It is the imaginative, fanciful creation of one who was, apparently, trying to write in a vein not natural to him. It is the modern French recognition of the leit-motif idea most notably exemplified in the works of Wagner. Schiller's dramatic poem is followed as the incentive for three tone pictures, designated as "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla" (The Piccolomini), and "The Death of Wallenstein." The themes are supposed to indicate the personages referred to in the poem, also incidents and sentiment in the piece.

We are informed that the score of the trilogy is without programme of any sort. Possibly the composer intended to leave the elucidation of an explanatory text to commentators whose interest should be awakened. It is obvious that a programme of what the trilogy stands for is necessary and the analytical commentary given in the house programme last night was essential to an approximate understanding of the work, for Mr. D'Indy's composition is circumstantial in detail and not as broadly pronounced in sustained themes and bold picturesqueness as many other works of similar purport. The dramatic is less vital in its measures than the poetically fanciful, in which it abounds. This trilogy is a work to challenge various comment, though there cannot be a question of the writer's fine skill in handling the voices of the orchestra, which are made to yield a wonderfully full expression of their individual characteristics and harmonic significance. In this respect the trilogy is a masterful piece of writing. It had its first hearing in Brooklyn last night and has been given only a few times in this country since it was introduced by the late Anton Seidl, nineteen years ago at a concert in Steinway Hall.

Very striking in its contrast to the trilogy is the Bach Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, the second number of last night's programme. The quaint charm of this work of the old school was readily appreciated, and the solo flute playing by Andre Maquarre was a rarely exquisite piece of interpretation. The overture to Schumann's little-known opera "Genoveva," was the third number of the programme, and if the overture fairly reflects the musical character of the opera it afforded reason enough why the opera is not better known. There are a great many more interesting overtures than this one of Schumann's, which is "uninspired," and gives little intimation of what he could do at his best. It is the sort of composition that would hardly survive if it were not linked with the name of a composer who had produced better things.

The Baptist Temple was filled by a closely attentive audience, which gave Dr. Muck a cordial greeting and indicated its appreciation during the concert. The orchestra, with many new faces, responded nobly to the hint of the conductor's baton.

Brooklyn N.Y.
TIMES
NOV 9 1907

Some of Brooklyn's most representative women were present at the concert given last evening at the Baptist Temple by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The dates of the Philahormonic concerts are December 6, January 10, February 21, and March 20. The officers of the Women's Auxiliary Board are Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. John S. Frothingham, Mrs. Candem C. Dike, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. A. A. Healy, Mrs. Otto Heinike, Mrs. C. B. Hewett, Mrs. Franklin H. Hooper, Mrs. A. Jacobs, Mrs. H. I. Judson, Mrs. J. E. Langstaff, Mrs. P. Lichenstein, Mrs. H. B. Mallory, Mrs. L. M. Palmer, Mrs. C. F. Pray, Mrs. G. H. Prentiss, Miss M. J. Terry, Mrs. J. Van B. Thayer and Mrs. George W. Wingate.

[47]

Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 9 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as conductor, opened its twentieth season in Brooklyn last night with a concert under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the concert brought out music lovers in great numbers, and the audience was a very representative one, many noted people of the borough being present.

The programme offered by Dr. Muck included works by D'Indy, Bach nd Schumann. The opening number was the Wallenstein trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, considered the greatest of Vincent D'Indy's compositions. This was its first rendition in Brooklyn and in all its difficult movements and passages the orchestra acquitted itself admirably, showing the careful training and the care and finesse of Dr. Muck's leadership.

This work of D'Indy, who is one of the latter day composers, and who himself led the Boston Symphony a few years ago, is a wonderful and expressive form of symphonic music, describing with vividness and vigor the episodes of Schiller's drama of the warrior Wallenstein.

At the conclusion of the renditidn of this great piece, the audience, which was held spellbound by the masterly work of the instrumentalists, rewarded their efforts by genuine applause.

The second number of the programme was the Bach Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for flute and strings, Hans Von Bulow's arrangements being used, and was as follows: Overture: Largo; allegro. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo. Sarabande: Andante. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: Allegro molto. Polonaise with double: Moderato. Minuet. Badinerie: Presto. Solo flute, Andre Maquarre. In this work the beautiful music of Bach is expressively shown, and especially the collection of dance music. The orchestra did justice to it, and the soloist, Andre Maquarre, is deserving of special commendation for his very fine rendition of a difficult work.

The concert closed with Schumann's Overture to Genoveva, Op. 81.

Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 8 1907

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Receives Cordial Welcome on Its Return to Brooklyn.

Brooklyn music lovers and patrons of the art, who are wont to subscribe to the best entertainments the borough affords, re-assembled at the Baptist Temple last evening for the first of the Boston Symphony concerts of this season. Many were in the seats they have occupied from year to year since the Temple was substituted for the Academy of Music, and yet the observing attendant missed some from the audience and more from the great orchestra, whose personnel in the past has been associated with the most exclusive of musical associations. It may take a little time for the Americans to get acquainted with the new artists, but if the music is up to the finished standard in production, they will accept the guarantee of managers for the strangers, who are expected to maintain the traditional rank of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Karl Muck wielded the baton with the technical understanding and the vigor which characterized his conducting last season. The programme opened with a composition new to Brooklyn—D'Indy's "Wallenstein," a musical trilogy based upon Schiller's dramatic poem by the same title. In this there was a great medley of musical effects as tone pictures. There were truly great passages in it, and some hint at the interweaving of themes akin to the master, Wagner.

This particular work is one which as much as anything he has written has brought to d'Indy the reproach or praise of being a follower of Wagner. As a matter of fact, the first and second parts of the trilogy were written before d'Indy had been in Germany, and before he had heard any of Wagner's later music dramas. When it was played in Boston recently it created unquestioned enthusiasm in both audiences that heard it, and many of those who are not in sympathy with the latest developments in French music were heard to wish that d'Indy had pursued his art more in the lines laid out in this than in the lines that he has followed.

The composer depicts Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini and Wallenstein's Death. The work is in three movements and the first and last movement bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas.

Bach's Suite No. 2 in B minor, which is a combination of seven parts, all of them after the overture, being dances of quaint style. This work is written for strings and the flute, and Mr. Marquarre, of the orchestra, did the solo work, which the audience thoroughly enjoyed. It is not a composition however that lends itself to a programme such as [illegible]. The concert concluded [illegible]

...per Cutting Bureau in the World

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 6 - 1907

SYMPHONY SCORES HIT

Boston Orchestra's Performance Perfect in Detail.

PROGRAMME IS DISAPPOINTING

Large Audience Hears First Concert of the Season—In Spite of Many Changes in Personnel, the Orchestra Plays Well Together Under Direction of Dr. Karl Muck—Harmony in the Ranks.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, opened its season at the National Theater, yesterday afternoon, with an audience which was even larger than the audiences which attended the concerts last season. Standing room was at a premium. The programme included Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Bach's "Suite No. 2 in B Minor," for flute and strings, and Mendelssohn's "Symphony in A Minor," generally known as the Scotch symphony.

There have been many changes in the personnel of the orchestra since last year, and in an organization whose ascendency over other orchestras is maintained partially through constant practice of the instruments together, and the amalgamation and blending of all the various instrumental choirs into a single whole, any such change must have been apparent and somewhat detrimental at the first concert of the organization, which was given in Boston nearly a month ago. But since that time the new material has had time to become thoroughly assimilated with the old, and Washington was the gainer thereby.

Performance Perfect.

At the four concerts given in their home city the orchestra has played all of the selections of yesterday afternoon. The performance was, therefore, destined to be almost perfect in every detail of interpretation. The new men who had been placed under Dr. Muck's training, and who were no longer the remnants left over from a previous regime, have, so far from being detrimental, actually improved the orchestra, now that they have been broken in. This will be admitted by all who recall the first concert of the orchestra last season. At that time Dr. Muck's methods were not as yet clearly defined, and the men themselves, though following his every indication to the letter, did not appear always to obey the spirit of the law. It was as though some of them played perfunctorily and as though their hearts were not always in their work.

Yesterday any such antagonistic spirit or any lukewarm attitude in the players had vanished. While none of their selections required the exercise of great emotional power, they had concentrated the force of it upon a unanimous utterance—upon the fulfilling by each individual of the will of the man who was directing them. The result was a beautifully finished performance, with every detail arranged with the most exquisite delicacy, and given sincerely as well as dutifully.

Programme a Disappointment.

The only disappointment (and that was not merely a disappointment to this writer, but was a source of regret generally commented upon by musicians present) was the programme itself. The Mendelssohn symphony has been played here many times before, and very well, indeed, by a local organization under the direction of Josef Kaspar. While it was well to hear it again, it did not arouse great enthusiasm. The Schumann overture is not an especially interesting work.

The Bach number, therefore, became the feature of the afternoon.

In this suite, Bach illustrates the legitimate use of a solo instrument with an instrumental chorus; and, if his ideals were followed to-day, we should be rid of that abomination—the solo instrumental show piece. The suite was given in the arrangement by Hans von Bulow, and the flute part was very beautifully performed by Andre Maquarre. The audience was comparatively cold in its demonstrations. It seemed hard to applaud more than politely a programme of this kind. In a theater where the Marine Band is in the habit of giving concerts, there should have been at least one number with stirring and thunderous climaxes.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

SOCIETY ATTENDS CONCERT.

Mrs. Roosevelt Among Those Who Occupy Boxes at the National.

A large and fashionable audience attended the first Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, and the gowns worn by many were notably beautiful.

Mrs. Roosevelt, wearing a becoming gown of brown chiffon cloth, trimmed with lace and embroidery, a brown hat and furs, occupied one of the boxes. With her were Mrs. Metcalf, Miss Cecilia May, Miss Ethel Roosevelt, Miss Isabelle Hagner, and Miss Young.

Another box was occupied by the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce.

The naval attache of the German Embassy and Mme. Hebbinghaus had with them in their box Miss Langham and Herr von Radowitz and Herr von Schubert, both of the Embassy staff.

Mrs. William Boardman, who also occupied a box, was accompanied by Miss Keep, Miss Beard, and Miss Emmett. Elsewhere in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Henry May, Mr. and Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mme. Portia, wife of the Minister from Argentina; Secretary and Mrs. Garfield, Mrs. Leonard Wood, Mrs. Truman Newberry, Mrs. Hunt Slater, the Misses Pilson, the Misses Conrad, Viscount and Viscountess de Martel, of the French Embassy; Mlle. des Portes de la Fosse, Mrs. Augustus Worthington, Miss Florence Worthington, Mrs. William A. Slater, Mme. de Thieny, Mrs. William Gordon Crawford, and Dr. and Mrs. Randolph McKim.

TIMES
ess
NOV 6 - 1907

BACH'S SUITE NO. 2 PLEASES AUDIENCE

Excellent Rendition of Mendelssohn's Symphony by Boston Orchestra.

The first of the series of five concerts for theseason 1907-8 by theBoston Symphony Orchestra, which was given yesterday afternoon in the New National Theater at 4:30 p. m., was evidently appreciated by the musical people of Washington, judging by the crowded house and enthusiastic audience The remembrance of Dr. Karl Muck's excellent work as conductor last year was shown by the burst of enthusiasm which greeted his entrance on the stage.

The first number on the program was Robert Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," a work that is seldom heard and not familiar to many people. This was the first time it has been heard in Washington. It was performed for the first time in Boston at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association, March 1, 1866.

The rendition by the Boston Orchestra was faultless—although the music is not very interesting.

The second number was Bach's Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, arranged by Hans von Bulow. The first movement in this suite, the overture, written in B minor, begins with a large and is followed by an allegro—a four-part tonal fugue. The second movement is the "Rondo" allegretto espressivo. The chief characteristic in this rondo is a recurring refrain as it is in all rondos. Next is the Sarabande, an andante. In this the flute and 'cello are in canon, and the first violins and violas are muted. Sarabande means dance and also noise.

Then the Bourree 1, allegro molto, and Bourree II. In the first Bourree the flute is silent. Then the polonaise, with double (or trio). A polonaise is more of a stately procession than a dance. In the trio of this polonaise the flute has a florid obligato to the violas and then the 'cellos. In the minuet the flute is again silent.

The last movement, the "Badinerie," (or Badinage) preso, takes the place of the customary final gigue. The flute solos in this number were played by Andre Maquarre, with extreme delicacy and daintiness, and a perfection of tone coloring.

The orchestra gave a beautifully finished performance of this suite, being perfect in almost every detail of interpretation. The different parts were well blended together, although there have been many changes in the orchestra since last year.

The last number on the program was Mendelssohn's Symphony, No. 3, in A minor, better known as the "Scotch" Symphony. It was decidedly the favorite work. It was written in 1842, and consists of four movements. The first movement opens with a slow introduction, andante con moto, in A minor. The theme is given out in full harmony by wind instruments and violas; 'cellos and double-basses were soon added. Recitative-like phrases in all the violins in unison follow.

The main body of the first movement, the allegro con poco agitato, in A minor, begins at once with the first theme in the strings, but the melody of the first violins is doubled by the first clarinet. This melodious motive is developed, and leads to a subordinate theme, assai animato for full orchestra, which is developed brilliantly. A climax for full orchestra is followed by a second theme in E minor. The movement ends with a short return of the theme of the introductory andante, in the wind instruments and violas. The second movement, vivace non troppo, in F minor. In this the clarinet plays a lively Scottish dance time, in which the familiar bagpipes are heard.

It is developed with great brilliance by the full orchestra. The second theme is a delicate staccato for the strings. The third movement is the adagio in A major.

The fourth movement, allegro vivacissimo in A minor, begins with a lively theme of a Scottish character on the violins, against repeated staccato chords for the violas, bassoons, and horns.

This theme, developed, leads gradually up to subordinate passage for the full orchestra. A second theme is given to wood instruments and first violins. This is worked up alternately with a second subordinate motive. It ends with the allegro maestoso assai, in A major. This last movement of the symphony has been called "The Gathering of the Clans." It is a march-like theme and is developed by the full orchestra.

This symphony has been played here many times before, but being such a favorite it cannot be heard too often. I do not know of anything more appropriate that can be said about it than what Ambros wrote about it: "A beautiful enigma requiring a solution."

Its full interpretation yesterday by the Boston Orchestra was carried out in every minute detail, including the chromatic storm at the end of the first allegro, the solemn march movement in the adagio, etc., etc.

Mrs. ROBERT HICKMAN.

...First Established and Most Complete
...per Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 6 - 1907

HEAR A SPLENDID CONCERT

Large Audience Approves Work of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fully Maintains Its Standard of Excellence Under Dr. Muck's Leadership.

The sixty-eighth performance in Washington of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the twenty-seventh year of its existence, was given at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, in the presence of a large and distinguished audience, and the smoothness and beauty of the orchestration, under the able leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, fully equaled the standard for excellence which this company of musicians has long maintained. The programme included numbers from Schumann, Bach, and Mendelssohn, and was the first of the two concerts to be given during the season without a soloist.

This was the first appearance in Washington of Mr. Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the orchestra, he having only arrived from Europe the latter part of September. Mr. Wendling comes to this country from the Court Theater of Stuttgart, where he is concert master, on a year's leave of absence. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81, was the opening number. The overture is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarionets, two bassoons, two valve horns, two trumpets, three trombones, kettle drums, and strings, and the movements, starting with a slow introduction, worked in a number of tender themes, the figure of the first being used to develop the second, on which the third is formed.

The Bach suite, in B minor, was, perhaps, the most beautiful of the programme, the movements carrying with them and suggesting all that was happy in life, with its undertone of pathos. The opening theme was followed by airs of dances and songs, with their accompaniments. Sometimes the flutes and harps sustained the notes of the guitar, and accompanied the song and dance.

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Op. 56, concluded the performance, and in this Mendelssohn composed to stir the heart.

The main body of the first theme in the strings is developed at once, and a climax of marvelous beauty and brilliancy concludes this movement. The full orchestration is followed by a second theme, equally beautiful. The second movement is in the place of a scherzo, while the last movement of this symphony has been called the gathering of the clans, and brilliantly rounds out the ensemble of exquisite themes of varying moods. Altogether, the performance was all that music lovers and musicians could expect from so proficient an organization.

...he First Established and Most Complete
...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
HERALD
ss
NOV 6 - 1907

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

Mrs. Roosevelt in Box at Symphony Concert.

NEW MEN AT BRAZIL EMBASSY

Mrs. Pinchot, Home from Europe, Reopens Rhode Island Avenue Home—Marriage of Miss Brewer to Lieut. Col. Watts Postponed—Miss Stratton Bride of Mr. Terra Deitz.

Mrs. Roosevelt occupied a box at the New National Theater yesterday for the first performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, being accompanied by her daughter, Miss Ethel Roosevelt, and having as her guests Mrs. Root, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Miss Cecilia May, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry May, and Miss Hagner.

Mrs. Roosevelt wore a very becoming afternoon gown in tones of tan and brown, and a large hat trimmed with handsome feathers and velvet. Miss Roosevelt was simply gowned in a smart walking suit of novelty cloth, and the other members of the party wore tailored gowns.

In the audience also were some of the diplomatic households, one party including Capt. Hebbinghaus, naval attache of the German Embassy, and Mme. Hebbinghaus, who had as their guests Miss Langham, sister of the Baroness von Sternberg, Mr. de Thal, second secretary of the Russian Embassy, was among other distinguished persons.

[48]

...First Established and Most Complete
...paper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 6 - 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season took place at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon, and was very largely attended by an audience that comprised the best in oficial and musical circles. Dr. Muck is again wielding the baton, and although he has much new material in his force he has welded it into a thoroughly harmonious mass, so that his readings are perfectly performed and the high standing of the orchestra for interpretative work is fully maintained. The program yesterday was Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," an opera which failed to receive much attention in his own country when produced and which is now rarely performed; a Bach suite in B minor and Mendelssohn's symphony in A minor, known as the Scotch symphony.

There was polite applause, but not any enthusiasm manifested at the work of the orchestra, although in the Bach suite, in which there were seven movements, all of which were daintily played with flute and strings, there was much interest shown, and fairly generous approval after each. The Mendelssohn symphony had been heard here several times before, and musicians were familiar with its vigorous harmony and its beautiful melodies, but it was played entirely through without any pause between each of its four movements, so that the tension of the audience was continuous from beginning to end.

Still, the work of the orchestra in its entirety was a joy and a delight to all music-lovers such as are found in the performances of no similar body of players.

...CATHOLIC, NY
NOV 7 - 1907

WORLD'S BEST ORCHESTRA

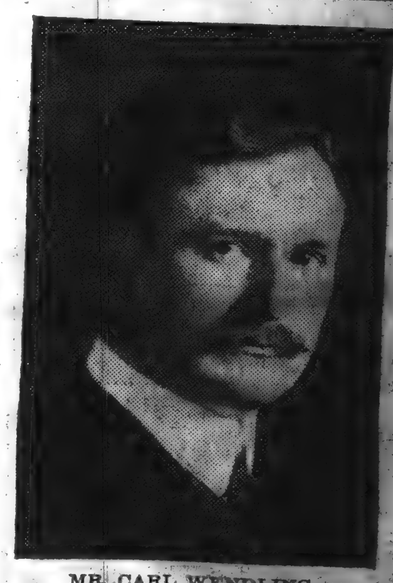
THRONG BRAVES STORM TO GREET BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Dr. Karl Muck Again Conducts—Something Of The Organization's History.

Probably neither in Boston itself nor in New York, where it is always greeted with affection, nor anywhere else, is the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave its first concert of the season last night at the Lyric, held in higher esteem than right here in Baltimore. The crowd which turned out in the storm to hear it is proof of that.

The Orchestra has been coming to Baltimore now for years. Its concerts are always the chief events of the musical season. In the early days it was difficult to fill the small hall where the concerts were held; today the Lyric is none too large.

Baltimoreans have watched it from the beginning—under Gericke, the "human



MR. CARL WENDLING.
New concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

metronome," the apostle of thoroughness, sincerity and refinement, to whom the great technical excellence of the Orchestra unquestionably is due; under Nikisch, the poetic and magnetic; under Paur and under its present leader, Dr. Karl Muck.

It has meant much to Baltimore in establishing a correct basis of music appreciation here. Since the much-handicapped Peabody Orchestra gave up the ghost there have been no performances of symphonies by local musicians. A whole great realm of music would be barred to Baltimoreans if it were not for the Bostonians. Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Mozart would be but chance acquaintances to the present generation.

Now the people of Baltimore not only hear the works of these and the other old masters of music and of the modern composers of high rank, but they hear them performed in the best possible way. Paderewski once said that the Boston Orchestra was the best in the world, and he had played with them all. Americans will not question his verdict. Particularly will not the musicians of Baltimore, who last night again showed what they think of the famous organization.

...ork, 18

...FIRST CONCERT

...ce Thrilled And Delighted By Dr. Muck's Organization.

The first of the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Lyric ...night, was largely attended, notwithstanding the drenching rain.

Dr. Karl Muck and the artists composing the brilliant organization of which he is the active head received an enthusiastic welcome, the applause being accentuated by the roar of the storm. It was but another manifestation of the sincere appreciation Baltimoreans have for the visits and work of the excellent organization.

The following program was given:

Suite in D Major, No. 3, for Orchestra. J. S. Bach
I. Overture.
II. Air.
III. Gavotte No. 1, Gavotte No. 2.
IV. Bouree.
V. Gigue.
Overture to Leonore No. 1.....Beethoven
Wallenstein, Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12 (first time in Baltimore).....D'Indy
I. Wallenstein camp.
II. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).
III. The Death of Wallenstein.

Although the concert was comparatively short, lasting little more than an hour, what it lacked in length was more than compensated for in interest. The Bach suite is said to have been composed by the great master during his stay at Cothen, where he was kappelmeister. The work is characteristically German, and the composer has resorted less to the resources of brilliant orchestration than to the development of the classic purity of its themes, with practically the strings alone.

Dr. Muck gave the work a clear reading, which reflected thoroughly the absolute control under which he has the organization about him. At no time was there a tendency to hasten the tempo, which is frequently the case in the rendition of a work of the kind, while the retention of the perfect tone balance throughout made the number a most enjoyable one.

The Beethoven overture proved a fitting ending to the first half of such an excellent performance.

In a great measure, because of its comparative novelty, the D'Indy trilogy was looked forward to with especial interest and was gratefully received. D'Indy, who visited Baltimore with the orchestra several years ago, is the leader of the modern school of French composers who trace their origin to Cesar Franck, and is probably the most advanced composer of that school. In this work he has taken his inspiration from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," "The Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." In it he has demonstrated his ability in brilliant orchestration, embodying in the work an infinite variety of interesting orchestral effects.

Several changes were noted in the personnel of the orchestra. Prof. Willy Hess, who was for a number of years the concert master and is now in Europe, has been replaced by Carl Wendling, who was concert master at Stuttgart and at the Bayreuth Festival Theatre. The resignation of Timothee Adamowski has also brought to the first desk, as assistant concert master, Julius Thornberg, of Copenhagen.

The next concert of the orchestra in this city will be given on December 4. Ignace Jan Paderewski, the Polish pianist, will be the soloist, and he will play Rubenstein's D minor concerto.

...BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 6 - 1907

Mrs. Roosevelt, who spent the morning shopping in the F street stores, occupied a box this afternoon in the National Theatre to hear the first Boston Symphony concert of the season. She was accompanied by Miss Hagner and Miss Ethel Roosevelt. Others who entertained box parties at the concert were Mrs. W. J. Boardman, Baroness von Sternburg, Mrs. James Bryce, Mrs. Leiter, Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. C. A. Williams and Mrs. James Lowndes.

...Bureau in the World
...NEWS
...BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 6 - 1907

The first concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Lyric this evening, will attract a large and representative audience.

...hed: London, 1881; New York, 188

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 7 - 1907

MUSIC

The First Boston Symphony Concert Of The Season At The Lyric Last Evening.

Last evening brought us the most discouraging storm of the season, and the wonderful Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nothing other than a desire to hear ideal music could have brought the people out through that driving rain to fill the Lyric, but the performance certainly made one forget the unruly elements outside. Dr. Muck rested most of the five months which he spent in Europe, having conducted only a few operas in May. He spent the balance of his vacation in the mountains, only leaving them in time to reach Boston for rehearsals. The Doctor is feeling more vigorous than he did last year, and he is glad to resume command of the Orchestra, and enjoys conducting in Baltimore, because of our concert hall, which, he says, is the best he has found in America. The Orchestra does not make the same effects in any other auditorium, for here its pianissimi are audible, and the fiercest fortissimi remain clear. No one can so appreciate these virtues as can the conductor, who finds them helpful in painting his tone-pictures.

Dr. Muck presented the following numbers:

J. S. Bach—Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra.
I. Overture.
II. Air.
III. Gavotte No. 1, Gavotte No. 2.
IV. Bourree.
V. Gigue.
Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore" No. 1.
D'Indy—"Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12. First time in Baltimore.
I. Wallenstein's Camp.
II. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini)
III. The Death of Wallenstein.

This programme gave characteristic examples of three periods in orchestral evolution, although the Bach Suite has been revised by reverent masters—Ferdinand David and Mendelssohn—who adapted it to the limitations of modern trumpet players in the upward range of their parts, but without materially changing its shades of color. The modern valve trumpet is a melody carrier, as well as a fanfare instrument, but it is not adapted to Bach's extremist, sustained high range. In those times there were players who had adapted mouthpieces and who especially prepared themselves for these parts. Various other orchestral instruments have become more resourceful, as time has advanced, and it is somewhat to these increasing possibilities that we owe the richness of modern instrumental schemes, for possibilities are in themselves suggestive. Beethoven also employed natural trumpets (without valves), but he was less tempted to use high filling tones than was Bach's habit. D'Indy's instrumentation is typically modern. He uses up-to-date material with exhaustive ingenuity and good judgment.

The Bach Suite was delightful. It, as a whole, edified the musicians in the audience, and the "Aria," which has become familiar to concert-goers through its adaptations for solo violin and piano and 'cello and piano, was entrancing even to the less experienced. This lyric is without doubt one of the purest inspirations with which the human kind has been blest.

The D'Indy "Trilogy" was wonderfully played, and it is an interesting composition. When D'Indy wrote this work he had not become infected with the new-school French insanity, for in it he recognizes the existence and usefulness of the euphony, which he in later works treats with contumely. The three tonal pictures which comprise the "Trilogy" are graphic and in many features fascinating, but, sad to relate, there is no strong individuality in his diction, and still less in his themes. He evinces a familiarity with various masters, but especially with Wagner. At the same time D'Indy does not lean conspicuously on anyone, his workmanship is masterly, and his instrumental colors wonderfully varied and expressive. The idea was suggested by a keen observer that perhaps D'Indy, realizing the unfruitfulness of his individual thematic invention, had embraced cacophony in order to be original. We prefer his first estate.

O. B. B.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 5 - 1907

Dr. Karl Muck

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its ... of the season at the ... evening.

...Bureau in the World
AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 7 - 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES

Dr. Karl Muck, Its Leader, Gives Excellent Program, and Was Well Received.

188

At the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening Dr. Karl Muck gave a program at once characteristic of himself and of his excellent taste for the best music. It consisted of the following three numbers:

J. S. Bach—
Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra.
1. Overture.
2. Air.
3. Gavotte No. 1, Gavotte No. 2.
4. Bourree.
5. Gigue.

Beethoven—
Overture to "Leonore" No. 1.

D'Indy—
"Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, Op. 12. First time in Baltimore.
1. Wallenstein's Camp.
2. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).
3. The Death of Wallenstein.

The exquisite Bach suite has been heard in Baltimore, but not lately. The wonderful "air" is a great favorite with the best violinists, and, therefore, often appears as a violin solo. It is a complete demonstration of the finest taste of the period in which it was written. The Beethoven overture is one of the remarkable three written for his only opera, "Fidelio." He did not choose to write more operas because he never could get another libretto to suit him.

The overture was played as only the Boston Orchestra can play it, under its most poetic leader. On the program it served as an appropriate bridge connecting the two centuries of art between Bach and d'Indy. This most modern of the French composers is seldom heard, because there are but few conductors who can present him, and fewer orchestras which can properly render the music.

Music lovers owe Dr. Muck thanks for giving them the rare opportunity of hearing something new, in fact, most thoroughly up-to-date, and at the same time good. D'Indy recognizes the fact that human beings are made up of feeling and thought, of will and understanding, and are not mere imitators of the blind forces of nature. His music is addressed not merely to a sensual sense of rhythm, but to the noblest human sentiments, and when it is understood it affords the highest kind of intellectual satisfaction. Altogether the concert was one of the best Baltimore has heard.

...NEWS
...NEWARK, N.J
NOV 7 - 1907

The Boston Symphony.

Many music lovers in this city and vicinity who wish to hear the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York, frequently complain that they are unable to gratify their desires because all the seats for the matinees are quickly subscribed for by New Yorkers, and for the reason that attendance at the evening concerts necessitates a late return home, to which women without male escorts object. The engagement of the famous Boston organization for a concert to be given in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 2, will make it possible for hundreds of women in this and neighboring communities to gratify their desires without inconvenience to them.

The orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of living conductors, is the musical director, will be brought here intact and will interpret one of its most interesting programs. The orchestra will give about one hundred concerts this season, including twenty-four in Boston and an equal number in New York. In its home city the concerts are given in the new Symphony Hall, and the seats are sold at auction prior to the opening of the season. An arbitrary upset price of $18 and $10 is fixed for the season's seats according to location. The seats are then sold at auction to the highest bidders, the bid above the upset price being a premium on the regular cost. At the recent auction the premiums bid were much higher than in any past season. For choice locations several subscribers paid as high as $150. In order that the concerts may be within reach of people of very moderate means, 500 seats in the second balcony for the Friday afternoon concerts are not sold at auction, but are reserved for the door sale at twenty-five cents each. So eagerly are these seats sought that hundreds of Bostonians line up before the box-office at a very early hour in the morning, with the hope of being accommodated.

The coming concert here is under the local management of Frederick N. Sommer. Those who wish to secure reserved seats before the opening of the regular sale can do so by sending requests, accompanied by checks or money orders, made payable to him to his office, 794 Broad street. All orders thus received will be filled the day before the sale at the Lauter company's music warerooms opens, and seats will be allotted as nearly as possible to the location desired.

...World
NORTH AMERICAN.
...PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 5 - 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA THRILLS AUDIENCE

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Superbly Rendered in Concert at the Academy of Music.

TRIUMPH OF TECHNIQUE

SYMPHONIC music of the genuine Hub brand caressed the ears and thrilled the senses of a great audience at the Academy of Music last evening—the opening concert of the Boston Orchestra's local series. There was no soloist, and the program comprised but three numbers—Bach's suite in D major—a fine opportunity for strings—Beethoven's Leonore No. 1 overture and D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein"—the latter a novelty here.

Age does not wither nor custom stale this splendid organization of instrumental virtuosi, some of whom have done yeoman service during the enire twenty-four years of the band's Philadelphia appearance. Its salient characteristics—its magnificent string choir; breadth and flexibility of interpretation; strong suggestion of mighty reserved force; faultily faultless orchestral technique; resolute reduction of the most sweeping, tempestuous and impassioned music to standards and ideals of St. Botolph's town, and general aspect of breezy artistic confidence and assurance—these and kindred qualities of primacy in orchestral interpretation were notably to the fore in last evening's concert, even as in earlier years.

Colonel Higginson's band, in other words, seems to be in a rut—an artistic rut, and high on the steps of Parnassers; but still, a rut.

D'Indy Music Superb.

The D'Indy music, the lovely second movement of which—written while the composer was under Liszt's influence—contains about all of the musical inspiration vouchsafed by the gods to the composer, presented almost appalling technical difficulties. Yet the great orchestra, with Herr Muck suavely indicating the tempo, surged and crashed through D'Indy's amazing score as though only a Papa Haydn symphony were in question. It was an extraordinary triumph of instrumental technique; for the orchestra was practically its own leader.

This additional peculiarity of the band—its apparent intractability under the batons of its various conductors, unfits it to render in full value a glorious composition like this Wallenstein music—concerning which an entire volume of glowing appreciation might be written.

The proper and adequate interpretation of D'Indy's monumental work would be a fitting task for a great genius of the orchestra like Carl Pohlig—whose former concertmaster, at Stuttgart, proved an admirable accession to the string choir of Colonel Higginson's great band of instrumentalists.

...Bureau in the World
...PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 5 - 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert for the Season Draws a Large and Brilliant Audience

There was a large and brilliant audience at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Those who closely scanned its membership may have noticed an unusual number of new faces in the ranks, as for one reason and another several of the old men have retired, but no change was to be recognized in the splendid volume and quality of the tone produced or in the superbability of the performance. Under Dr. Muck's masterful direction the orchestra played with all its wonted force and fire, with all the perfection of balance, lucidity of statement and eloquence of expression by which for many years it has been distinguished. The program was not exceptionally interesting. Its leading feature was Vincent D'Indy's trilogy, founded on Schiller's dramas of "Wallenstein's Camp," the "Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death," which, while intensely graphic and highly colored music, scarcely repays the attention it exacts and is only intermittently enjoyable. The other things were a transcription of Bach's suite in D major and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 1, which deserves to be more frequently presented. Both were admirably given. There was no soloist.

[49]

rom
ddress
ate

SYMPHONY'S FIRST CONCERT

Audience Thrilled And Delighted By Dr. Muck's Organization.

The first of the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Lyric last night, was largely attended, notwithstanding the drenching rain.

Dr. Karl Muck and the artists composing the brilliant organization of which he is the active head received an enthusiastic welcome, the applause being accentuated by the roar of the storm. It was but another manifestation of the sincere appreciation Baltimoreans have for the visits and work of the excellent organization.

The following program was given:

Suite in D Major, No. 3, for Orchestra. J. S. Bach
- I. Overture.
- II. Air.
- III. Gavotte No. 1, Gavotte No. 2.
- IV. Bouree.
- V. Gigue.

Overture to Leonore No. 1.....Beethoven

Wallenstein, Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12 (first time in Baltimore).....D'Indy
- I. Wallenstein camp.
- II. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).
- III. The Death of Wallenstein.

Although the concert was comparatively short, lasting little more than an hour, what it lacked in length was more than compensated for in interest. The Bach suite is said to have been composed by the great master during his stay at Cothen, where he was kappelmeister. The work is characteristically German, and the composer has resorted less to the resources of brilliant orchestration than to the development of the classic purity of its themes with practically the strings alone.

Dr. Muck gave the work a clear reading, which reflected thoroughly the absolute control under which he has the organization about him. At no time was there a tendency to hasten the tempo, which is frequently the case in the rendition of a work of the kind, while the retention of the perfect tone balance throughout made the number a most enjoyable one.

The Beethoven overture proved a fitting ending to the first half of such an excellent performance.

In a great measure, because of its comparative novelty, the D'Indy trilogy was looked forward to with especial interest and was gratefully received. D'Indy, who visited Baltimore with the orchestra several years ago, is the leader of the modern school of French composers who trace their origin to Cesar Franck, and is probably the most advanced composer of that school. In this work he has taken his inspiration from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," "The Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." In it he has demonstrated his ability in brilliant orchestration, embodying in the work an infinite variety of interesting orchestral effects.

Several changes were noted in the personnel of the orchestra. Prof. Willy Hess, who was for a number of years the concert master and is now in Europe, has been replaced by Carl Wendling, who was concert master at Stuttgart and at the Bayreuth Festival Theatre. The resignation of Timothee Adamowski has also brought to the first desk, as assistant concert master, Julius Thornberg, of Copenhagen.

The next concert of the orchestra in this city will be given on December 4. Ignace Jan Paderewski, the Polish pianist, will be the soloist, and he will play Rubenstein's D minor concerto.

ork, 18

NOV 3

Mrs. Roosevelt, who spent the morning shopping in the F street stores, occupied a box this afternoon in the National Theatre to hear the first Boston Symphony concert of the season. She was accompanied by Miss Hagner and Miss Ethel Roosevelt. Others who entertained box parties at the concert were Mrs. W. J. Boardman, Baroness von Sternburg, Mrs. James Bryce, Mrs. Leiter, Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. C. A. Williams and Mrs. James Lowndes.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

NOV 4 - 1907

The first concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Lyric this evening, will attract a large and representative audience.

hed: London, 1881; New York, 188

NOV 7 - 1907

MUSIC

The First Boston Symphony Concert Of The Season At The Lyric Last Evening.

Last evening brought us the most discouraging storm of the season, and the wonderful Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nothing other than a desire to hear ideal music could have brought the people out through that driving rain to fill the Lyric, but the performance certainly made one forget the unruly elements outside. Dr. Muck rested most of the five months which he spent in Europe, having conducted only a few operas in May. He spent the balance of his vacation in the mountains, only leaving them in time to reach Boston for rehearsals. The Doctor is feeling more vigorous than he did last year, and he is glad to resume command of the Orchestra, and enjoys conducting in Baltimore, because of our concert hall, which, he says, is the best he has found in America. The Orchestra does not make the same effects in any other auditorium, for here its pianissimi are audible, and the fiercest fortissimi remain clear. No one can so appreciate these virtues as can the conductor, who finds them helpful in painting his tone-pictures.

Dr. Muck presented the following numbers:

J. S. Bach—Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra.
- I. Overture.
- II. Air.
- III. Gavotte No. 1, Gavotte No. 2.
- IV. Bourree.
- V. Gigue.

Beethoven—Overture to "Leonore" No. 1.

D'Indy—"Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, Op. 12. First time in Baltimore.
- I. Wallenstein's Camp.
- II. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini)
- III. The Death of Wallenstein.

This programme gave characteristic examples of three periods in orchestral evolution, although the Bach Suite has been revised by reverent masters—Ferdinand David and Mendelssohn—who adapted it to the limitations of modern trumpet players in the upward range of their parts, but without materially changing its shades of color. The modern valve trumpet is a melody carrier, as well as a fanfare instrument, but it is not adapted to Bach's extremist, sustained high range. In those times there were players who had adapted mouthpieces and who especially prepared themselves for these parts. Various other orchestral instruments have become more resourceful, as time has advanced, and it is somewhat to these increasing possibilities that we owe the richness of modern instrumental schemes, for possibilities are in themselves suggestive. Beethoven also employed natural trumpets (without valves), but he was less tempted to use high filling tones than was Bach's habit. D'Indy's instrumentation is typically modern. He uses up-to-date material with exhaustive ingenuity and good judgment.

The Bach Suite was delightful. It, as a whole, edified the musicians in the audience, and the "Aria," which has become familiar to concert-goers through its adaptations for solo violin and piano and 'cello and piano, was entrancing even to the less experienced. This lyric is without doubt one of the purest inspirations with which the human kind has been blest.

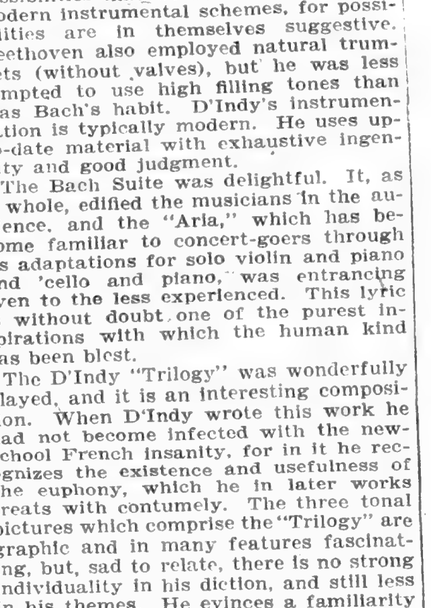
The D'Indy "Trilogy" was wonderfully played, and it is an interesting composition. When D'Indy wrote this work he had not become infected with the new-school French insanity, for in it he recognizes the existence and usefulness of the euphony, which he in later works treats with contumely. The three tonal pictures which comprise the "Trilogy" are graphic and in many features fascinating, but, sad to relate, there is no strong individuality in his diction, and still less in his themes. He evinces a familiarity with various masters, but especially with Wagner. At the same time D'Indy does not lean conspicuously on anyone, his workmanship is masterly, and his instrumental colors wonderfully varied and expressive. The idea was suggested by a keen observer that perhaps D'Indy, realizing the unfruitfulness of his individual thematic invention, had embraced cacophony in order to be original. We prefer his first estate.

O. B. B.

BALTIMORE, MD

NOV 5 - 1907

Dr. Karl Muck



Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its first concert of the season at the Lyric tomorrow evening.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN

BALTIMORE, MD

NOV 7 - 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLEASES

Dr. Karl Muck, Its Leader, Gives Excellent Program, and Was Well Received.

188

At the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening Dr. Karl Muck gave a program at once characteristic of himself and of his excellent taste for the best music. It consisted of the following three numbers:

J. S. Bach—
Suite in D major, No. 3, for Orchestra.
1. Overture.
2. Air.
3. Gavotte No. 1, Gavotte No. 2.
4. Bourree.
5. Gigue.

Beethoven—
Overture to "Leonore" No. 1.

D'Indy—
"Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller. Op. 12. First time in Baltimore.
1. Wallenstein's Camp.
2. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).
3. The Death of Wallenstein.

The exquisite Bach suite has been heard in Baltimore, but not lately. The wonderful "air" is a great favorite with the best violinists, and, therefore, often appears as a violin solo. It is a complete demonstration of the finest taste of the period in which it was written. The Beethoven overture is one of the remarkable three written for his only opera, "Fidelio." He did not choose to write more operas because he never could get another libretto to suit him.

The overture was played as only the Boston Orchestra can play it, under its most poetic leader. On the program it served as an appropriate bridge connecting the two centuries of art between Bach and d'Indy. This most modern of the French composers is seldom heard, because there are but few conductors who can present him, and fewer orchestras which can properly render the music.

Music lovers owe Dr. Muck thanks for giving them the rare opportunity of hearing something new, in fact, most thoroughly up-to-date, and at the same time good. D'Indy recognizes the fact that human beings are made up of feeling and thought, of will and understanding, and are not mere imitators of the blind forces of nature. His music is addressed not merely to a sensual sense of rhythm, but to the noblest human sentiments, and when it is understood it affords the highest kind of intellectual satisfaction. Altogether the concert was one of the best Baltimore has heard.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW YORK

NOV 7 - 1907

The Boston Symphony.

Many music lovers in this city and vicinity who wish to hear the concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, New York, frequently complain that they are unable to gratify their desires because all the seats for the matinees are quickly subscribed for by New Yorkers, and for the reason that attendance at the evening concerts necessitates a late return home, to which women without male escorts object. The engagement of the famous Boston organization for a concert to be given in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9, will make it possible for hundreds of women in this and neighboring communities to gratify their desires without inconvenience to them.

The orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of living conductors, is the musical director, will be brought here intact and will interpret one of its most interesting programs. The orchestra will give about one hundred concerts this season, including twenty-four in Boston and an equal number in New York. In its home city the concerts are given in the new Symphony Hall, and the seats are sold at auction prior to the opening of the season. An arbitrary upset price of $18 and $10 is fixed for the season's seats according to location. The seats are then sold at auction to the highest bidders, the bid above the upset price being a premium on the regular cost. At the recent auction the premiums bid were much higher than in any past season. For choice locations several subscribers paid as high as $150. In order that the concerts may be within reach of people of very moderate means, 500 seats in the second balcony for the Friday afternoon concerts are not sold at auction, but are reserved for the door sale at twenty-five cents each. So eagerly are these seats sought that hundreds of Bostonians line up before the box-office at a very early hour in the morning, with the hope of being accommodated.

The coming concert here is under the local management of Frederick N. Sommer. Those who wish to secure reserved seats before the opening of the regular sale can do so by sending requests, accompanied by checks or money orders, made payable to him, to his office, 794 Broad street. All orders thus received will be filled the day before the sale at the Lauter company's music warerooms opens, and seats will be allotted as nearly as possible to the location desired.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NORTH AMERICAN

PHILADELPHIA, PA

NOV 5 1907

BOSTON ORCHESTRA THRILLS AUDIENCE

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Superbly Rendered in Concert at the Academy of Music.

TRIUMPH OF TECHNIQUE

SYMPHONIC music of the genuine Hub brand caressed the ears and thrilled the senses of a great audience at the Academy of Music last evening—the opening concert of the Boston Orchestra's local series. There was no soloist, and the program comprised but three numbers—Bach's suite in D major—a fine opportunity for strings—Beethoven's Leonore No. 1 overture and D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein"—the latter a novelty here.

Age does not wither nor custom stale this splendid organization of instrumental virtuosi, some of whom have done yeoman service during the enire twenty-four years of the band's Philadelphia appearance. Its salient characteristics—its magnificent string choir; breadth and flexibility of interpretation; strong suggestion of mighty reserved force; faultily faultless orchestral technique; resolute reduction of the most sweeping, tempestuous and impassioned music to standards and ideals of St. Botolph's town, and general aspect of breezy artistic confidence and assurance—these and kindred qualities of primacy in orchestral interpretation were notably to the fore in last evening's concert, even as in earlier years.

Colonel Higginson's band, in other words, seems to be in a rut—an artistic rut, and high on the steps of Parnassers; but still, a rut.

D'Indy Music Superb.

The D'Indy music, the lovely second movement of which—written while the composer was under Liszt's influence—contains about all of the musical inspiration vouchsafed by the gods to the composer, presented almost appalling technical difficulties. Yet the great orchestra, with Herr Muck suavely indicating the tempo, surged and crashed through D'Indy's amazing score as though only a Papa Haydn symphony were in question. It was an extraordinary triumph of instrumental technique; for the orchestra was practically its own leader.

This additional peculiarity of the band—its apparent intractability under the batons of its various conductors, unfits it to render in full value a glorious composition like this Wallenstein music—concerning which an entire volume of glowing appreciation might be written.

The proper and adequate interpretation of D'Indy's monumental work would be a fitting task for a great genius of the orchestra like Carl Pohlig—whose former concertmaster, at Stuttgart, proved an admirable accession to the string choir of Colonel Higginson's great band of instrumentalists.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert for the Season Draws a Large and Brilliant Audience

There was a large and brilliant audience at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck. Those who closely scanned its membership may have noticed an unusual number of new faces in the ranks, as for one reason and another several of the old men have retired, but no change was to be recognized in the splendid volume and quality of the tone produced or in the superbability of the performance. Under Dr. Muck's masterful direction the orchestra played with all its wonted force and fire, with all the perfection of balance, lucidity of statement and eloquence of expression by which for many years it has been distinguished. The program was not exceptionally interesting. Its leading feature was Vincent D'Indy's trilogy, founded on Schiller's dramas of "Wallenstein's Camp," the "Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death," which, while intensely graphic and highly colored music, scarcely repays the attention it exacts and is only intermittently enjoyable. The other things were a transcription of Bach's suite in D major and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 1, which deserves to be more frequently presented. Both were admirably given. There was no soloist.

[49]

INQUIRER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 4 - 1907

BOSTON'S NEW CONCERT MASTER

Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and successor of Prof. Willy Hess, has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him, and the feeling is that his coming will be in the nature of a decided acquisition to the orchestra. Although he is but thirty-two years old, his career has been most important. He is a pupil of Joachim, with whom he studied for three and a half years. He is an Alsatian and native of Strasburg. For four years he was the concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra when Fritz Steinbach, now of Cologne, was the conductor. From there he went to Stuttgart as concert master, which position he now holds, for he is in America on a year's leave of absence. Mr. Wendling was especially chosen by Hans Richter to be the concert master at Covent Garden at the special performances of Wagner "Ring" in 1903, 1904 and 1905, and since 1903 he has been concert master at the festival performances in Bayreuth. Mr. Wendling, in addition to his French and German, speaks most excellent English.

...om CITIZEN
...ldress COLUMBUS, O
...ate NOV 3 - 1907

In view of the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 30, the first visit here for a number of years, a number have tried to recall the date of their last concert here. A music lover who saves all programs has given us two programs, one having no date, but Mr. Wilhelm Gericke being the conductor, it must have been between 1884 and 1889, his first term as director. There were three concerts given at this time—Thursday evening, April 15; Friday afternoon, April 16, and Friday evening, April 16, and were under the management of the Orpheus club. The soloists were Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mr. D. M. Babcock, Mr. Adamoski, Annie Louise Powell, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Fritz Giese. The other program bears the date of May 5, 1890, also under the auspices of the Orepheus club. The conductor was Arthur Nikisch, and the soloists were Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, soprano, and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, violinist. We give the program below as an item of interest:

Goldmark.....Overture, "Sakuntala."
Mozart—Aria, "Thou Mayst Learn to Hate Me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail."
Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.
Bolo—Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra.
Mr. C. M. Loeffler.
Grieg.....Suite "Peer Gynt," Op. 46
Songs With Piano.
Liszt ..... "Liebeslust."
Brahms ..... "Lullaby."
Goldmark ..... "Die Quelle."
Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1 in B Flat

We understand that Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony orchestra will give another concert here, presumably on January 9. Their concert last season, a Wagner program, was a notable event.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om DISPATCH
...ldress
...te NOV 3 - 1907

There is a very lively interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which does not come until January 30. The reserved seats are being sent as fast as subscriptions come in and it is surprising how many people are choosing to take advantage of this excellent way of selecting their own seat. Each subscriber chooses his seat and if the one he has selected chances to be taken, the very nearest one to his choice is sent him; or, he may select from the plat himself. It is a most satisfactory arrangement.

...om JOURNAL
...ldress
...ate

There is no concert of the season to compare with the Boston Symphony orchestra's in importance. Here is what many critics say is the finest orchestra in the world, not excepting the famous orchestras of Berlin, Leipsic, etc. Memorial hall ought not to have a vacant seat at this concert, which comes the evening of Jan. 30. The subscriptions are rapidly coming in and the tickets are sent by mail immediately on receipt of the subscription. A large crowd at this concert would visit from this

...om NEW YORK WORLD
...ldress
...ate NOV 10 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT CHARMS.

Classical Programme, Admirably Chosen, Pleases Audience at Carnegie Hall.

By Reginald de Koven.

The somewhat novel programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was admirably chosen, admirably brief, admirably classical and admirably played.

In these days, when the prevailing popular tendency is to clamor for and rush madly after a personality in matters artistic, as in other ways, when personalism emphasized to the last degree seems to be the open sesame to popular attention and favor, one must needs be a Boston Symphony Orchestra and a conductor of the eminence of Dr. Muck to tempt fate with so severely classical a menu.

The famous programme of Von Buelow—Part One, the Ninth Symphony; Part Two, the Ninth Symphony—recurs to one in this connection. But the programme yesterday was far less severe than this. Indeed, for the real music-lover and admirer of orchestral music of the highest type the programme possessed a charm, an artistic completeness wholly attractive and rarely satisfying. And the audience yesterday accepted it with every evidence of pleasure and entire appreciation.

Hearing this notable orchestra for the first time in several years and under its present delightful conductor, one brought, so to speak, a fresh ear to the proceedings, and the consciousness that the former feeling of complete artistic satisfaction always aroused by the work of this unrivalled organization was still there undimmed and undiminished; was eminently agreeable as showing that recollection was not at fault and that the glamour of the past did not belie the present. To say that this orchestra now plays up to its best traditions is to say all that can be said in praise of what may well be called the perfection of orchestral playing; where the orchestra, no longer a mere body of players, becomes a single magnificent instrument played on by its conductor with a master hand.

What more fitting to open a classical symphonic programme and strike the keynote of a classic mood than Mozart's G minor Symphony, with all its restless energy and gayety—not sorrow, as some commentators would have us believe—and the marvellous skill which makes it a monument of orchestral writing, a model of the highest type of pure classic music. The rendering was in all respects worthy of the work, the clarity and brilliancy of the last movement being especially noteworthy. And then, after a respectful pause, that wonder series of musical impressions, of tone pictures of poetic moods, known as the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven. One was in the country with the master, with its distance and perspective and the babble of the brook, the gathering clouds and storm and the after peace of the landscape, when Dame Nature, having frowned, once more smiled again.

Dr. Muck's reading, too, had all the charm with which a lover of nature invests his favorite sylvan scenes. Poetic, even fanciful, in his conception and treatment of this symphonic masterpiece, Dr. Muck brought out to the full the intense romanticism of the composer's thought and meaning without departing from the true classic feeling and repose. Here was programme music, the ideal music of its type, which suggests rather than attempts to baldly describe; purely subjective rather than objective. And yet the force of the storm was vividly realistic, and the delicacy and finish of nuance and phrasing throughout, especially in what serves as a scherzo, formally speaking, were simply not to be surpassed.

One could not help thinking, after listening to the effects wrought by the master hand of the greatest composer the world has known, what Beethoven could have done, would have done with the resources of a modern orchestra at his command.

A rarely enjoyable concert, where one could not help thinking that the personal note struck by a soloist would have broken the charm and destroyed the spell wrought by the perfect union of the creator and the interpreter. And why is there but one such orchestra in this country, and that is Boston, not here?

NEW YORK TIMES
...ss
NOV 10 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, last Friday evening. The programme included d'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy."

...blished: London, 1881; New York, 1884

[50]

New York Tribune.
154 Nassau St.
Date NOV 10 1907

MUSIC.

A DAY IN OPERA AND CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra gave its second concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Richard Buhlig gave his first recital at the same time in Mendelssohn Hall, and "Carmen" had a repetition at the Manhattan Opera House. In the evening a new tenor belonging to Mr. Hammerstein's forces effected his entrance on the American stage in "Il Trovatore" and Jan Munkacsy, a violinist, presented himself as a candidate for public favor at Mendelssohn Hall. Enough music for any community, save one with an appetite at once as capacious and as indiscriminating as that of an ostrich. The programme of the Boston Orchestra presented Dr. Muck, the director, in what appeared like a gracious mood after the affliction of Thursday evening. It consisted of two symphonies only—Mozart's in G minor, the sunny thing in which Schubert is reported to have said one night, "Hear the angels singing," and Beethoven's "Pastoral." Memories of Thursday would have sufficed to close the mouths of the querulous disposed to ask, Why two symphonies? had the two audiences been made up of the same people. As it was, the loveliness of the music and the perfection of the performance won an indulgence for the conductor, who did one of those whimsical things that conductors have occasionally permitted themselves to do since they became so tremendously significant an element in our musical life as they are now. Bless us! what a change since Haydn sat at a harpsichord and gave a simple indication of the tempo in each movement of his symphonies, and let the orchestra, under the leadership of the principal violin, do the rest! And that was not long before Mozart's angelic voices first sang or Beethoven ventured to delineate the feelings inspired by country scenes and, incidentally, little touches of the scenes themselves. But "men are only boys grown tall; hearts don't change much, after all." The listeners in Carnegie Hall yesterday enjoyed the old music as if a century's sophistication had left them untouched, as it had the reading of Dr. Muck. Rapturous applause filled every pause, and, had the conductor felt inclined, he might have repeated Mozart's Minuet and been amply justified. Beauty was spread like a benediction over all the music.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

Would that Dr. Muck always could dispense with soloists at the Boston Symphony concerts, as he did on Thursday night and yesterday afternoon, if only that one might not miss one moment of the enjoyment his own interpretative genius gives! Every instant of yesterday's programme was irresistibly delightful; every bar played by the almost perfect orchestra under Muck's moulding hands brought a moving message.

If Mozart's familiar symphony in G minor ever had a more sympathetic, lucid and straightforward reading in this city, when was it? If conductor ever brought out more eloquently the underlying spirit of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, revealing so potently the emotional background of this descriptive work, who was the conductor? Muck's interpretations were revelations in musical analysis and reconstruction, and a big audience applauded his achievement and that of his men.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
...ss
NOV 10 1907

Boston Symphonie-Orchester.

Das erste Nachmittags-Konzert der Bostoner lockte gestern eine so zahlreiche Menge von Kunstenthusiasten nach Carnegie Hall, daß selbst die mit Recht so beliebten Stehplätze im Nu vergriffen waren. Allerdings enthielt das Programm keine so schwer verdauliche Speise, wie es Bruckner's unvollendete Neunte ist, sondern zwei Werke, die auch dem Aermsten im Geiste gefallen müssen, nämlich Mozart's allerliebste Symphonie in G-moll und Beethoven's Pastoral-Symphonie. Wer an diesen beiden Meisterdichtungen kein Gefallen findet, der darf dem Konzertsaal ruhig fernbleiben. Im Mozart'schen Werke fand natürlich der liebliche Andante-Satz den herzlichsten Beifall, während bei Beethoven's Sechster schwer zu sagen ist, ob die Zuhörer beim Vogelgezwitscher, oder beim Gewittersturm oder beim abgeklärten Finale mehr aus dem Häuschen geriethen. Unter Dr. Carl Muck's Leitung kam Alles so wunderbar, so einzig exakt und klangschön heraus, daß die Kritik mit großem Vergnügen die Waffen streckt.

From NEW YORK WORLD
Address
Date NOV 10 1907

This week will be rich in musical offerings. On Thursday night the first concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall; Friday afternoon comes the first concert for the season of the Philharmonic Society; Saturday afternoon there will be given a concert by the Boston Symphony [illegible] Saturday evening the Philharmonic [illegible] Carnegie Hall

NEW YORK TIMES
NOV 10 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Symphonies by Mozart and Beethoven Make Up the Afternoon Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. As it did the first, without the assistance of a solo performer, and the programme was further departed from the usual form of concert programmes in that it was entirely composed of two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral" in F. Both works were performed with pleasure, yet the desirability of putting the two symphonies together on the same afternoon is not altogether clear. There is a good deal of musical substance in each of the two. The "too much" of symphonic music, if it came to the mind of any one, probably came in Beethoven's symphony. It would seem impossible to find that perfect utterance of Mozart's in any sense or in any place too much. It sounds to-day as much of a pure delight as it has in any of the 119 years that have elapsed since its creation—especially when it is played with so keen a sympathy and so full a grasp of its spirit as was the case yesterday. Dr. Muck presents it in anything but an academic light. He read it with freedom of tempo, with exquisite perfection of phrasing, with the balance and symmetry with which the composer conceived it. It had the note of passion and poignancy. The advanced thinkers in music to-day find in such music only a superior kind of wall paper designing, an arranging of tonal patterns, as opposed, for instance, to the Beethoven symphony that followed it on the programme, which mounts to higher things because it "interprets" something, and has a "poetic basis." But those surely are deaf ears that do not hear the poetry in Mozart's music, and who do not feel the interpretation it gives of something expressible only in terms of music, and not, therefore, the less real.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
...ldress NOV 10 1907
...ate

Boston Orchestra Concert.

The call of the quail and the note of the cuckoo, as well as the rumbling of thunder and the whispering of the brook, were imported within the vast spaces of Carnegie Hall yesterday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first afternoon concert of the present season.

It was a strange programme which Dr. Carl Muck chose and conducted. There were but two numbers, and they were symphonies—Mozart's G minor and the Beethoven "Pastoral," the latter referred to above. Such a musical menu holds forth invitation to none but those who love music for music's sake.

Dr. Muck conducted like a master of men and of music, and the orchestra played like men and musicians. There was in the playing of this fine body of musicians a virility that made its own appeal, and as contrast to this the solo work by the various first players and the minutest pianissimi of the entire orchestra stood as examples of refinement that linger in one's memory long after the last note of the concert has passed into blurred perspective.

The life and swing of the Mozart work were fine, and the details as well as the entire drawing of the Beethoven bucolic pictures, as expressed by the music of the "Pastoral" symphony, were delightful.

NEW YORK CITY
NOV 10 1907

Eine Besprechung der Boston Symphonie-Concerte in hiesiger Stadt wird bis auf Weiteres nicht mehr stattfinden, da die Gesellschaft es nicht für nöthig befunden hat, Einlaßkarten zu senden. Es ist sehr merkwürdig, daß Leute, welche so gute Musik machen, so wenig Taktgefühl besitzen.

Paper News
City Newark
Date State N J

Great Orchestra and Pianist.

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, will give its first concert in this city Monday night, December 9, in the Krueger Auditorium, and that Ignace Jan Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, will give a recital in the same hall, Tuesday night, December 17, has resulted in Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager, receiving at his office, Broad street, many orders for reserved seats. As these and similar applications, when accompanied by checks or money orders, are filed in the order received, they will be filled on the day prior to the opening of the general sale at the Lyon Company's music warerooms, the advantage of profiting by such a system of disposing of seats must be apparent to all who wish to attend either of the concerts.

The fact that the Boston Symphony is seldom heard outside of Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, makes its appearance here the most notable event of the season

...IREE...
...BUFF... N. Y.
...NOV 4 - 1907

BOSTON'S NEW CONCERT MASTER

Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and successor of Prof. Willy Hess, has made a most favorable impression upon all those who have met him, and the feeling is that his coming will be in the nature of a decided acquisition to the orchestra. Although he is but thirty-two years old, his career has been most important. He is a pupil of Joachim, with whom he studied for three and a half years. He is an Alsatian and native of Strasburg. For four years he was the concert master of the celebrated Meiningen Orchestra when Fritz Steinbach, now of Cologne, was the conductor. From there he went to Stuttgart as concert master, which position he now holds, for he is in America on a year's leave of absence. Mr. Wendling was especially chosen by Hans Richter to be the concert master at Covent Garden at the special performances of Wagner "Ring" in 1903, 1904 and 1905, and since 1903 he has been concert master at the festival performances in Bayreuth. Mr. Wendling, in addition to his French and German, speaks most excellent English.

1884

om ...
ldress ...
ite ...

In view of the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra on January 30, the first visit here for a number of years, a number have tried to recall the date of their last concert here. A music lover who saves all programs has given us two programs, one having no date, but Mr. Wilhelm Gericke being the conductor, it must have been between 1884 and 1889, his first term as director. There were three concerts given at this time—Thursday evening, April 15; Friday afternoon, April 16, and Friday evening, April 16, and were under the management of the Orpheus club. The soloists were Mme. Fursch-Madi, Mr. D. M. Babcock, Mr. Adamoski, Annie Louise Powell, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Fritz Giese. The other program bears the date of May 5, 1890, also under the auspices of the Orepheus club. The conductor was Arthur Nikisch, and the soloists were Mme. Steinbach-Jahns, soprano, and Mr. C. M. Loeffler, violinist. We give the program below as an item of interest:

Goldmark.....Overture, "Sakuntala."
Mozart—Aria, "Thou Mayst Learn to Hate Me," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serall.
Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.
Solo—Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra.
Mr. C. M. Loëffler.
Grieg.....Suite "Peer Gynt," Op. 46
Songs With Piano.
Liszt ..... "Liebeslust."
Brahms ..... "Lullaby."
Goldmark ..... "Die Quelle."
Mme. Steinbach-Jahns.
Schumann.....Symphony No. 1 in B Flat

We understand that Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony orchestra will give another concert here, presumably on January 9. Their concert last season, a Wagner program, was a notable event.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om ...
dress ...
te ...

There is a very lively interest in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert which does not come until January 30. The reserved seats are being sent as fast as subscriptions come in and it is surprising how many people are choosing to take advantage of this excellent way of selecting their own seat. Each subscriber chooses his seat and if the one he has selected chances to be taken, the very nearest one to his choice is sent him; or, he may select from the plat himself. It is a most satisfactory arrangement.

om ...
ldress ...
ite ...

There is no concert of the season to compare with the Boston Symphony orchestra's in importance. Here is what many critics say is the finest orchestra in the world, not excepting the famous orchestras of Berlin, Leipsic, etc. Memorial hall ought not to have a vacant seat at this concert, which comes the evening of Jan. 30. The subscriptions are rapidly coming in and the tickets are sent by mail immediately on receipt of the subscription. A large crowd at this concert will insure an annual visit from this

m ...
ress ...
te ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT CHARMS.

1884

Classical Programme, Admirably Chosen, Pleases Audience at Carnegie Hall.

By Reginald de Koven.

The somewhat novel programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was admirably chosen, admirably brief, admirably classical and admirably played.

In these days, when the prevailing popular tendency is to clamor for and rush madly after a personality in matters artistic, as in other ways, when personalism emphasized to the last degree seems to be the open sesame to popular attention and favor, one must needs be a Boston Symphony Orchestra and a conductor of the eminence of Dr. Muck to tempt fate with so severely classical a menu.

The famous programme of Von Buelow—Part One, the Ninth Symphony; Part Two, the Ninth Symphony—recurs to one in this connection. But the programme yesterday was far less severe than this. Indeed, for the real music-lover and admirer of orchestral music of the highest type the programme possessed a charm, an artistic completeness wholly attractive and rarely satisfying. And the audience yesterday accepted it with every evidence of pleasure and entire appreciation.

Hearing this notable orchestra for the first time in several years and under its present delightful conductor, one brought, so to speak, a fresh ear to the proceedings, and the consciousness that the former feeling of complete artistic satisfaction always aroused by the work of this unrivalled organization was still there undimmed and undiminished; was eminently agreeable as showing that recollection was not at fault and that the glamour of the past did not belie the present. To say that this orchestra now plays up to its best traditions is to say all that can be said in praise of what may well be called the perfection of orchestral playing; where the orchestra, no longer a mere body of players, becomes a single magnificent instrument played on by its conductor with a master hand.

What more fitting to open a classical symphonic programme and strike the keynote of a classic mood than Mozart's G minor Symphony, with all its restless energy and gayety—not sorrow, as some commentators would have us believe—and the marvellous skill which makes it a monument of orchestral writing, a model of the highest type of pure classic music. The rendering was in all respects worthy of the work, the clarity and brilliancy of the last movement being especially noteworthy. And then, after a respectful pause, that wonder series of musical impressions, of tone pictures of poetic moods, known as the "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven. One was in the country with the master, with its distance and perspective and the babble of the brook, the gathering clouds and storm and the after peace of the landscape, when Dame Nature, having frowned, once more smiled again.

Dr. Muck's reading, too, had all the charm with which a lover of nature invests his favorite sylvan scenes. Poetic, even fanciful, in his conception and treatment of this symphonic masterpiece, Dr. Muck brought out to the full the intense romanticism of the composer's thought and meaning without departing from the true classic feeling and repose. Here was programme music, the ideal music of its type, which suggests rather than attempts to baldly describe; purely subjective rather than objective. And yet the force of the storm was vividly realistic, and the delicacy and finish of nuance and phrasing throughout, especially in what serves as a scherzo, formally speaking, were simply not to be surpassed.

One could not help thinking, after listening to the effects wrought by the master hand of the greatest composer the world has known, what Beethoven could have done, would have done with the resources of a modern orchestra at his command.

A rarely enjoyable concert, where one could not help thinking that the personal note struck by a soloist would have broken the charm and destroyed the spell wrought by the perfect union of the creator and the interpreter. And why is there but one such orchestra in this country, and that is Boston, not here?

...NEW YORK...
...ss ...
...NOV 10 ...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, last Friday evening. The programme included d'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy."

blished: London, 1881; New York, 1884

[50]

New York Tribune.
154 Nassau St.
Date NOV 10 1907

MUSIC.

A DAY IN OPERA AND CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra gave its second concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Mr. Richard Buhlig gave his first recital at the same time in Mendelssohn Hall, and "Carmen" had a repetition at the Manhattan Opera House. In the evening a new tenor belonging to Mr. Hammerstein's forces effected his entrance on the American stage in "Il Trovatore" and Jan Munkaczy, a violinist, presented himself as a candidate for public favor at Mendelssohn Hall. Enough music for any community, save one with an appetite at once as capacious and as indiscriminating as that of an ostrich. The programme of the Boston Orchestra presented Dr. Muck, the director, in what appeared like a gracious mood after the affliction of Thursday evening. It consisted of two symphonies only—Mozart's in G minor, the sunny thing in which Schubert is reported to have said one night, "Hear the angels singing," and Beethoven's "Pastoral." Memories of Thursday would have sufficed to close the mouths of the querulous disposed to ask, Why two symphonies? had the two audiences been made up of the same people. As it was, the loveliness of the music and the perfection of the performance won an indulgence for the conductor, who did one of those whimsical things that conductors have occasionally permitted themselves to do since they became so tremendously significant an element in our musical life as they are now. Bless us! what a change since Haydn sat at a harpsichord and gave a simple indication of the tempo in each movement of his symphonies, and let the orchestra, under the leadership of the principal violin, do the rest! And that was not long before Mozart's angelic voices first sang or Beethoven ventured to delineate the feelings inspired by country scenes and, incidentally, little touches of the scenes themselves. But "men are only boys grown tall; hearts don't change much, after all." The listeners in Carnegie Hall yesterday enjoyed the old music as if a century's sophistication had left them untouched, as it had the reading of Dr. Muck. Rapturous applause filled every pause, and, had the conductor felt inclined, he might have repeated Mozart's Minuet and been amply justified. Beauty was spread like a benediction over all the music.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

Would that Dr. Muck always could dispense with soloists at the Boston Symphony concerts, as he did on Thursday night and yesterday afternoon, if only that one might not miss one moment of the enjoyment his own interpretative genius gives! Every instant of yesterday's programme was irresistibly delightful; every bar played by the almost perfect orchestra under Muck's moulding hands brought a moving message.

If Mozart's familiar symphony in G minor ever had a more sympathetic, lucid and straightforward reading in this city, when was it? If conductor ever brought out more eloquently the underlying spirit of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, revealing so potently the emotional background of this descriptive work, who was the conductor? Muck's interpretations were revelations in musical analysis and reconstruction, and a big audience applauded his achievement and that of his men.

ss ...

laut, im uebrigen ...

Boston Symphonie-Orchester.

Das erste Nachmittags-Konzert der Bostoner lockte gestern eine so zahlreiche Menge von Kunstenthusiasten nach Carnegie Hall, daß selbst die mit Recht so unbeliebten Stehplätze im Nu vergriffen waren. Allerdings enthielt das Programm keine so schwer verdauliche Speise, wie es Bruckner's unvollendete Neunte ist, sondern zwei Werke, die auch dem Aermsten im Geiste gefallen müssen, nämlich Mozart's allerliebste Symphonie in G-moll und Beethoven's Pastoral-Symphonie. Wer an diesen beiden Meisterdichtungen kein Gefallen findet, der darf dem Konzertsaal ruhig fernbleiben. Im Mozart'schen Werke fand natürlich der liebliche Andante-Satz den herzlichsten Beifall, während bei Beethoven's Sechster schwer zu sagen ist, ob die Zuhörer beim Vogelgezwitscher, oder beim Gewittersturm oder beim abgeklärten Finale mehr aus dem Häuschen geriethen. Unter Dr. Carl Muck's Leitung kam Alles so wunderbar, so einzig exakt und klangschön heraus, daß die Kritik mit großem Vergnügen die Waffen streckt.

1884

From NEW YORK WOR...
Address ...
Date NOV 10 1907

This week will be rich in musical offerings. On Thursday night the first concert of the Russian Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall; Friday afternoon comes the first concert for the season of the Philharmonic Society; Saturday afternoon there will take place a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Saturday evening the Philharmonic again, all these concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall.

...NEW YORK TIME...
NOV 10 ...

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Symphonies by Mozart and Beethoven Make Up the Afternoon Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert yesterday afternoon, as it did the first, without the help of a solo performer, and the programme also further departed from the usual model of concert programmes in that it was composed entirely of two symphonies—Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral" in F. Both works were heard with pleasure, yet the desirability of putting the two symphonies together in one afternoon is not altogether clear. There is a good deal of musical substance in the two. The "too much" of symphonic music, if it came to the mind of any, probably came in Beethoven's symphony; it would seem impossible to find that perfect utterance of Mozart's in any sense or in any place too much. It sounds to-day as much of a pure delight as it has in any of the 119 years that have elapsed since its creation—especially when it is played with so keen a sympathy and so full a grasp of its spirit as was the case yesterday. Dr. Muck presents it in anything but an academic light. He read it with freedom of tempo, with exquisite perfection of phrasing, with the balance and symmetry with which the composer conceived it. It had the note of passion and poignancy. The advanced thinkers in music to-day find in such music only a superior kind of wall paper designing, an arranging of tonal patterns, as opposed, for instance, to the Beethoven symphony that followed it on the programme, which mounts to higher things because it "interprets" something, and has a "poetic basis." But those surely are deaf ears that do not hear the poetry in Mozart's music, and who do not feel the interpretation it gives of something expressible only in terms of music, and not, therefore, the less real.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address ...
Date ...JUL...

Boston Orchestra Concert.

The call of the quail and the note of the cuckoo, as well as the rumbling of thunder and the whispering of the brook, were imported within the vast spaces of Carnegie Hall yesterday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first afternoon concert of the present season.

1884

It was a strange programme which Dr. Carl Muck chose and conducted. There were but two numbers, and they were symphonies—Mozart's G minor and the Beethoven "Pastoral," the latter referred to above. Such a musical menu holds forth invitation to none but those who love music for music's sake.

Dr. Muck conducted like a master of men and of music, and the orchestra played like men and musicians. There was in the playing of this fine body of musicians a virility that made its own appeal, and as contrast to this the solo work by the various first players and the minutest pianissimi of the entire orchestra stood as examples of refinement that linger in one's memory long after the last note of the concert has passed into blurred perspective.

The life and swing of the Mozart work were fine, and the details as well as the entire drawing of the Beethoven bucolic pictures, as expressed by the music of the "Pastoral" symphony, were delightful.

...NEW YORK CI...

Eine Besprechung der Boston Symphonie-Concerte in hiesiger Stadt wird bis auf Weiteres nicht mehr stattfinden, da die Gesellschaft es nicht für nöthig befunden hat, Einlaßkarten zu senden. Es ist sehr merkwürdig, daß Leute, welche so gute Musik machen, so wenig Taktgefühl besitzen.

* * *

Paper News
City Newark
Date State N J

* * *

Great Orchestra and Pianist.

The announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor, will give its first concert in this city Monday night, December 9, in the Krueger Auditorium, and that Ignace Jan Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, will give a recital in the same hall, Tuesday night, December 17, has resulted in Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager, receiving at his office, 791 Broad street, many orders for reserved seats. As these and similar applications, when accompanied by checks or money orders, are filed in the order received, and will be filled on the day prior to the opening of the general sale at the Lauter Company's music warerooms, the advantage of profiting by such a system in disposing of seats must be apparent to all who wish to attend either of the concerts.

The fact that the Boston Symphony is seldom heard outside of Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, makes its appearance here the most notable event of the musical season.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
NOV 11 1907

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Little as the public may be aware of it, the most important incident last week in the musical world of this city was not the opening of the Manhattan opera season but the first performance of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony. It was the only significant novelty of the season as yet in its infancy, and it is likely future chroniclers will reckon the performance as of great prominence in the musical history of New York. Yet what sort of reception did this great work of a great man receive from a Boston Symphony audience? Frigid indifference describes only feebly the greeting the crowd of refined men and women in Carnegie Hall thought fit to give, and calculated malice only mildly suggests the attacks aimed at it from critical quarters which it is unnecessary to specify. Of course, we did not expect that an audience made up in great part of subscribers for fashion's rather than music's sake would grow enthusiastic on first hearing Bruckner's long and profound score; nor did we hope even faintly that purblind writers, accustomed to hide esthetic myopia in cunningly prepared cuts and thrusts, would cast aside their armor, sheath their swords and for once encourage the admittance of new light. But could not one reasonably entertain a little hope that Dr. Muck's gentle auditors would appreciate slightly the importance of the occasion and show their gratitude, at least in the form of politeness, to him and his orchestra for unselfish labors? Isn't it proper, not to say imperative, to make objection when journalistic influence, instead of counteracting such indifference, encourages it in an effort to keep our public in utter darkness?

"There is no reason why criticism should close its mouth in the presence of this work," some one said. Nor is there any special reason, we may add, why somnolence should conceal yawning jaws from the public, though shame might well interfere with such an exhibition. But is there not cause for complaint when attempts are made to retard progress in musical appreciation by an aggressive policy that bears the marks of abuse rather than criticism? We may feel discouraged when men who should be leaders in public taste see fit to describe Bruckner's symphony as a "desert," to write of the first movement as "acidulous," of the wonderful adagio as a thing to invite "darkness and slumber," and of all three movements as "sorry and depressing companions to the thoughts of Bach and Beethoven, with which they were associated." We may be amazed to see Bruckner's music characterized as conceived "in the sterility of an emotionless love," as sprung from a "fancy, pallid, intellectual anæmic." We may stand dumfounded at such an assertion as this: "If ever there was a symphony built up by rule of thumb, no less rule of thumb because it is that of a master technician, this is one. In invention of theme it is scarcely worthy of discussion, because when it presents a really pregnant thought, that thought is not original." Still, every one has a right to his opinions, however absurd they may be, and no strictures can be made on loud proclamations of dullness and apathy. What we decry is the spirit of spiteful antagonism to musical progressiveness which shows itself in such utterances as these: "Why Dr. Muck should have exacted a penance from his subscribers at the first concert of this year's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it would be difficult to explain. To endure it was sufficient; there is neither desire nor energy left for the inquiry. Few of the subscribers were prepared for the blow." Again: "Let the performance pass into the limbo of all sad things with a fleeting record of impression." Again: "One could well fancy last night that he heard the auditors saying with one accord: 'We are sorry that this earnest and hard-working person died before he wrote the last movement, but, nevertheless, we wish that, since this had to happen, it had happened before he wrote the first.'" And what are we to say to this evident attempt at blocking Dr. Muck's laudable desire to present novelties: "We trust that Dr. Muck will spare this public further hearings of Bruckner's demonstrations of thematic theorems with corollaries on harmonic coefficients. There is enough beautiful music to provide New York with entertainment less narcotic. Let these learned proclamations be reserved for the academic considerations of the Bostonians."

The story is an old one. Wagner encountered the same obstructionist spirit right here in New York, and, it is interesting to note, from at least one of the writers who since then has attacked many others, including not only Bruckner, but even Brahms. Let us see: On December 1, 1886, "Tristan und Isolde," now generally acknowledged to be one of the greatest works of art the world has known, was presented here for the first time. On the following morning the critic of the Times, who now writes for another newspaper, published an article under these headlines: "First performance in America of a work not wanted outside of Germany, and not too often there. Beginning of the end of the craze for symphonic music in the opera." Looking through the body of the document we find some of the composer's motives described as "shapeless, unsuggestive and wholly arbitrary in their significance," reference being made also to certain "too infrequent melodious bits in the accompaniment." The critic even ventured to assert it would be absurd to proclaim that the first production of "Tristan" would be likely to be attended with consequences of unusual moment. He made this scorching comment in a burst of prophetic pride: "We would not be surprised if Wagnerism * * * had said its final word in New York." We need not expose further this critic's attitude toward Wagner in the days when many other persons were as indifferent toward the great composer as they now are toward Bruckner. Nor need we point out in detail his treatment of every novel expression of musical genius within the last twenty years, including the works of Wagner, Brahms, Bruckner, Strauss and Debussy. Only let the public take warning and look ahead, regardless of critical croakings. Bruckner's symphonies will come to their own, even in New York.

...Cutting Bureau in the World
...ess .....
NOV 11 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS TWO SYMPHONIES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon delighted a crowded house by its playing of Mozart's G Minor symphony and Bethoven's Pastoral symphony. Dr. Karl Muck led his men through both with unobtrusive but masterful direction and control, and they played with all the beauty of tone, the precision, the sonority and delicate shading for which they long have been famous. For the dulness of Bruckner's ninth symphony Thursday night, Dr. Muck was forgiven in the sweetness and light of the Mozart work and the eloquence of Beethoven's.

There was no soloist and no other number. Attention has been called to the novelty of giving two symphonies at a single concert, but Mr. Henderson has pointed out that at a concert in the old Chickering Hall many years ago by this same orchestra under Nikisch, the programme consisted of three symphonies by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

From .....
Address .....
NOV 1907
Date .....

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Programme of Two Classic Symphonies and No Soloist Pleases Well.

Having come safely through the Bruckner desert, the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first matinée in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon paused for refreshment at an oasis of real music. According to the preliminary pronouncements Dr. Muck approached with some timidity what he regarded as the dubious experiment of performing two symphonies in succession and permitting the rest to be silence. What a pity some one did not tell him that long, long ago in the old Chickering Hall Arthur Nikisch, conducting this same orchestra, performed a programme of three symphonies, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, and that most auditors called him blessed.

The numbers played yesterday were Mozart's G minor symphony and Beethoven's "Pastoral." Old and beloved acquaintances as these two compositions are, they preserve in the presence of strutting and overdressed moderns a lovely freshness and an ever new charm. Certainly they cannot fail to give delight when they are played with such opulent sonority, such solid and velvety tone, with such a nice balance of parts and with such a beautiful gradation of accent as Dr. Muck and his musicians brought to their interpretation yesterday.

The gentlemen of Boston played like virtuosi. For the instruction of conductors and managers it must be recorded that despite the fact that there were no exciting novelties on the programme and that there was no solo performer the audience packed the house.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1907

Dr. Muck made a programme of two symphonies for the second concert in New York of our orchestra on Saturday afternoon last—Mozart's in G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral," both played here last month—and again the reviewers are hearty in praise of the transformed orchestra. "Certainly," writes Mr. Henderson, for example, in the Sun, "they (the two symphonies) cannot fail to give delight when they are played with such opulent sonority, such solid and velvety tone, with such a nice balance of parts and with such a beautiful gradation of accent as Dr. Muck and his musicians brought to their interpretation yesterday. The gentlemen from Boston played like virtuosi." Tonight the orchestra gives a concert in Waterbury, Conn., returning to Boston Tuesday morning.

Apropos, the management of the orchestra has materially decreased for the current season the number of these concerts in minor cities of New England. The men take kindly to the monthly journeys to New York and the cities to the southward and to the week of concerts, in January, in the West. They have long disliked the occasional concerts in the cities within fifty or a hundred miles from Boston whither they had to go in an afternoon and return late in the evening. Dr. Muck, in turn, was not eager for such excursions, and so the number of them has been lessened.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)
dress .....
NOV 11 1907
te .....

Boston Symphony Concert, Carnegie Hall.

IT would be a soulless person who could find fault with the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. It is difficult to do it justice without falling into the schoolgirl fashion of superlatives.

The word "conductor" doesn't fit Dr. Karl Muck. He is a "Music Meister." Intellectual, accurate, reposeful—but intense—and fiery with a fire which glows but never flares. The orchestra in his hands is like an instrument played by a master.

Mozart's Symphony in G minor was played first. This is one of the most serious of the forty-odd symphonies of Mozart. It is almost melancholy in its seriousness and leaves one in a thoughtful mood.

The Beethoven Pastoral Symphony, which formed the second part of the programme, is one of the most familiar ones. Although it claims to be a simple story of shepherds and country folk, with a thunderstorm for a climax, it is much more than that. It is life and love and tragedy. The four movements have the same connection and inter-dependence that we find in a great drama. We lose sight of the technical side of music and are face to face with a great idea.

The first movement was characterized by great smoothness, the second by great finesse, the third by marvellous strength, the last by a poignant sweetness.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1907
BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

Brahms's symphony in D major, the lighter, serener and idyllic successor to the first—is the chief item on the programme for the next Symphony Concerts. Dr. Muck's performance of the first, last autumn was one of the remarkable achievements of his first weeks. Recollection of its understanding, beauty and power still linger and whet anticipation to hear him conduct in the second, different as it is in mood and expression from its predecessor. The other purely orchestral number is a new overture, played for the first time in America, "Christ-Elflein," by Carl Pfitzner, a composer, conductor and teacher of repute in Berlin. Dr. Muck heard the overture, which is of fanciful cast, at one of the musical festivals last summer in Germany and found it interesting enough to warrant performance here. Between these two pieces Mr. Paderewski reappears here for the first time with orchestra, taking the piano part in Rubinstein's concerto in D minor—the concerto that he chose for his first appearance in Boston sixteen yea... ago.

BOSTON JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 9, 1907.

It is only fair to presume that the next Symphony concert will be of more than ordinary interest, because Dr. Muck has placed on the program Brahm's second symphony in D major. Those who remember the superb rendering he gave to Brahm's first symphony last year will look forward to the performance of this lighter and more joyful work with great eagerness. On the same program will be another of the season's novelties, Pfitzner's overture, "Christ Elflein." The soloist will be Paderewski, who will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor No. 4.

The Longy Club is to give its usual quota of three concerts during the season, the dates being Monday evenings, Nov. 18, Dec. 30 and Feb. 10. The roster of the club is the same as last year, the flutes being Messrs. Daneil Maquarre and Arthur Brooke; the oboes Messrs. Longy and Lenom; the clarinets, Messrs. Grisez and Mimart; the horns, Messrs. Hain and Lorbeer; the bassoons, Messrs. Sadony and Helleberg; the pianist, Mr. DeVoto. Subscription tickets, with reserved seats, are now on sale at Symphony Hall, the price being $4. Mr. Longy has placed three novelties on his first program: A nonetto, by Gustav Schreck; a quintet, by Alberic Magnard, and a suite by Jules Mouquet.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 8, 1907

Last night, for the first time in the current season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in New York, and Bruckner's "Unfinished" symphony, heard here at the concerts of last week; Beethoven's first "Leonora" overture, which accompanied the symphony in Boston; and Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings, first played under Dr. Muck last winter, made the programme. The conductor and the band were warmly received, but the audience, by all accounts, sat rather impatiently under Bruckner's music. The reviewers in the New York newspapers this morning have little admiration for it; but—what is more to the point for us in Boston in view of the recent changes in the personnel of the orchestra—they have the same praise for the band as an expressive instrument that they have bestowed upon it for years. "It remains only to be said," Mr. Henderson ends his article in the Sun, "that Dr. Muck conducted last night with his unfailing insight and that the orchestra, though disclosing some important changes in its ranks, played like the Boston Symphony Orchestra." "It returns again," pursues Mr. Aldrich in the Times in similar vein, "under the direction of Dr. Muck, who has impressed an individual quality of his own upon its performances. It returns also with a larger number of new faces in its ranks than has been the case at the beginning of any other season, but its beauty of tone, its pliancy as an instrument in the hands of its conductor, its skill and finesse in executing his wishes, are as they have ever been. . . . Bach's suite was played with splendid muscularity and vigor, with delicacy and poetical feeling—not, it may be said, with absolute perfection of ensemble."

...strated
rom .....
ddress .....
ate .....

Carl Wendling, the new concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his American debut as a soloist at the last pair of Symphony concerts. Mr. Wendling created a favorable impression, giving a thoughtfully conceived and highly finished interpretation of Brahms' concerto. His tone, according to H. T. Parker in the Transcript, was clear, arm, undulating and sensitive, although Mr. Wendling lacked the compelling magnetism of a stirring virtuoso.

he is abroad on a year's leave of absence, and his place is temporarily filled by Mr. Carl Wendling, a young violinist who has had a most distinguished career in Germany, and who is ranked among the three or four great concert-masters in the world.

Of course Dr. Muck will play some new music here, although in three programs he is very limited in this respect. The novelties will be chosen from the list he has prepared for Boston, which includes new symphonies by Hadley and Bischoff, d'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphonic trilogy, Max Reger's variations; Noren's variations; Bossi's intermezzo Goldoniani; Charles Martin Loeffler's new work for orchestra and piano, "A Pagan Poem"; Ernst Roehe's symphonis poem "Taormina," and a number of others of equal interest.

Madame Olga Samaroff is already known in Providence as a pianist of more than usual brilliancy and musicianly merit, and it is at the request of a considerable number of the orchestra's subscribers that she is to be soloist at the first concert. Her previous engagements in Providence have won her a host of friends, and her return will be more than welcomed. Carl Wendling is decidedly a big violinist in all the meaning of the word, and at his debut in Boston when he played Brahms' concerto, he made a most favorable impression, and was received with much enthusiasm. Rudolf Ganz is one of the most scholarly and interesting of present day pianists, a man who has already made a great reputation, and who is certain to make a still greater

...m .....
...ress .....
te .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be at Infantry hall Tuesday evening, Nov. 19th; Tuesday evening, Dec. 31st, and Wednesday evening, Feb. 12th. The public sale of season tickets for the concerts will open Monday morning at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street. Prices, as in the past, for the series of three concerts, will be $4 and $5, according to location.

At all concerts there will e a distinguist soloist. Madame Olga Samaroff, the brilliant pianist appearing at the first, and the other two will be Carl Wendling, concert-master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Rudolf Ganz, one of the greatest of the younger pianists now before the public.

As last season was the best from every point of view that the Boston Symphony orchestra has ever enjoyed in Providence, there is every reason to believe that the coming series of concerts will be even more successful. As is generally known, Dr. Muck is again the conductor of the orchestra, having received from the German emperor an additional leave of absence of one year, and while nothing has been done toward fixing the conductorship for next year, it is the hope of the management of the orchestra, as well as of all the orchestra's friends that Dr. Muck may be retained for another period. Few personalities have made a more profound impression upon the musical life of this country than this distinguished German, who is at the head of America's greatest orchestra.

Prof. Willy Hess will not be at the first

...West 20th St. N. Y. City.
CABLE ADDRESS, "MEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YOR
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

[51]

LARGE AUDIENCE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

FAMOUS BOSTON ORGANIZATION IN SPLENDID PROGRAM.

A Revelation Even to Those Who Had Heard It Before—Carl Wendling's Delightful Rendition of the Brahms Violin Concerto—Dr Muck's Conducting and Its Results.

Heer is the queen of Fairye,
With harpe and pype and symphonye
Dwelling in this place.

It was indeed a "symphony" concert Waterburians listened to last evening at Buckingham Hall. A symphony is not alone "a harmony of sounds agreeable to the ear"; there are symphonies of arrangement and detail as well, and it can be truly recorded that the concert given by the famous Boston orchestra, under the baton of Dr Muck, with the orchestra's eminent concert-master, Mr Wendling, as soloist, was a symphony in its broadest meaning.

The orchestra, than which, in America, there is none more highly schooled, interpreted the great themes of the program with an authority that held the audience in rapt attention from the first note of the overture to the final echoing of the symphony; the violinist, a master of his instrument, and a scholar in his profession, added his quota of harmony and the program, with no number jarring, rounded the entertainment in such manner as to make it memorable in the annals of Waterbury's musical activities.

The audience was a brilliant one; and so emphatic was the support given this serious musical undertaking there can be no doubt left in any one's mind that Waterbury is ready and eager to sustain real musical art within her borders, and the Music League deserves unbounded commendation for its work in building so high a standard of music as to bring discriminating music lovers here from all parts of the state.

Extended analysis of the program is not called for in this review as the analytical notes written by Philip Hale have given the theme, or story, of each of the numbers. These program notes, by the way, show their writer's consistency in his opposition to detailed analysis of the sentiment or story of instrumental music. If our memory serves us right, not many seasons ago, it was this same learned and useful critic, who told us (with extreme irony) that the analytical program was a silly piece of business. Notwithstanding such high authority to the contrary, with the desire for true musical understanding on the part of laymen, it can hardly be gainsaid that explanatory notes are an essential part of any serious musical program.

We are not concerned with the fine discrimination so often dilated upon between the particular "styles" of the leading orchestral conductors. Dr Muck may be a great reader of Beethoven; Satonoff may be more bizarre in his interpretations of the music of the North; and another master may endeavor to give us a deeper insight into Wagner. These speculations may serve the purpose of making copy; they may even be useful in carrying performer and auditor more deeply into obscure motives, but we must be hypercritical if content does not follow sound and authoritative interpretation. Dr Muck is everywhere acclaimed a great conductor because his readings are sound, because they are truthful, because they rely upon a knowledge of the theory of the structure he is exhibiting.

Besides a broad knowledge of instrumentation and the art of the conductor in its highest sense. Dr Muck possesses a scholarly mind which gives to the orchestra under his baton an authority which not alone enchants the senses but which satisfies the observing mind as well. This was illustrated many times last evening in the masterly way he carried his hearers through the Schumann Overture. The themes were developed consciously—not once was there a suggestion of the lack of definite purpose. Dr Muck is a great conductor; not because of an idiosyncrasy, not because of anything sensational or bizarre, nor does he violate settled traditions regarding tempi; he is a great conductor because of great mental powers. It was intellectuality, pure and simple, that led his auditors, captivated through phrase after phrase of the Schumann work, with the wish, more than once fulfilled, that he would let some harmony persist—that he would keep a grip on it so to speak—until its last echo died within us.

The orchestra was a revelation, even to those who had heard it often. One cannot conceive more perfect attack, more finished phrasing than was listened to last night. And the grouping of wind and string instruments was marvellously planned. The rich sonorous voices of the blending tones of the second violins, violas, trumpets and horns was a performance that incites rhapsodic comment.

The great joy of this magnificently schooled orchestra lies in the fact that its conductors have been men of deep and broad temperaments, with which has been combined a mental grasp that appeals to the intellect of its audiences. So long as Boston can secure such conductors, there can be no question of the place this great orchestra will hold in the minds of those privileged to hear it.

Probably in none of Schumann's work is his great characteristic, introspection, more clearly evidenced than in his "Genoveva Overture." The interweaving of melody and harmony, calls, at times, for the utmost of penetration to follow the motive, especially when into a legato phrase is sometimes introduced a seemingly foreign rhythm that startles the hearers until its meaning is caught. The piece has the warmth and temperament of the poet and often displays the deeper introspectiveness of the philosopher. Especially noticeable is Schumann's personality throughout; a personality as dominant in nearly all his works as is found in either Chopin or Wagner. It may be true that the story of the unhappy Genevieve is not clearly or interestingly enough portrayed in the opera to maintain it in public performances, but what Schumann has given to posterity in the beautiful overture rewards him for the work as a whole. The manner in which the last phrase of the finale was played left the audience thrilled as though some sublime spirit has for the moment taken captive the emotions. There can be little doubt this composition will remain for a long time in the repertoire of leading orchestras.

The general impression that the overture form is a more happy vehicle for expression of the musical charm of a story or incident might with equal truth be said of the concerto. The lights and shades of the Brahms theme—if theme there is in the op 77 concerto—are brought out in greater abandon than would be possible within the limitations of the closely defined structure of the symphonic form. As there are yet many well informed music lovers to whom Brahms's music makes little appeal, the contrast of this number last evening provided opportunity for further study of this modern composer. There is no doubt Brahms's best known compositions are unusual in general treatment, though we cannot find that he has created much that is new in form. That he caught the poetic spirit, however, is undoubted and the surpassing loveliness of the clearly defined song in the adagio movement of this concerto should satisfy all lovers of beautiful melody.

The concerto demands, in unusual degree, natural temperament and most highly developed technic in its interpreters and Mr Wendling's playing of the difficult work thoroughly convinced his audience of the breadth of his virtuosity. In the development of the early theme the violinist's tone was sonorous in almost ravishing degree. Throughout the varied tone picture of the piece Mr Wendling showed a susceptibility to the composer's intent seldom heard. In the tremendous sweeps of the bravura passages there was no falling away from the utmost demands of the piece technically and in the tender, singing melodies, especially in the famous cadenza, the reserve and delicacy of the performer's art were exquisite. The tingle of pure delight which followed the closing bars of the finale left only one desire: We would like to hear Mr Wendling in a recital, with just a piano for sympathetic accompaniment. The orchestral background is fitting for the seriousness of a composition of this character and one is swept away by its grandeur, but with an artist of Mr Wendling's stamp there lingers the desire for the more intimate acquaintance afforded by the recital. Mr Wendling left his hearers grateful for a half hour of unalloyed joy.

Mendelssohn's most ardent admirers will admit that the Scotch "symphony" is misnamed, as nowhere in the composition is there consistent adherence to symphonic form. The symphony, in its technical meaning, is the well-defined and symmetrical development of three or four movements into a rounded and inter-related whole. "A Scotch Fantasie" would have been a truer name for this magnificent composition but, as Philip Goepp tells us, a name cannot damn a piece and all who are blessed by hearing this work care nothing for the limitations of a name. In none of Mendelssohn's compositions is there greater display of his "wealth of fine thought," interwoven with melodies of such divine beauty. The catholicity of the man is well known and this composition stamps him also as just as broad in his receptivity to art impressions in contrast to the atmosphere in which he was schooled. Mendelssohn was distinctively German, and this work, so consistently Scotch throughout, is a monument to his intellectual grasp of his theme. One tune follows another that is pure Scotch—from the bold chant of the clans, with its oboe obligato; through the songs of the heather, and the music of the fireside, the grim old ballad of the warrior, the pipes and clogs and reels of the merrymakers, purely lyrical chants, and the plaintive melodies of the hillside—all are Scotch, so splendidly Scotch—and all written by a German. And most of all, the real marvel of the piece (some commentators have said, the real beauty and strength of the composition) is the subtle portrayal of the Celtic humor and Celtic pathos introduced successively and with most vivid truthfulness.

It is the Celtic pathos here and there that exhibits the composer's unconscious genius; especially in the adagio movement. Here the subjective poetry of the art is dominant and we are led to speculate upon the subjective influence of music; upon its symbolism and the reaching out of the spirit for intangible ideal. It cannot be out of place here to quote the lines of the great philologist, Max Mueller, in whom the spirit of music found the truest of abiding places:

"It may be that I have given too much time to music, but what would life have been without it? I do not like to exaggerate or say anything that it not quite true. Musical ear grow sensitive to anything false, whether sharp or flat. But let us be quite honest, quite plain. Is there not in music, and in music alone of all the arts, something that is not entirely of this earth? Harmony and rhythm may be under settled laws; and in that sense mathematicians may be right when they call mathematics silent music. But whence comes melody? Surely not from what we hear in the streets or in the woods, or on the sea shore; not from anything that we hear with our outward ears and are able to imitate, to improve, or to sublimize. Neither history nor evolution will help us to account for Schubert's "Trockne Blumen." Here, if anywhere, we see the golden stairs on which angels descend from Heaven to earth, and whisper sweet sounds into the ears of those who have ears to hear. Words cannot be so inspired, for words, we know, are of the earth, earthy. Melodies, however, are not of this earth, and the greatest of musical poets has truly said:

Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard are sweeter."

JOHN W. KEYES.

WATERBURY EVENING DEMOCRAT.
TUESDAY. NOVEMBER 12. 1907.

HIGH CLASS MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Held a Delighted Audience.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, recognized as the finest of its kind in the world, with Dr Karl Muck as director, made its first appearance in this city last evening and at the Buckingham Music hall was greeted with perhaps the most representative audience that has ever assembled in Waterbury. The gathering was much larger than the average attendance at concerts, especially of such high priced nature. The concert, as far as the orchestra was concerned, as a triumph, moreover it was a source of pleasure to the Music league to perceive that its efforts to bring high class artists to this city were appreciated, for the receipts more than equalled the cost of having the celebrated orchestra here.

The Boston orchestra is indeed a wonderful organization! With a director most conservative, and who apparently is most joyful when leading the worthy aggregation of musicians, the orchestra moves with a smoothness that you would think almost impossible, when the number of the orchestra and the difficult renderings are considered.

Although as much attention is given to one part of the orchestra as another, it seemed last evening as though the violins could not be improved upon. The passages which would bring out the flaws of less skillful musicians as regards technique and tonal quality, were passed with an ease and excellence that could not fail to make the admirers of violin music feel enraptured. But if the violins were sure to be make one enthuse, what can be said of the violas, 'cellos, basses, horns, wood winds, oboes, clarinets, in fact the whole orchestra? Let it be said they were on a par with the violins.

But the orchestra itself did not win all the plaudits during the evening; indeed, it was Carl Wendling, the brilliant violinist, who made his second appearance in this country last evening, (his first being in Symphony hall, Boston, last week,) that received the ovation last night. But this does not mean that the audience enjoyed the soloist better than the orchestra. On such occasions it is always the soloist that is the recipient of the heartiest applause after the rendition of a pleasing number. Although yet young, being only 32 years of age, Mr Wendling was concert master at the Royal Court theater of Stuttgart and the regularly established concerts of the Court orchestra before he came to this country. He was granted a year's leave of absence, and will resume his work on his return to his native country.

Of course it was in Brahms' Concerto in D major, for violin and orchestra, that Wendling shone last evening. Although he had ample opportunity in the first two movements of the concerto, it was really in the finale that he was at his best. He does not make much work of his playing and the manner in which he took the florid running passages in the finale was indeed worthy of praise. Other compositions would undoubtedly have given the soloist a chance to display what might be termed brilliant playing, but the concerto was such that the audience had an excellent opportunity of beholding the ability of Wendling. The artist was recalled again and again, the audience hoping for an encore which did not come.

Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," the opening number, was well played and fairly well received. The music is never dramatic and the overture has been a huge success when played before the public.

[illegible] No 3 in A [illegible] students of music and was perfectly rendered by Dr Muck's instrumentalists, it is almost safe to say that Brahms' Concerto in D major, the second number on the programme, was as enjoyable, if not more so, than the symphony itself. Perhaps the cooperation of Mr Wendling made the audience appreciate the concerto more than the symphony. Although all three movements of the concerto are pleasing, the second, or adagio, was to the writer as enjoyable as any other passage during the evening. The first movement of a pastoral character is taken up by the 'cellos, bassoons and horns and the development is carried on by the full orchestra in harmony. The wood winds and strings play a prominent part, while the violin solo gives an effect that is good to hear. The unaccompanied cadenza tended to show what Wendling is capable of. The second movement is in the nature of a romanza, with enough dash in it to make it interesting to all who appreciate good music. The finale is a rondo in D major and is a fitting ending to a very intersting number.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony is purely classical and to be fully appreciated you must be well versed in the art of music; that is the reason the symphony has never become popular. It is in four parts, which in compliance with the intention of the composer are played consecutively without pause. This, as one critic remarked, does not give the audience time to breathe. When the symphony was first given in Boston one paper donated two lines to the orchestra and forty to Sivori, the violinist who appeared with the orchestra. The symphony is founded upon the story of Mary Stuart and David Rizzio. The symphony is purely "Scotch" although at times the music does not seem of the bonnie briar land. The Scottish dances in the second movement were exquisite and when brought out by the full orchestra were charming. The fourth movement is also for the delectation af an audience, and the orchestra has much hard work in this movement. The music is at times very slow, but then again goes with a very fast movement, so rapid, in fact, that the musicians have all they can do to keep pace with their director. The symphony is without doubt one of the best of compositions for an orchestra to show its true worth. But even with the Boston Symphony orchestra the composition seems a trifle long and very close to the "too classical" line. As stated before, the classical students undoubtedly sighed with regret because the number was not longer, but there were many in the audience who were not of the same opinion. The symphony, for the reason that is played consecutively, and is relished by students, is not likely to be ever fully appreciated by such an audience as that in the Buckingham last evening. But the orchestra and programme deserve all the good things that can be said of it. The Boston orchestra is something out of the ordinary and the audience would have been disappointed if they had not rendered some such composition as Mendelssohn's.

Last night's concert showed plainly that the music going public of Waterbury is desirous of the best in the musical world. Although early last week it looked as though the Music league would not make expenses, they knew by the sale of the past few days that the concert would bring even more than they hoped. The gallery of the hall was sold out early in the week and down stairs was well filled, although there were some empty seats. There should have been none.

The orchestra and their leader had nothing but praise for the reception tendered them in this city. Dr Muck, Manager Comee and several of the orchestra were entertained at The Elton after the concert. The orchestra left about midnight on a special train of Pullmans for Boston, where they will rehearse this afternoon for the next concert in that city.

WATERBURY REPUBLICAN, NOV. 12, 1907.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HEARD BY BIG AUDIENCE.

Dr. Karl Muck and His Men Play to Assemblage of Appreciative Auditors in Music Hall—Carl Wendling Pleases by Artistic Excellence in Brahms's Violin Concerto.

Delightful Rendering of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony by Famous Band—Critical Review of Concert—Its Notable Features—Financial Success Scored.

Welcomed by an audience which in brilliancy and appreciative enthusiasm has seldom been equalled and surely never surpast in the history of the city, the Boston Symphony orchestra, world-famed and deserving of the best reception that could possibly be accorded it, made its bow to the Waterbury public last night. Music hall in The Buckingham has already in its comparatively brief history witnest some notable musical events. But not until last night had its platform contained so notable an aggregation of instrumentalists; never had it echoed to music interpreted as the notable Boston band interpreted the program which Director Karl Muck had prepared for the delectation of his first Waterbury audience. As for the audience, it was one that did Waterbury credit, both as regards size and musical sapiency. It wasn't on hand merely because it knew the Boston Symphony orchestra was a famous musical aggregation which it was its duty to hear. It was evidently and unmistakably there because it liked good music and wouldn't have mist for the world hearing what it isn't saying too much to call the world's best orchestra play such music as only the Boston musicians, admirably trained and superbly equipt individually as they are, can play it.

A Wonderful Band.

The oftener one hears the Boston orchestra the more one is inclined to go into raptures over its work. Take the strings: Was there ever a grouping of violins and violas and 'cellos and basses equal to this? Each section sings as one instrument tonally magnified in proportion might sing. There is not only tonal accuracy and beauty of the highest type but a pervading sense of art wonderfully well exprest in the playing of these men. And so with the wood-wind. How characteristic the tones of its double reeds! And what luscious flavor in the every note of its clarinets and flutes! The brass section of the orchestra has been oftenest mentioned as least flawless. And yet how seldom in the playing of these sensitive instruments, so susceptible to the least variation in the temperament of the player or his physical condition, does the slightest flaw appear. Even the instruments of percussion seem to have a peculiar individuality of their own.

The Evening's Music.

The importance of the interpretative medium lies in the fact that it is indeed interpretative. It is the only means we have for conveying the ideas of the master creators of music from the creative brain to our own. Each notch of advance toward perfection in the interpreter adds to the pleasure we derive from the hearing. And after all, when we look at the thing in its true light, that audience was present last night not merely to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra but to absorb the creative ideas of Schumann and Mendelssohn and Brahms as the Boston Symphony orchestra conveyed them to us. We might be thankful that we had so perfect an interpretative instrument, but the music was the thing when the matter is sifted down to its essentials.

Schumann's Overture.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture was the opening number. With all respect to the immortal Robert, we must say that it made the least strong impression upon us of any of the evening's offerings. It seemed to lack the emotional sweep which the subject calls for. Its rendering by the orchestra was admirable in every detail, even the outburst of the horns in the famous measures, which Philip Hale complained of in the recent Boston playing of the overture as lacking in quality and true vigor, seemed to come out last night with electrifying intensity of effect. Dr. Muck let his forces loose as some leaders of the Boston band have failed to do when the occasion offered, and the virility and strength of the band stood out admirably in the dramtic tutti passages.

CARL WENDLING.

Soloist at Last Night's Concert.

A Sterling Violinist.

Second place on the program was given to the Brahms violin concerto with Carl Wendling, the orchestra's new concertmeister, as soloist. Mr. Wendling made a pronouncedly favorable impresion upon the big audience which was privileged to hear him upon what was his second appearance as soloist in America, in the same composition in which he made his bow to the American public a few days ago in Symphony hall, Boston. The Brahms concerto is a serious work. It is not a composition which a violinist who wisht to display merely his technical efficiency would choose. It is not lacking in chances for the virtuoso to shine. But essentially it is a thoughtful composition, crammed full of characteristic Brahmsian phrases. Seldom do these appeal to the emotions. The impression is more upon the intellect. Admirable singing passages, however, are to be found, especially in the romanza-like second movement. The finale is more the Brahms of the familiar Hungarian dances. It is the master in his most jovial mood.

Mr. Wendling proved himself a violinist of sterling attainments. His interpretation of the Brahms music was clean-cut, well thought out, admirably clear and incisive. One could hardly imagine a truer rendering of the music's spirit. Amply equipt technically for the task, he fulfilled it splendidly and eminently satisfactorily. Lovers of good violin playing in the audience may have heard more sensuous beauty of tone. They may have been electrified by greater feats of virtuosity. They could hardly have been drawn nearer to the true spirit of any composition by a soloist than Mr. Wendling drew them in playing this concerto. His delivery of the Joachim cadenza was admirable and in true keeping with the tone of the whole work. He was enthusiastically recalled again and again. There was evident appreciation of the real worth of his art and the notable expression of it with which he favored his audience here.

Scotland in Music.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony is well named. It is Scotch to the core. It seems singular that a man of Germanic training could have so well caught the spirit of an alien land as the talented Felix did in this work. It occupied the final place on the program and was played without pause between the movements. The audience was evidently in a disposition to break out with enthusiasm after the vibrating, pulsating, dancing phrases of the scherzo, but of course it didn't get the chance.

Few musicians have studied the first movement of this symphony without falling in love with it, especially in admiration of its wonderful technical construction. It is just about symphonically perfect. Boston's critical dean, Phil Hale, complained in his recent write-up of the orchestra's playing of it at home that the symphony has perceptibly aged. So it has, like wine, we should say, improving with age for those not carried away with the modern exoticism in music. There may be no soul-stirring depths in it, but it is good, healthful music, delightful to listen to.

The orchestra's performance of the work was exhilarating. It is just such a work as is calculated to display all the best qualities of the Boston aggregation of instrumentalists—except possibly their virtuosity. Even this was slightly taxt by the extremely rapid pace which Dr. Muck set for the scherzo. Mendelssohn's metronome indication for this movement is 126. If the director last night didn't beat up the tempo to at least a 160 metronomic rate then our sense of musical velocity is all astray. The excessive speed led, to our mind, to a clouding of the movement's characteristic phrase, and to a general muddiness that we don't remember having received the impression of in a reading by Arthur Nikish, we think it was, over this same orchestra.

Brilliant Work.

But however that may be, it cannot be denied that the effect was little short of dazzling. Soulful and beautifully phrased was the slow movement, breathing pathos and melancholy. Some of the finest singing of the 'cellos was done in this movement. Indeed, the wonderful strings of the orchestra fairly outdid themselves all thru the playing of this symphony. The whole band entered with a whirl into the dash and fire of the last movement, again peculiarly Scotch in its characteristics, and brought the concert to a happy close with the last sounding of its vigorous phrases.

Dr. Muck as a director of the Boston orchestra is the right man in the right place. That there can be no mistaking. He is a conservative without being a pedant. Loving the classics best himself, he nevertheless, in his broad eclecticism, is disposed to treat all sections of the musical public fairly. His program here last night was one, we believe, after his own heart. And it was well selected, we also believe, for local hearing. The audience certainly went away delighted with its last impressions, received in the magnificent reading he gave of the Mendelssohn symphony. The cacophonous phrases of a Strauss symphonic poem would probably have left a bitter flavor upon the musical palate of the multitude.

A Red Letter Night.

The visit of the Boston symphonists here was no less a notable event in the city's musical history than it was predicted it would be. The audience was one that probably no other body of players could have attracted. It almost completely filled the hall. It was appreciative, intelligently discriminative. It did credit to the city. Its attitude toward the orchestra and its work certainly could but have given pleasure to the director and his men. It is a matter of first-hand knowledge that Manager Comee, the orchestra's personal conductor, was delighted with the reception accorded the organization here. He couldn't, nor could Dr. Muck himself, say too much in praise of the hall and of the receptiveness of the band's auditors.

Happy, too, were the financial results. There will be no draft upon the Music league's treasury to make good a deficiency. The expense, heavy as it was, was more than met by the receipts. The first big venture of the league with an outside attraction has met with emphatic success. And the city has been given a musical treat that has given it eminent satisfaction and has done it a world of good musically.

The orchestra left on a special train of Pullmans at midnight for Boston, where a rehearsal for the next home concert is to be held this afternoon. Dr. Muck, Manager Comee and many of the players were entertained at The Elton after the concert.

Paper Post Express
City Rochester
State N Y
Date

Dr. Muck will give two symphonies at the concert of the Boston Symphony, in New York to-day the Mozart G minor and Beethoven's "Pastoral." That is the orchestral ideal as set forth by one of the greatest conductors of the age. Harvard university fought shy of a programme of three symphonies last year; but was shamed into classic decency by Dr. Muck's pathetic query: "If we cannot give three symphonies at Harvard university, where can we give them?" Well, three symphonies at a sitting is a hard saying, even for the most earnest music-lover. Some allowance must be made for difference of national temperament. The German will study for twelve hours a day and keep it up for many years. The American cannot do that; he is too mercurial. The German is deliberate and slow-moving; the American is alert, high-strung, intense. Your Teuton will hear two Wagner dramas in one day; three symphonies to him in a single evening is no tax. But the American lives faster, concentrates more; he may not be as thorough as the German, but his impressions are more acute. For him three symphonies at a sitting is too much.

[53]

JOURNAL
1884

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

First of Boston Orchestra's Three Occurs Next Week.

Following the established custom of recent years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will, during the coming winter, give three concerts in Infantry Hall in this city, the dates being Tuesday evening, Nov. 19; Tuesday evening, Dec. 31, and Wednesday evening, Feb. 12. The season of 1906-1907 was by all odds the most successful the orchestra has ever had in Providence, and there is every reason to believe that the coming winter will be even more so.

The advent of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, added much to the interest of last year's concerts, and now that he has become familiar with his orchestra and with his audiences even more may be expected from the artistic point of view. Much to the gratification of all music lovers, Dr. Muck has been allowed by the German Emperor an additional leave of absence for one year, which assures his presence during this season at any rate. Absolutely no plans have been made regarding the conductorship of the orchestra for 1908-1909. It is the hope of the management that Dr. Muck may be retained for one more additional season, and nothing will be done until this is settled finally one way or another.

When the orchestra appears at its first concert on the 19th many new faces will be seen. Since last spring it has gained two new first violins, three new second violins, one new viola, one new 'cello, two new double basses, a new bass clarinet, a new bassoon, two new horns, a new tuba and some new men in the percussion section. Some of these changes were made necessary by the death and resignation of old members. The others were made because of the necessity of keeping the orchestra up to its high standard and the pension fund is now making retirement of older members possible with a minimum of hardship.

There will be soloists at all three of the concerts, and soloists of very high rank. At the first concert, in response to the expressed wishes of many of the subscribers, the soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff. Mme. Samaroff, having spent the spring and summer abroad, returned to this country last month to begin her third tour, and the last one she will make in several years. The other two soloists will be Carl Wendling, concert master of the orchestra, who made so favorable an impression at his debut in Boston, and Rudolf Ganz, who is acknowledged to be one of the greatest of the younger pianists now before the public.

The public sale of season tickets will open to-morrow at Steinert's Music Store, 327 Westminster street. Prices as usual will be $4 and $3, according to location.

vspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PRESS
s

The Higher Music in Providence.

The more Americans in general, those particularly of the "effete" and lowly East, begin to feel their artistic oats, or awaken to a self-consciousness as something better than mere patrons of art, the more necessarily do the few great organizations such as the large orchestras, the grand opera and the institutions where paintings, old and cracked, or native and new, are exhibited, become integral parts of their lives. To-day there is less of the public which regards its patronage of a symphony concert as a benefit bestowed, as an exemplary act calculated to impress others incidentally to its giving the devotee a certain amount of pleasure. The taste for great music, that which goes deeper than a surface enjoyment of mere vulgar time, is something, indeed, by which to gauge the artistic temper of people; and those who undertake to measure the appreciative capacities of persons in this direction know the hypocrite at a glance, of course. He is one of a large and prattling class. But with all discount for the insincerity of the few, there are today, according to sufficient evidence, more and better lovers of this exalted form of aesthetics, the symphony, than ever the disparagers of a commercialized and dollar-grubbing America expected to see.

Such thoughts come inevitably with a survey of present conditions. Five great orchestras, among them that pioneer which helped to make Boston famous, have within the past year robbed Europe of the best musicians that could be enticed or stolen from the overcrowded but jealous ranks of virtuosi in the employ of ducal or royal orchestras, in order to supply in important positions in their own choirs of fiddlers such artists as would meet the taste of an American and very exacting public. Further, in order to distribute the benefits of their presence over a music-hungry area bounded on the west by the Mississippi, not only Pittsburg's organization that has fiddled its way to victory over the clangor of the boiler shops, but that honorable body, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have taken of such an august organization, as is that of a great theatrical star, does not mean necessity but generosity.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

With no other feeling than one of commiseration for such single-performance places as Hartford, Providence can hark back in history to prove its right to the three concerts which is its portion this year from the feast that is in twenty-four concerts in Boston. For twenty-seven years the city that plays Corinth to Boston's Athens has had its part in the career of the Symphony Orchestra. Where there were once six concerts between Hallowe'en and the first clambake, there are now but half that number; but it is safe to say that, with due respect to those who gave the Symphony approval in the old days, the present here as elsewhere witnesses the increase of those to whom this ultimate form of the ultimate art is a more intimate matter; the growth of a community to the real love, comprehending and discriminating, of music, which is but a spasmodic pleasure to the uninitiate, is like the progress of the individual from a casual response to melody to a pleasure in the subtleties of harmony.

The years that have seen a musical growth in Providence have known in its ministering angel, the Symphony, changes which have been important. Today it is a giant body, but still the most flexible and responsive of any but a few of the orchestras in Europe. This year it has a new concertmeister, Carl Wendling, in place of the familiar figure of Professor Hess, and, as his colleague at the first desk, Richard Czerwanky, a concert artist familiar to Germany. Dr. Muck has increased the choir of wood, wind and strings, thereby effecting a change demanded in the newer orchestration.

Out of the generous array of works with which the orchestra feeds the omnivorous Bostonian it must be difficult for the leader to decide upon just what he will give the Providence public, limited to three concerts; and it was last year a somewhat miscalculated guess that one number in each of the concerts must necessarily be from the realm of the latest orchestral writing. Sibelius could have been dispensed with for another Beethoven or a Mozart symphony, though to be up to date we were very thankful for that enlightening performance of the Glazounow symphony with its moments of ecstasy and horror.

To know the orchestra at its worthiest, particularly under its present leadership, it is in the music of the greater classics that it seems generally preferred. At its opening concert in Boston this year it gave the G-minor symphony of Mozart that Hazlitt called the "violet among symphonies," and the utmost test of its ability to reduce the tonal volume of the great instrument to the tender requirements of the composition, scored for one-tenth such a number of instruments, was acclaimed there as one of the learned conductor's finest achievements. We are not likely to suffer, as did New York on Thursday evening, with that unfinished symphony of Bruckner's, which was evidently dragged to light as a curiosity. The season here is too brief for curiosities, but not so short that it cannot give us a renewal of familiarity with the best and a taste of the most worthy in newer orchestral composition.

---

ess

The expression of dissatisfaction which imbued every criticism of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert this season, owing to the change in the personnel of some fifteen men and the insufficent number of rehearsals in which this foreign element might become assimilated, has since given way to the customary feeling of contentment. Bostonians are accused of being almost indecently inflated with pride and vainglory over this institution, and, indeed, there is much in their natural manner of attending to it as the only orchestra worthy of the name in the country to excite, even mildly, the ridicule of outsiders. But is it not really a national affair? And may we not anticipate some very startling developments in this same field right here in this city? Now that interest is being manifested in Mr. Schaefer's orchestra more generally than ever before it behooves us to remember that every organization of the kind has its beginning. Twenty-five years ago the Boston Symphony was a crude affair. It does, without doubt, stand at the head of the few big orchestras in the United States as the most finished and artistic product of scientific drilling and masterful leadership, but this should not discourage the lesser lights from endeavoring to improve their quality and spread the range of their influence. The St. Louis Orchestra has taken a sudden spurt in the right direction, having engaged an able conductor, Mr. Max Zach, who for many years has been associated with Boston Symphony concerts as performer, and often as conductor.

Dr. Muck has many novelties up his sleeve, among which one comes to mind of peculiar interest. Noren's kaleidoscopic variations, one of the new pieces by the younger German composers. Several of the variations, according to the German newspapers, "touch up" the idiosyncrasies of eminent composers, and the last of the set, labeled "To a Celebrated Contemporary," makes mocking play with two fragments of Strauss's "A Hero's Life." "The Kaleidoscope" is evidently to make the round of German orchestral concerts, and with it in the announcements for the winter often goes Bischoff's symphony, which Dr. [illegible] to play.

Local Season Symphon

There Are to be Three Concerts Here with Dr. Muck Conducting and a New Concert Master. Other Features of the Local Musical Situation.

WITH the present week the local musical season begins in earnest. A piano recital, two chamber concerts, and an afternoon of folk songs, following an unusual amount of special music in the churches today, will fill the week with unusual opportunities for the lover of real music.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The public sale of season tickets for the Providence concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open to-morrow (Monday morning) at Steinert's Music Store, 327 Westminster street. Prices, as in the past, for the series of three concerts will be $4 and $3, according to location. The dates of the concerts are as follows: Thursday evening, Nov. 19; Tuesday evening, Dec. 31, and Wednesday evening, Feb. 12.

At all concerts there will be a distinguished soloist, Madame Olga Samaroff, the brilliant pianist, appearing at the first, and the other two will be Carl Wendling, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Rudolf Ganz, one of the best of the younger pianists now befoore the public.

As last season was the best from every point of view that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever enjoyed in Providence, there is every reason to believe that the coming series of concerts will be even more successful. As generally known, Dr. Muck is again the conductor of the orchestra, having received from the German Emperor an additional leave of absence of one year. While nothing has been done toward fixing the conductorship for next year, it is the hope of the management of the orchestra, as well as of all the orchestra's friends, that Dr. Muck may be retained for another period.

Few personalities have made a more profound impression upon the musical life of this country than this distinguished German, who is at the head of America's greatest orchestra. Coming here an entire stranger, unknown by name except to those who follow closely musical life of the continent, and having to combat all the difficulties which arise from such conditions, from the time he first stepped on his podium in Symphony Hall, there was never any question that he was the right man in the right place. Boston's enthusiastic verdict was as enthusiastically confirmed in every city that the orchestra visited.

This year better acquainted with his orchestra and with his audiences, even more may be hoped of him. This hope in the short part of the season that has elapsed so far has been entirely justified, for never has the work of the orchestra been so brilliant as it is to-day.

It is not quite the same orchestra that Dr. Muck had last year. Since the spring many changes, some of them most important, have been made in the personnel. A number of these resulted from the death and resignation of members. The rest were made for the good of the orchestra.

Prof. Willy Hess will not be at the first desk this season as concert master, for he is abroad on a year's leave of absence. His place is temporarily filled by Carl Wendling, a young violinist who has had a most distinguished career in Germany, and who is ranked among the three or four great concert masters in the world. He came on a year's leave of absence to Boston from Stuttgart, where he for the last four years has been concert master at the Court Theatre and court concerts.

CARL WENDLING.
Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

concert [illegible] been concert master at Bayreuth for the last three festivals, and for three seasons Richter had him at Covent Garden in London to be concert master at the German performances there.

His colleague at the first desk in place of Timothee Adamowski, resigned is Richard Czerwonky, a pupil of Joachim, who is regarded as being one of the most brilliant violin virtuosi in Germany. Other new first violin are Julus Theodorewicz, a former member of the orchestra, and for the past several years second violin of the Kneisel Quartet, Alexander Ribarsch of Vienna, and William Treupe. Altogether the orchestra this year has sixteen new members.

Of course Dr. Muck will play some new music here, although in three programmes he is very limited in this respect. The novelties will be chosen from the list he has prepared for Boston, which includes new symphonies by Hadley and Bischoff, D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Symphonic Trilogy, Max Reger's Variations; Noren's Variations; Bossi's Intermezzo Goldoniani, Charles Martin Loeffler's new work for orchestra and piano, "A Pagan Poem;" Ernst Boehe's Symphonic Poem "Taormina," and a number of others of equal interest.

Now a word concerning soloists. Madame Olga Samaroff is already known in Providence as a pianist of more than usual brilliancy and musicianly merit, and it is at the request of a considerable number of the orchestra's subscribers that she is to be soloist at the first concert. Her previous engagements in Providence have won for her a host of friends, and her return will be more than welcome.

Carl Wendling is decidedly a big violinist in all the meaning of the word, and at his debut in Boston when he played Brahms's concerto, he made a most favorable impression, and was received with much enthusiasm. Rudolf Ganz is one of the most scholarly and interesting of present day pianists, a man who has

BOSTON HERALD--- SATURDAY
NOVEMBER 16, 1907.

AMERICA GREAT IN MUSIC--PADEREWSKI

Polish Maestro Says Boston Standard of Taste Has Not Varied Much.

"I think America is a great country musically, and I am very glad to be back here again with the three new works of mine which I brought into your country free of duty," laughed Paderewski yesterday afternoon in the artist's room at Symphony Hall. The great audience outside were still persistent in their demands for an encore, although the master had broken the rule of the Symphony concerts and already played one encore. Many of those out front had stood for hours in the hope of getting into the hall to hear the maestro, and he appreciated it.

Mr. Paderewski was in the happiest of moods, and not a shadow marred his happiness until the conversation turned on the alleged remarks of Mr. DePachmann, who said that the American people were without souls and musical appreciation, and that he wanted to get back home as soon as possible.

"All I can say about this talk," said Mr. Paderewski, "is that I can see no reason why a person holding such views should care to be in your great country at all. Why does a man who talks like this care for your applause, your patronage, in a word, your money? No, the American people love music. I do not say that they are a people who have not been learning, and who continue to learn, for while the standard of taste has not varied much in Boston and New York since I first played in these cities, and the critical appreciation is about the same, the conditions are the reverse in the smaller cities. There I find a great advance."

And then Paderewski was asked to talk a little about himself.

His New Compositions.

"Well, I have brought three new compositions with me, as I said. My variations and fugue I have already played in New York, and my sonata I will play to you here in Boston. And I am going to play Liszt's B minor sonata, which the critics don't like, but which I think is a very great work. In composing I am not following the elaborate ultra-modern school or returning to the simplicity of the great masters exclusively. We moderns are especially fortunate in that we can express ourselves as we desire. Sometimes the soul of a composer is complex and sometimes not. I believe in his expounding it through the school that best suits his particular mood.

"It may be that I am prejudiced, but I do not care for frock coats, evening dress or modern mise-en-scenes in grand opera. There is an absurd, incongruous something about the mixture I don't like. On the other hand, in operetta, like 'iDe Fiedermaus,' I think it is very effective. Wagner was right when he put the opera in unfamiliar scenes; he lent realism. Opera is incongruous anyway. Let us make it as probable as possible.

"In America you have most interesting conditions musically. You are doing good work. I want to mention George Chadwick of Boston, among others, as a man whose compositions I admire.

American Schools.

"In the subject of musical education in the university that gives general instruction, I do not agree with you entirely. Take Harvard. If a man is studying music there, he may get some good out of it, provided he is only seeking for it in a general way. Such a musical education would be good for the man who is to follow such a profession as a scientist, but when it comes to getting a musical education for the musician, these schools where music is taught with other subjects—oh, no, no.

"I tell you what it is," he said, "the real musical education, the education that counts, can be obtained only where there is a musical atmosphere. Your born musician cannot live without this atmosphere any more than a fish can live without water. This is all very serious for me; I am speaking just as I feel about it, most sincerely, and I want to be taken very sincerely."

The question of the American Bayreuth which Mme. Nordica is anxious to found was of great interest to the Polish pianist, who believed the idea was a splendid one.

"Well, in a word, I am very glad to be back, and did you like my playing this afternoon? Oh, I am delighted to hear you say [illegible] first time

---

You had ever heard me play? N... you liked me better now than ever before? Oh, I am delighted, for ... that I am improving," and Paderewski laughed at his witticism.

Women Crowd to Rehearsal To Hear Master as Soloist

While Paderewski slept peacefully at his hotel yesterday morning, dreaming not of Rubenstein concertos, hundreds of women gathered in front of Symphony Hall to wait for the "rush seats" at the public rehearsal there, at which he was to be the soloist.

The music-lovers began to line the steps of the hall of music at 8 o'clock. It was a cold morning, but they waited, their numbers growing constantly, until the doors were opened at 1. By 10 o'clock the earliest birds were somewhat blue about the noses and latecomers began to count up to see if they were within the 505 mark, as only 505 could hope to hear the master play. But the procession never ceased, and by noon the disappointed were turning away in scores.

The regular collection was there, the women who have huddled on the cold steps of Symphony Hall many a time to hear the artists they love. There was the woman who talked Ibsen and Maeterlinck, loudly, that the assembled company might know her as a woman of culture. There was the inevitable critic who preferred De Pachmann to Paderewski and told people so, but stayed.

Lunch boxes that were used in the days when mothers were schoolgirls were taken from the long hiding places and filled with lettuce sandwiches and peanut butter-covered crackers, for even these hero worshippers must occasionally eat. And, oh for something to drink!

From 11 o'clock till 1 they came in droves. Some mere men, too, thought they could afford to spend a half day from business, but they were too late from business, but they were too late. Some of those who arrived long after the full number were in line, continued to wait in the vain hope that somebody might faint and make a vacancy, but the majority wandered away a sadder and wiser host.

Paper Times Union
City Brooklyn
Date State N Y

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as conductor, opened its twentieth season in Brooklyn last night with a concert under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute, at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street, and notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the concert brought out music lovers in great numbers, and the audience was a very representative one, many noted people of the borough being present.

The programme offered by Dr. Muck included works by D'Indy, Bach and Schumann. The opening number was the Wallenstein trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, considered the greatest of Vincent D'Indy's compositions. This was its first rendition in Brooklyn and in all its difficult movements and passages the orchestra acquitted itself admirably, showing the careful training and the care and finesse of Dr. Muck's leadership.

This work of D'Indy, who is one of the latter day composers, and who himself led the Boston Symphony a few years ago, is a wonderful and expressive form of symphonic music, describing with vividness and vigor the episodes of Schiller's drama of the warrior Wallenstein.

At the conclusion of the rendition of this great piece, the audience, which was held spellbound by the masterly work of the instrumentalists, rewarded their efforts by genuine applause.

The second number of the programme was the Bach Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for flute and strings, Hans Von Bulow's arrangements being used, and was as follows: Overture: Largo; allegro. Rondo: Allegretto espressivo. Sarabande: Andante. Bourree I. and Bourree II.: Allegro molto. Polonaise with double: Moderato. Minuet. Badinerie: Presto. Solo flute, Andre Maquarre. In this work the beautiful music of Bach is expressively shown, and especially the collection of dance music. The orchestra did justice to it, and the soloist, Andre Maquarre, is deserving of special commendation for his very fine rendition of a difficult work.

The concert closed with Schumann's Overture to Genoveva, Op. 81.

Paper Calls
City Newark
Date NOV 10 1907 State N.J

DR. KARL MUCK.

New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—An Interesting and Attractive Personality.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, belongs to the new school of musicians which, if it is not giving to the world creative talent to be compared with that of the old school, is turning out interpretative talent such as the world has never possessed except in a very few isolated instances. Dr. Muck is not merely a conductor of highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which comes from the German universities, for he holds a degree of "doctor juris" from the University of Leipsic. In addition to being a musician, he is thoroughly a man of the world of the highest and best type.

Preceding his coming to Boston in the fall of 1906, he was the principal conductor at the Royal Opera, Berlin, from which post he is absent on his second leave of absence of a year. During all that time he enjoyed the personal friendship of the German Emperor. The latter's consent to his coming to America in the first place was most unwillingly given, and the negotiations which later resulted in the extension of his leave lasted for months and were successful only because of the unusual influence which was brought to bear on the Kaiser.

Dr. Muck is a slender, gracefully built man of medium height, with a strong, masculine face, which, if not exactly handsome, is decidedly attractive. He dresses very well and he likes jewelry; on his watch guard is a heavy chain and about his neck, his rings are rich and his scarf pins handsome.

Dr. Muck naturally has decided views on music. He does not hesitate to say that he finds little that is likable in much of the music that is being written to-day, and although much of it appears on his programs, he puts it there more from a sense of duty than from any love of it. He believes that the audiences of a symphony orchestra should be kept en rapport with all movements in modern music; moreover, he says, with rather grim humor, a diet of modern music soon sends all real lovers of music back with joy to the masters of the last century. As he puts it, it reflects the spirit of the age, as all music does, and is analytic and critical, the result of great skill rather than truly creative, the work of pure inspiration. It is of the head rather than of the heart.

He frankly cares for little that Richard Strauss has written since "Till Eulenspiegel." Mahler he accepts with reservations. Reger's music he places beyond the pale of art. Admitting Reger's extraordinary mastery of counterpoint, he sees nothing else in the latest Munich "genius." And yet his sympathies are very wide. He has always been a sincere advocate of Bruckner's genius, and he is called in New York an inspired interpreter of Brahms. He confesses fondness for much of the neo-Russian school and finds much that is admirable in the "younger Frenchmen." But in the end he believes that in the search for true art one must go back to the masters of the nineteenth century.

His views on conducting are equally interesting. He believes the whole duty of the conductor is to seek the truth and beauty of a work as the composer saw and, having given through the orchestra expression to this, his work is done. The conductor's personality has nothing to do with it. As a general rule, Dr. Muck says, when the conductor injects his own personality into the interpretation of a work, he arrives at conclusions just the opposite to those of the com-

Paper American
City Waterbury
Date State Conn.
NOV 6 1907

CONCERT SEATS.

Demand for Monday Night Improves Somewhat, but Good Places Remain.

There has been improvement within a day or two in the demand for seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert next Monday night—the sale having started briskly on Monday, but having fallen off later. There are plenty of good seats left for all likely comers, however, the prices for this really extraordinary musical attraction, such as is rarely offered in a Connecticut city, being $2, $1.50 and $1. They are to be had at the Buckingham Pharmacy, Bank and Grand Streets.

If there is a lover of art in one of its highest forms left in the city who hasn't already purchased a ticket for this concert the Music League would like to hear from him. If he doesn't consider it a duty to himself to hear this famous instrumental band, a world-wonder in its way—and a remarkable way too—then it can't but be thought that he has a queer conception of that duty. This is aside from any feeling of civic pride that he may have or ought to have in seeing the noted band get a welcome from Waterbury such as it receives from every cultured community which it visits—and it doesn't visit the other kind at all once its management sizes them up as such.

An exceptionally popular program has been prepared for the Waterbury engagement, when the orchestra, too, will put 75 men, its largest out-of-town force, on the stage. There will be two hours or more of the most delightful music that Waterbury has ever heard, in Music Hall, The Buckingham, next Monday evening. The lover of the tonal art in any good form who misses that will indeed be a loser. The famous Karl Muck will direct, and Carl Wendling, the noted violin virtuoso, will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N.Y. EVG POST
NOV 11 1907

Two days earlier the Boston Symphony was showing the best carriage company of Brooklyn an exiled half-brother to "Guglielmo Tell."

Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, after a Schiller poem, is no match for an opera war's trilogy of "Mephistos," variously spelled by Italians and French men who rewrote Goethe. But symphonic Schiller was refreshing by contrast. Not even old Bach's flute dances pleased a Baptist Temple audience any more than d'Indy's "slow waltz" and "more barbaric dance" in the "Camp of Wallenstein," where three bassoons tried to preach an old monk's sermon. The love-scene of "The Piccolomini" was graceful, too, and "Wallenstein's Death" was bravely died to organ harmonies and star-shine.

Mr. Higginson's local blessings brightened as they took their flight from New York on Saturday in double-barrelled symphony. Carnegie Hall greeted sweet Mozart unadorned and the simpler life of Beethoven's "Pastoral," a pattern for tone-poems yet. Silly old psychologist Beethoven! Like the ostrich that buries its head at sight of unknown danger, he thought he disguised his revolutionary picture-music by writing over it such captions as "feelings of foreboding before the storm" and "joyful feelings after the rain is over."

Speaking of pictures, why doesn't some enterprising photographer capture Carl Wendling's young seatmate, the fair-haired Czerwonky? He may not be Eugene Courvoisier's understudy in real life, but he might be frontispiece to the next souvenir edition of Jessie Fothergill's "The First Violin."

Dr. Muck has now floated off eastward like a rainbow after Bruckner. Mr. Comee, practical man, at a luncheon with Conductor Hertz of the Metropolitan, effected an exchange of famous headgear that got mixed at the last Boston visit of last spring.

From
Address
Date

MUSIC of all kinds was vouchsafed the devotees of Melos last week—music modern, music mouldering, music operatic, symphonic, and for solo instruments stringed, percussioned and pneumatic.

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra brought its new conductor here, Carl Pohlig, and with the assistance of Karl Klein, violinist, and Richard Buhlig, pianist, gave us an Election afternoon of linked music long drawn out. Pohlig led Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Beethoven's C minor symphony, and showed himself to be a conductor of energy, resource, and some measure of authority, although with gestures slightly spectacular and melodramatic. Karl Klein, in Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, made a valiant fight against its formidable technical difficulties and conquered a great many of them. He has real talent and will be heard from later in more impressive manner. Buhlig's hair crop, of astounding curve and proportions, suggested Paderewski but there the resemblance ended. Young Buhlig chose the Brahms concerto in B flat as the medium for his introduction to our patient public, and the choice was not wise, for no pianist on earth could make that rambling and incohoate work mean anything but a weariness to the mind and the flesh. Later in the week Buhlig gave a recital of his own and on that occasion no piano concerto was to blame for the cheerless entertainment the pianist offered. Brahms, Beethoven, Schubert and Chopin were the musical gods he invited, but they attended in name only, for of the real essence Buhlig revealed next to nothing. He called his recital "educational" [illegible] the way he intended.

This question of instructive concerts brings us to the two programs perpetrated by Dr. Muck and his Boston Symphony Orchestra in our town very recently. Do symphony subscribers go to those concerts to enjoy or to suffer? Suffer they certainly did, for the Muck ministrations offered no soloist except a flute player (in a Bach work of eight movements!) and in the main consisted of works that, taken separately—in single dose as it were—are endurable, but joined together in a concert made every normal listener wish they could be put asunder by main force if necessary. Bruckner's symphony in D minor is an unfinished work, and yet it required one hour for performance. Heaven only knows what the composer had in mind as the conclusion! The music is vague, futile, purposeless, and where it doesn't sound exactly like Wagner suggests him in some of his uninspired moments. The Boston Symphony audience has a reputation to sustain and it tried to take Bruckner with politeness, but the pianissimo patter of applause after Muck laid down his baton told all too plainly the tale of immolation on the altar of devotion. Followed the Bach music mentioned above and a Beethoven overture as an exciting and frivolous close. The second concert consisted of Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, and nothing else. No wonder that local music-lovers are asking themselves and each other whether Dr. Muck takes New Yorkers for musical barbarians who must be compelled to hear only the most serious music in order to form a real liking for it; or whether, on the other hand, he considers us so far advanced that nothing but programs of that kind give us real musical satisfaction. Dr. Muck would find that a little sugar-coating will make his patrons swallow the bitterest pills, so why not mix in occasionally some Dvorak, Liszt, Moszkowski, Smetana, Rubinstein, Grieg, Tschaikowsky and other similar ingredients more saccharine but otherwise quite harmless?

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
ess PROVIDENCE, R.I.
NOV 14 1907
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

Boston Symphony Seats.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, at which the soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff. The programme will comprise Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," Schumann's concerto in A minor, and Schumann's overture "Genoveva." The sale of seats will begin Saturday morning at Steinert's music store. 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK MAIL
om
ddress
ate NOV 1907

[illegible] will present in Boston [illegible] for orchestra and piano by [illegible] Loeffler, for many years [illegible] master of the orchestra. [illegible] Pagan Poem," and is [illegible] of Loeffler's [illegible] Loeffler [illegible] 1884 [illegible] north, but has been [illegible] America.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK MAIL
rom
ddress
ate NOV 16 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra December 5-7. Thursday evening he will probably play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and Saturday afternoon Rubinstein's concerto in D minor.

[55]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK EVG POST
ess
NOV 15 1907

One of the novelties scheduled for performance in Boston by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concert-master of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions it is programme music and is based on one of Virgil's Eclogues.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY
ress
NOV 16 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was welcomed by a huge audience at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November seventh, and Saturday afternoon, November ninth, when its first appearances of the season were made under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, and without the assistance of soloists. There were many new faces among the orchestra's ranks, but the tone, finish and beauty of ensemble were as fine as ever. The patience of the audience was greatly taxed by the interminable length of the opening number of Thursday night's program, Bruckner's Ninth (unfinished) Symphony. Not even Dr. Muck's careful and devotedly loving reading of this composer's works can make a New York audience enthuse over them. Containing many truly great ideas, their value and real beauty are lost in the lack of power the composer demonstrated to develop them and bring them to real fruition. This work, like all of his others, is of wearisome length. The audience applauded most politely at the end of the work, but were absolutely wanting in enthusiasm. Most charming and refreshing by comparison was the beautiful Bach suite in B minor for strings and flute, in which Mr. Maquarre, the first flutist of the orchestra, played with great finish the solo. The program closed with the Beethoven overture "Leonora" No. 1, which is seldom played and which was heard with great pleasure. The program on Saturday afternoon was most unusual in that it consisted entirely of two symphonies. Never did Mozart's Symphony in G Minor sound more beautiful. Dr. Muck's reading of it was full of exquisite charm. The wonderful coloring, phrasing and poetry of the work were all marvelously brought out. Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony which followed had an entirely different message, but it was given in the same sincere way, with the same artistic finish as the Mozart.

The Globe and Commercial Advertiser. ESTD 1797. NEW YORK'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER.
NOV 15 1907
Date

MR. PADEREWSKI, it is good to learn, will be the soloist not at one but at both of the next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on the 5th and 7th of next month. It is expected that at the former (Thursday night) he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and at the latter (Saturday afternoon) he will play Rubinstein's D minor concerto. These are to be his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season, though he will give two more recitals—Saturday afternoon, Nov. 23, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 14. 384.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.
CABLE ADDRESS, "OMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World ddress PROVIDENCE.
ate
NOV 14 1907
tablishe

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sale of seats for the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall on next Tuesday evening, will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, on Saturday morning next, Nov. 16. The soloist at this concert will be Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist, and the program will comprise Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," Schumann's concerto for pianoforte in A minor, and Schumann's overture "Genoveva."

Paper Call
City Newark
Date NOV 1 1907 State N. J

DR. KARL MUCK.

The New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—An Interesting and Attractive Personality.

Dr. Karl Muck, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, belongs to the new school of musicians which, if it is not giving to the world creative talent to be compared with that of the old school, is turning out interpretative talent such as the world has never possessed except in a very few isolated instances. Dr. Muck is not merely a conductor of highest authority, but he is a man of broad interests, whose musicianship has as its basic foundation the thorough education and culture which comes from the German universities, for he holds a degree of "doctor juris" from the University of Leipsic. In addition to being a musician, he is thoroughly a man of the world of the highest and best type.

Preceding his coming to Boston in the fall of 1906, he was the principal conductor at the Royal Opera, Berlin, from which post he is absent on his second leave of absence of a year. During all that time he enjoyed the personal friendship of the German Emperor. The latter's consent to his coming to America in the first place was most unwillingly given, and the negotiations which last winter resulted in the extension of his leave lasted for months and were successful only because of the unusual influence which was brought to bear on the Kaiser.

Dr. Muck is a slender, gracefully built man of medium height, with a strong, masculine face, which, if not exactly handsome, is decidedly attractive. He dresses very well and he likes jewelry, for his watch guard is a heavy chain worn about his neck, his rings are rich and his scarf pins handsome.

Dr. Muck naturally has decided views on music. He does not hesitate to say that he finds little that is likable in much of the music that is being written to-day, and although much of it appears on his programs, he puts it there more from a sense of duty than from any love of it. He believes that the audiences of a symphony orchestra should be kept en rapport with all movements in modern music; moreover, he says, with rather grim humor, a diet of modern music soon sends all real lovers of music back with joy to the masters of the last century. As he puts it, it reflects the spirit of the age, as all music does, and is analytic and critical, the result of great skill rather truly creative, the work of pure inspiration. It is of the head rather than of the heart.

He frankly cares for little that Richard Strauss has written since "Till Eulenspiegel." Mahler he accepts with reservations. Reger's music he places beyond the pale of art. Admitting Reger's extraordinary mastery of counterpoint, he sees nothing else in the latest Munich "genius." And yet his sympathies are very wide. He has always been a sincere advocate of Bruckner's genius, and he is called in New York an inspired interpreter of Brahms. He confesses fondness for much of the neo-Russian school and finds much that is admirable in the "younger Frenchmen." But in the end he believes that in the search for true beauty one must go back to the masters of the nineteenth century.

His views on conducting are equally interesting. He believes the whole duty of the conductor is to seek the truth and beauty of a work as the composer saw it, and, having given through the orchestra expression to this, his work is done. The conductor's personality has nothing to do with it. As a general rule, Dr. Muck says, when the conductor injects his own personality into the interpretation of a work, he arrives at conclusions just the opposite to those of the composer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PROVIDENCE.
Boston Symphony Seats.
The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, at which the soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, the pianist. The programme will comprise Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein," Schumann's concerto for pianoforte in A-minor, and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." The sale of seats will begin Saturday morning at Steinert's music store.
1884
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK MAIL
Dr. Karl Muck will present in Boston a new work for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concert master of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem," and is said to be characteristic of Loeffler's tendencies to programme music. Loeffler is an Alsatian by birth, but has been [illegible] two years in America.
1884

Paper American
City Waterbury
Date State Conn.

CONCERT SEATS.

Demand for Monday Night Improves Somewhat, but Good Places Remain.

There has been improvement within a day or two in the demand for seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert next Monday night—the sale having started briskly on Monday, but having fallen off later. There are plenty of good seats left for all likely comers, however, the prices for this really extraordinary musical attraction, such as is rarely offered in a Connecticut city, being $2, $1.50 and $1. They are to be had at the Buckingham Pharmacy, Bank and Grand Streets.

If there is a lover of art in one of its highest forms left in the city who hasn't already purchased a ticket for this concert the Music League would like to hear from him. If he doesn't consider it a duty to himself to hear this famous instrumental band, a world-wonder in its way—and a remarkable way too—then it can't but be thought that he has a queer conception of that duty. This is aside from any feeling of civic pride that he may have or ought to have in seeing the noted band get a welcome from Waterbury such as it receives from every cultured community which it visits—and it doesn't visit the other kind at all once its management sizes them up as such.

An exceptionally popular program has been prepared for the Waterbury engagement, when the orchestra, too, will put 75 men, its largest out-of-town force, on the stage. There will be two hours or more of the most delightful music that Waterbury has ever heard, in Music Hall, The Buckingham, next Monday evening. The lover of the tonal art in any good form who misses that will indeed be a loser. The famous Karl Muck will direct, and Carl Wendling, the noted violin virtuoso, will be the soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NOV 11 '07

Two days earlier the Boston Symphony was showing the best carriage company of Brooklyn an exiled half-brother to "Guglielmo Tell."

Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, after a Schiller poem, is no match for an opera war's trilogy of "Mephistos," variously spelled by Italians and French men who rewrote Goethe. But symphonic Schiller was refreshing by contrast. Not even old Bach's flute dances pleased a Baptist Temple audience any more than d'Indy's "slow waltz" and "more barbaric dance" in the "Camp of Wallenstein," where three bassoons tried to preach an old monk's sermon. The love-scene of "The Piccolomini" was graceful, too, and "Wallenstein's Death" was bravely died to organ harmonies and star-shine.

Mr. Higginson's local blessings brightened as they took their flight from New York on Saturday in double-barrelled symphony. Carnegie Hall greeted sweet Mozart unadorned and the simpler life of Beethoven's "Pastoral," a pattern for tone-poets yet. Silly old psychologist Beethoven! Like the ostrich that buries its head at sight of unknown danger, he thought he disguised his revolutionary picture-music by writing over it such captions as "feelings of foreboding before the storm" and "joyful feelings after the rain is over."

Speaking of pictures, why doesn't some enterprising photographer capture Carl Wendling's young seatmate, the fair-haired Czerwonky? He may not be Eugene Courvoisier's understudy in real life, but he might be frontispiece to the next souvenir edition of Jessie Fothergill's "The First Violin."

Dr. Muck has now floated off eastward like a rainbow after Bruckner. Mr. Comee, practical man, at a luncheon with Conductor Hertz of the Metropolitan, effected an exchange of famous headgear that got mixed at the last Boston visit of last spring.

From NEW YORK SUN
Address
Date NOV 10 1907
One of the novelties scheduled for performance in Boston by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concert-master of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions it is programme music and is based on one of Virgil's Eclogues.
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From NEW YORK MAIL
Address
Date NOV 18
Paderewski will be the soloist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra December 5-7. Thursday evening he will probably play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and Saturday afternoon Rubinstein's concerto in D minor.
55

MUSIC of all kinds was vouchsafed the devotees of Melos last week—music modern, music mouldering, music operatic, symphonic, and for solo instruments stringed, percussioned and pneumatic.

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra brought its new conductor here, Karl Pohlig, and with the assistance of Karl Klein, violinist, and Richard Buhlig, pianist, gave us an Election afternoon of linked music long drawn out. Pohlig led Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Beethoven's C minor symphony, and showed himself to be a conductor of energy, resource, and some measure of authority, although with gestures slightly spectacular and melodramatic. Karl Klein, in Tschaikowsky's violin concerto, made a valiant fight against its formidable technical difficulties and conquered a great many of them. He has real talent and will be heard from later in more impressive manner. Buhlig's hair crop, of astounding curl and proportions, suggested Paderewski; but there the resemblance ended. Young Buhlig chose the Brahms concerto in B flat as the medium for his introduction to our patient public, and the choice was not wise, for no pianist on earth could make that rambling and incohoate work anything but a weariness to the mind and the flesh. Later in the week Buhlig gave a recital of his own, and on that occasion no piano concerto was to blame for the cheerless entertainment the player offered. Brahms, Beethoven, Schubert and Chopin were the musical gods he invited, but they attended in name only, for of their essence Buhlig revealed next to nothing. He called his recital "educational" if [illegible] in the way he intended.

This question of instructive concerts brings us to the two programs perpetrated by Dr. Muck and his Boston Symphony Orchestra in our town very recently. Do symphony subscribers go to those concerts to enjoy or to suffer? Suffer they certainly did, for the Muck ministrations offered no soloist except a flute player (in a Bach work of eight movements!) and in the main consisted of works that, taken separately—in single dose as it were—are endurable, but joined together in a concert made every normal listener wish they could be put asunder by main force if necessary. Bruckner's symphony in D minor is an unfinished work, and yet it required one hour for performance. Heaven only knows what the composer had in mind as the conclusion! The music is vague, futile, purposeless, and where it doesn't sound exactly like Wagner suggests him in some of his uninspired moments. The Boston Symphony audience has a reputation to sustain and it tried to take Bruckner with politeness, but the pianissimo patter of applause after Muck laid down his baton told all too plainly the tale of immolation on the altar of devotion. Followed the Bach music mentioned above and a Beethoven overture as an exciting and frivolous close. The second concert consisted of Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, and nothing else. No wonder that local music-lovers are asking themselves and each other whether Dr. Muck takes New Yorkers for musical barbarians who must be compelled to hear only the most serious music in order to form a real liking for it; or whether, on the other hand, he considers us so far advanced that nothing but programs of that kind give us real musical satisfaction. Dr. Muck would find that a little sugar-coating will make his patrons swallow the bitterest pills, so why not mix in occasionally some Dvorak, Liszt, Moszkowski, Smetana, Rubinstein, Grieg, Tschaikowsky and other similar ingredients more saccharine but otherwise quite harmless?

The Commercial Advertiser
NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER
Date NOV 9 1907
MR. PADEREWSKI, it is good to learn, will be the soloist not at one but at both of the next pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on the 5th and 7th of next month. It is expected that at the former (Thursday night) he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and at the latter (Saturday afternoon) he will play Rubinstein's D minor concerto. These are to be his only appearances with orchestra in New York this season, though he will give two more recitals—Saturday afternoon, Nov. 23, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 14
1884
110-112 West 26th St., N. Y. City.
CABLE ADDRESS, "OMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date NOV 1
Boston Symphony Orchestra
The sale of seats for the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall on next Tuesday evening, will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, on Saturday morning next, Nov. 16. The soloist at this concert will be Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist, and the program will comprise Vincent d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," Schumann's concerto for pianoforte in A minor, and Schumann's overture "Genoveva."
Established

BOSTON

"GLAD TO DO IT? OF COURSE WE ARE, DESPITE THE COLD."

PLEADS TO COURT FOR ARRESTED

WOMEN BRING LUNCHES AND AWAIT RECITAL

Huddled Together on Steps of Symphony Hall, They Laugh and Read Till Doors Are Open

They came shortly after the sun rose. At 8 o'clock the cars began to stop about Symphony Hall, and little clusters of women gathered, ready to hear Paderewski and worship at his shrine.

The clock told the tale of another hour lived through, and still another. Ten o'clock brought still more, and then the newcomers began counting the line to see if they were the 506th, for these weary waiters well know that if they are not among the first 505 they have lost all chances of entering the portals of the hall of music.

"I really think this is something awful, this waiting," one women put it, "and I wouldn't do it if it wasn't for my husband. He said it was all a certain kind of nonsense for us to wait all day to hear a foreign man play the piano."

The regular collection was there, the [illegible] have huddled on the steps of Symphony Hall steps many and many a time like frightened doves, and very cold ones, too, to hear the artists they adore.

There was the woman who talked Ibsen and Maeterlinck, and who was very anxious for the assembled multitude to know that she had some original ideas. There was the inevitable lady—she graces every Paderewski concert—who insists that he is very much over-rated and that to such people as she who know music, he does not compare for a minute with De Pachmann.

"But then one learns to love De Pachmann's soul through the exquisite touch he uses in playing Chopin," she said. "Of course, Paderewski is great, I didn't mean to say he wasn't, but really the multitude can appreciate him."

Lunch boxes that were used in the days when mothers were schoolgirls were taken from the long hiding places and filled with lettuce sandwiches and peanut butter-covered crackers, for even these hero worshippers must occasionally eat. And, oh for something to drink!

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From TOWN & COUNTRY
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date NOV 16 1907

The Boston Symphony in Washington

The Boston Symphony had a crowded house and a brilliant audience for its first concert of this season. Mrs. Roosevelt and Miss Ethel were in a box and with them as their guests, were Mrs. Root, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Miss Cecilia May, the débutante daughter of Colonel and Mrs. Henry May; and Miss Hagner, Mrs. Roosevelt's private secretary. In the audience were many distinguished folk—Captain Hebbinghaus, Naval attaché of the German Embassy, and Mme. Hebbinghaus accompanied by Miss Langham, sister of the Baroness Sternburg, the wife of the German Ambassador.

STAR
NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 16 1907

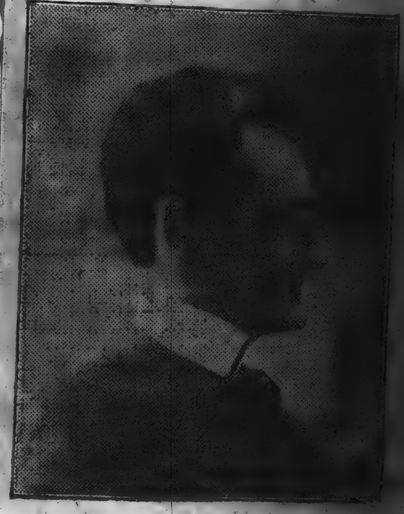
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck as conductor, at its concert at the Krueger Auditorium, Monday evening, December 9, will have as assisting solo artist Olga Samaroff, a brilliant pianist. This concert will be, without a doubt, a great musical treat. The auditorium should be crowded to the doors, and probably will be, as the famous orchestra has never before played here.

One of the most interesting criticisms of Mme. Samaroff's playing comes from the pen of Philip Hale, of the Boston Herald, who is one of the leading critics of the country. It was published on November 24, 1905, after Mme. Samaroff's first Boston recital. He said of her:

"Mme. Samaroff has the elemental qualities of a distinguished pianist. She has unusual strength, and this she sometimes abuses, although in stormy passages the chords are, as a rule, both massive and sonorous, and there is little suggestion of crashing metal. She has a fine sense of rhythm. She sings a melody, and does not poke it and thump it. Her melody has a charming background, and it is enwrapped in appropriate atmosphere. She has a continuous legato in song passages. Her bravura is clean and crisp, and it has a peculiar elegance; it is warm; it does not remind one of hard polish on parlor furniture, bought merely for display and not for use. This elegance seems inherent and not laboriously acquired. Furthermore, the best of all, there is a pronounced individuality in her interpretation, which is now serene and noble, now dreamy or sensuous or passionate, according to the mood of the composer."

Mail orders are now being received by F. N. Sommer, 794 Broad street.



Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor.

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, P
NOV 17

One of the novelties scheduled for performance in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra is a piece for [illegible] and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, many years second concert-master of the [illegible]

FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 15, 1907.

REAL MUSIC LOVERS SHIVER HOURS TO HEAR PADEREWSKI

"GLAD TO DO IT? OF COURSE WE ARE, DESPITE THE COLD."

PLEADS TO COURT FOR ARRESTED MEN TODAY

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

The Boston Symphony in Washington

The Boston Symphony had a crowded house and a brilliant audience at its first concert of this season. Mrs. Roosevelt and Miss Ethel [illegible] in a box and with them as their guests, were Mrs. Root, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Miss Cecilia May, the débutante daughter of Colonel and Mrs. Henry May; and Miss Hagner, Mrs. Roosevelt's private secretary. In the audience were many distinguished folk—Captain Hebbinghaus, Naval attaché of the German Embassy, and Mme. Hebbinghaus accompanied by Miss Langham, sister of the Baroness Sternburg, the wife of the German Ambassador.

WOMEN BRING LUNCHES AND AWAIT RECITAL

Huddled Together on Steps of Symphony Hall, They Laugh and Read Till Doors Are Open

They came shortly after the sun rose. At 8 o'clock the cars began to stop about Symphony Hall, and little clusters of women gathered, ready to hear Paderewski and worship at his shrine.

The clock told the tale of another hour lived through, and still another. Ten o'clock brought still more, and then the newcomers began counting the line to see if they were the 506th, for these weary waiters well know that if they are not among the first 505 they have lost all chances of entering the portals of the hall of music.

"I really think this is something awful, this waiting," one woman put it, "and I wouldn't do it if it wasn't for my husband. He said it was all a certain kind of nonsense for us to wait all day to hear a foreign man play the piano."

The regular collection was there, the [illegible] have huddled on the steps of Symphony Hall steps many and many a time like frightened doves, and very cold ones, too, to hear the artists they adore.

There was the woman who talked Ibsen and Maeterlinck, and who was very anxious for the assembled multitude to know that she had some original ideas. There was the inevitable lady—she graces every Paderewski concert—who insists that he is very much over-rated and that to such people as she who know music, he does not compare for a minute with De Pachmann.

"But then one learns to love De Pachmann's soul through the exquisite touch he uses in playing Chopin," she said. "Of course, Paderewski is great, I didn't mean to say he wasn't, but really the multitude can appreciate him."

Lunch boxes that were used in the days when mothers were schoolgirls were taken from the long hiding places and filled with lettuce sandwiches and peanut butter-covered crackers, for even these hero worshippers must occasionally eat. And, oh for something to drink!

(Continued on Second Page.)

[illegible] RECORD
[illegible] PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 17 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck as conductor, at its concert at the Krueger Auditorium, Monday evening, December 9, will have as assisting solo artist Olga Samaroff, a brilliant pianist. This concert will be, without a doubt, a great musical treat. The auditorium should be crowded to the doors, and probably will be, as the famous orchestra has never before played here.

One of the most interesting criticisms of Mme. Samaroff's playing comes from the pen of Philip Hale, of the Boston Herald, who is one of the leading critics of the country. It was published on November 24, 1905, after Mme. Samaroff's first Boston recital. He said of her:

"Mme. Samaroff has the elemental qualities of a distinguished pianist. She has unusual strength, and this she sometimes abuses, although in stormy passages the chords are, as a rule, both massive and sonorous, and there is little suggestion of crashing metal. She has a fine sense of rhythm. She sings a melody, and does not poke it and thump it. Her melody has a charming background, and it is enwrapped in appropriate atmosphere. She has a continuous legato in song passages. Her bravura is clean and crisp, and it has a peculiar elegance; it is warm; it does not remind one of hard polish on parlor furniture, bought merely for display and not for use. This elegance seems inherent and not laboriously acquired. Furthermore, the best of all, there is a pronounced individuality in her interpretation, which is now serene and noble, now dreamy or sensuous or passionate, according to the mood of the composer."

Mail orders are now being received by F. N. Sommer, 794 Broad street.

* * *

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor.

—One of the novelties scheduled for performance in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concert-master of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions [illegible] program music and is based on [illegible] gil's Eclogues.

Half Thousand Music Lovers Wait In Vain To Line Of 1000 Stands Five Hours, But One-Half Gets In Hall

They say that when Orpheus played he drew trees into line behind him. It's lucky there aren't any trees in the neighborhood of Symphony Hall, for they would have surely fallen into line when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski as soloist, played yesterday afternoon, and the line was quite sufficiently lengthy as it was.

A thousand long, it stretched from the Huntington avenue entrance, a record breaking assembly. Middle aged music teachers with big lunch baskets, pretty misses from the Conservatory aesthetically nibbling sweet chocolate, eccentric youths with long locks in frantic imitations of the great artist within the walls, college girls with a History of Sociology carelessly tucked beneath their arms, here and there a stray clerk with a newspaper. And from 7.50 in the morning, when the first lone music lover took up his stand and became the point that ultimately was to be extended into a line, until 1.30 in the afternoon, when the doors were opened, the Symphony Orchestra audience was assembling.

Out of consideration for the music lovers who are not fortunate enough to have a season ticket, the management of the hall allow the general public admission Friday afternoon to the second gallery to the extent of its capacity. No tickets are sold, the public stands in line and has its quarters duly in hand when it passes by the ticket window.

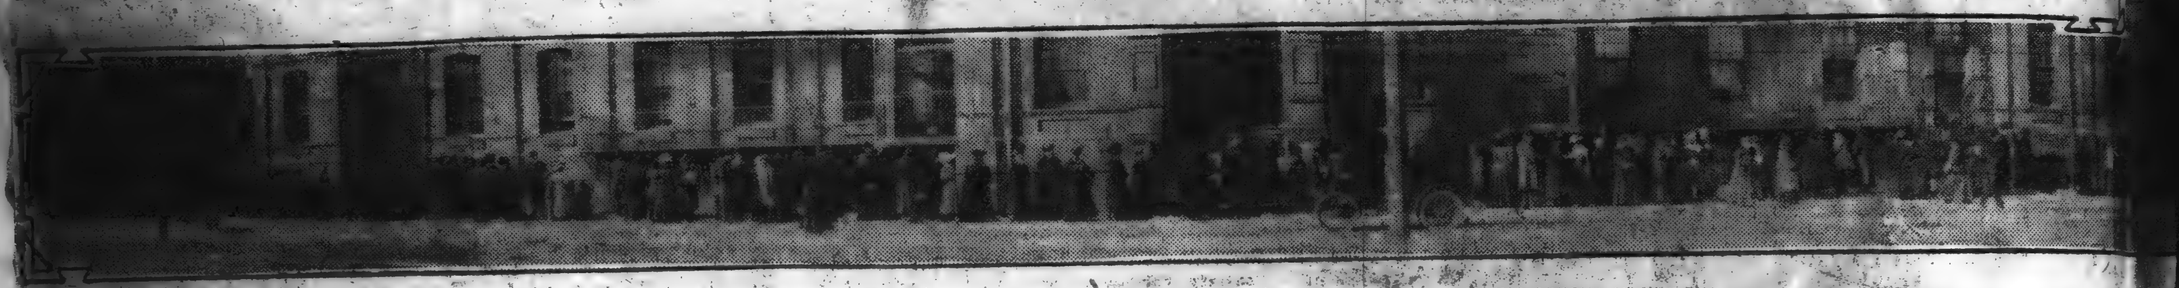
And the whole thing would be very simple but that when a popular program like that of yesterday is on the bills, much more of the general public than can possibly be accommodated desires to be present. The rule of the management is, of necessity, "First come first served." And yesterday, when over 1000 waited for the chance of hearing the first musician of the land, over 500 people waited in vain.

m N. Y. AMERICAN
ress
e NOV 17 1907

One of the most interesting novelties scheduled for performance in Boston by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concert-master of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions, it is programme music and is based on one of Virgil's Eclogues. 18

ess NEW YORK SUN
NOV 17 1907

Paderewski at his next recital on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall will play his own new sonata in E flat minor and Liszt's B minor sonata, the latter newly added to his répertoire. His third recital will take place on Saturday, December 14, and he will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of December 5 and 7, instead of at the second only, as previously announced. 84



Line of people waiting for tickets to Symphony rehearsal at Symphony Hall yesterday, and a late photograph of Paderewski, the emin[ent] p[ianist]

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW s NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 16 1907

The Boston Symphony.

To lovers of orchestral music, the most important and interesting event marking the local musical season this year will be the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9. Even in New York, where all forms of the best musical entertainment crowd the season, the concerts by the great orchestra from the Hub rank among the most delectable of artistic offerings and attract audiences limited only by the size of the big Carnegie Hall. In Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the few other cities included in the orchestra's annual tours, its appearances are greeted by such gatherings of music lovers as assemble when a star of the first magnitude in the musical firmament invites attention. The coming concert will be the occasion of the orchestra's first visit to Newark, and if the attendance is such as it should be this community is likely again to hear it.

No orchestra comparable in size and quality to the Boston organization ever has appeared here. The ninety-seven musicians comprising it, each one of whom is an artist, will assist in the concert, which will be on the same scale of magnitude and worth as are those given by them in New York and Boston. Its superiority to all other orchestras in the country is due to the fact that it is not a co-operative institution and that its members are obliged by the terms of their contracts with the organizer to devote all their time during the regular season to rehearsals and public performances. Since it was founded by Colonel Higginson, of Boston, whose wealth enabled him to command the services of the best orchestral players and conductors in the world and to maintain it until its exceptional worth was recognized and it became a profitable investment, the independent policy that enabled it to attain a foremost position among orchestral bodies in America has been adhered to. As late as a year ago it had such conductors as William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Georg Henschel and Emil Paur. A twelvemonth ago Dr. Karl Muck, one of the great living conductors, was imported from Berlin to succeed Mr. Gericke and has proven to be a worthy successor.

In order to make the concert here as interesting as possible, the management has engaged Mme. Olga Samaroff, an admirable pianist, as one of the two soloists, the other being the first violinist of the band. Mme. Samaroff has played with the more prominent [orchestras] in the country, and with them in recitals she has given [many] times, since her American debut, about [a year ago], has proven herself to

From LIFE
Address N. Y.
Date NOV 16 1907

BROOKLYN audiences have now become so accustomed to the Symphony Concerts being held in the Baptist Temple that they have ceased to complain of the trying lights and uncomfortable exits and doubtless when the happy day arrives and these musical treats can be held in the proper setting which the new Academy of Music will afford there will probably arise grumblers to sigh for the old Temple again. But if lights and exits bothered any of the audience at the first concert of the season last week Friday evening such mundane matters did not disturb the equilibrium of the orchestra which played with all the wonderful finish and beauty of tone for which it is famous. There was genuine applause for Conductor Karl Muck when he took his stand and hearty appreciation was shown to Mr. André Maquarre, who played with exquisite art the flute solo in the Bach Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings. The sparkling beauty of this Bach number showed in brilliant contrast with D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy which preceded and the Schumann overture to "Genoveva" which followed it and the audience attested its appreciation in no uncertain manner. Among those noticed in the audience were Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mrs. William S. Packer, Miss Mary K. Packer, Mr. Henry E. Pierrepont, Miss Pierrepont, the Misses Dreier, Miss Mary Benson, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mr. Frederic W. Hinrichs, Mrs. Alfred F. Wise, Miss Anna Halsey, Mrs. Calvin Edwards Hull, Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Miss Frances A. Finlay and Professor and Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper.

vspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA,
s NOV 16 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert, at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor." [illegible] 1884

paper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
ILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 16 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major "The Emperor." In accordance with the announcements made at the beginning of the season, the prices of single tickets for this concert will [illegible]

New York Tribune.
154 Nassau St.
Date NOV 17 1907

SOME MUSICAL NEWS.

One of the most promising novelties set for performance in Boston by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concertmaster of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions, it is programme music. "A Pagan Poem" is based on one of Virgil's "Eclogues."

m NEW YORK WORLD
ress
te NOV 17 1907

TWO CONCERTS FOR NEWARK

Paderewski and Boston Symphony Orchestra Both to Play There.

Newark is to have at least two musical attractions of prominence this season. The first is that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting, who are to give a concert in the Krueger Auditorium on Monday evening, Dec. 9, and the other musical event will be the recital by Paderewski, in the same hall, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 17. The assisting solo artist with the Boston Symphony concert will be Olga Samaroff, who has already gained considerable fame as a pianist of merit.

That the concerts will be largely attended is seen by the numerous requests for seats that are pouring in with each arrival of the mails, from every section of that part of the State. Mail orders are being filled by Frederick N. Sommer, No. 794 Broad street, Newark, who is the local representative for both concerts.

rk, 1884

Standard Union
s Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 17 1907

One of the most interesting novelties scheduled for performance in Boston by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concertmaster of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions, it is programme music, and is based on one of Virgil's Eclogues. 84

[57]

Half Thousand Music Lovers Wait In Vain To Line Of 1000 Stands Five Hours, But One-Half Gets In Hall

They say that when Orpheus played he drew trees into line behind him. It's lucky there aren't any trees in the neighborhood of Symphony Hall, for they would have surely fallen into line when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski as soloist, played yesterday afternoon, and the line was quite sufficiently lengthy as it was.

A thousand long, it stretched from the Huntington avenue entrance, a record breaking assembly. Middle aged music teachers with big lunch baskets, pretty misses from the Conservatory esthetically nibbling sweet chocolate, ascetic youths with long locks in frantic imitation of the great artist within the walls, college girls with a History of Sociology carelessly tucked beneath their arms, here and there a stray clerk with a newspaper. And from 7.50 in the morning, when the first lone music lover took up his stand and became the point that ultimately was to be extended into a line, until 1.30 in the afternoon, when the doors were opened, the Symphony Orchestra audience was assembling.

Out of consideration for the music lovers who are not fortunate enough to have a season ticket, the management of the hall allow the general public admission Friday afternoon to the second gallery to the extent of its capacity. No tickets are sold, the public stands in line and has its quarters duly in hand when it passes by the ticket window.

And the whole thing would be very simple but that when a popular program like that of yesterday is on the bills, much more of the general public than can possibly be accommodated desires to be present. The rule of the management is, of necessity, "First come first served." And yesterday, when over 1000 waited for the chance of hearing the first musician of the land, over 500 people waited in vain.

Line of people waiting for tickets to Symphony rehearsal at Symphony Hall yesterday, and a late photograph of Paderewski, the eminent pi

m ..... PORTLAND
ress .....
e ..... NOV 17 1907

One of the most interesting novelties scheduled for performance in Boston by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concert-master of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions, it is programme music and is based on one of Virgil's Eclogues. 18

ess ..... NEW YORK SUN
NOV 17 1907

Paderewski at his next recital on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall will play his own new sonata in E flat minor and Liszt's B minor sonata, the latter newly added to his répertoire. His third recital will take place on Saturday, December 14, and he will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts of December 5 and 7, instead of at the second only, as previously announced. 84

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
N
.....
s ..... NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 16 190

The Boston Symphony.

To lovers of orchestral music, the most important and interesting event marking the local musical season this year will be the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9. Even in New York, where all forms of the best musical entertainment crowd the season, the concerts by the great orchestra from the Hub rank among the most delectable of artistic offerings and attract audiences limited only by the size of the big Carnegie Hall. In Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the few other cities included in the orchestra's annual tours, its appearances are greeted by such gatherings of music lovers as assemble when a star of the first magnitude in the musical firmament invites attention. The coming concert will be the occasion of the orchestra's first visit to Newark, and if the attendance is such as it should be this community is likely again to hear it. 8

No orchestra comparable in size and quality to the Boston organization ever has appeared here. The ninety-seven musicians comprising it, each one of whom is an artist, will assist in the concert, which will be on the same scale of magnitude and worth as are those given by them in New York and Boston. Its superiority to all other orchestras in the country is due to the fact that it is not a co-operative institution and that its members are obliged by the terms of their contracts with the organizer to devote all their time during the regular season to rehearsals and public performances. Since it was founded by Colonel Higginson, of Boston, whose wealth enabled him to command the services of the best orchestral players and conductors in the world and to maintain it until its exceptional worth was recognized and it became a profitable investment, the independent policy that enabled it to attain a foremost position among orchestral bodies in America has been adhered to. Up to a year ago it had such conductors as William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Georg Henschel and Emil Paur. A twelvemonth ago Dr. Karl Muck, one of the great living conductors, was imported from Berlin to succeed Mr. Gericke and has proven to be a worthy successor.

In order to make the concert here as interesting as possible, the management has engaged Mme. Olga Samaroff, an admirable pianist, as one of the two soloists, the other being the first violinist in the band. Mme. Samaroff has played frequently with the more prominent [illegible] in the country, and with them [illegible] recitals she has given since [illegible] American debut, about thirteen years ago, has proven herself to be a fine artist.

From ..... LIFE
Address .....
Date .....

BROOKLYN audiences have now become so accustomed to the Symphony Concerts being held in the Baptist Temple that they have ceased to complain of the trying lights and uncomfortable exits and doubtless when the happy day arrives and these musical treats can be held in the proper setting which the new Academy of Music will afford there will probably arise grumblers to sigh for the old Temple again. But if lights and exits bothered any of the audience at the first concert of the season last week Friday evening such mundane matters did not disturb the equilibrium of the orchestra which played with all the wonderful finish and beauty of tone for which it is famous. There was genuine applause for Conductor Karl Muck when he took his stand and hearty appreciation was shown to Mr. André Maquarre, who played with exquisite art the flute solo in the Bach Suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings. The sparkling beauty of this Bach number showed in brilliant contrast with D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy which preceded and the Schumann overture to "Genoveva" which followed it and the audience attested its appreciation in no uncertain manner. Among those noticed in the audience were Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mrs. William S. Packer, Miss Mary K. Packer, Mr. Henry E. Pierrepont, Miss Pierrepont, the Misses Dreier, Miss Mary Benson, Mrs. J. Eliott Langstaff, Mr. Frederic W. Hinrichs, Mrs. Alfred F. Wise, Miss Anna Halsey, Mrs. Calvin Edwards Hull, Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Mrs. Otto Heinigke, Miss Frances A. Finlay and Professor and Mrs. Franklin W. Hooper.

vspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
.....
LADELPHIA
s .....
NOV 16 190
.....

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert, at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor." 1884

paper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
.....
LADELPHIA, PA
NOV 16 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major "The Emperor." In accordance with the announcements made at the beginning of the season, the prices of single tickets for this concert will be increased.

[57]

New York Tribune.
154 Nassau St.
NOV 17 190
Date .....

SOME MUSICAL NEWS.

One of the most promising novelties set for performance in Boston by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concertmaster of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions, it is programme music. "A Pagan Poem" is based on one of Virgil's "Eclogues."

m ..... NEW YORK WORLD
ress .....
te ..... NOV 17 1907

TWO CONCERTS FOR NEWARK

Paderewski and Boston Symphony Orchestra Both to Play There.

Newark is to have at least two musical attractions of prominence this season. The first is that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck conducting, who are to give a concert in the Krueger Auditorium on Monday evening, Dec. 9, and the other musical event will be the recital by Paderewski, in the same hall, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 17. The assisting solo artist with the Boston Symphony concert will be Olga Samaroff, who has already gained considerable fame as a pianist of merit.

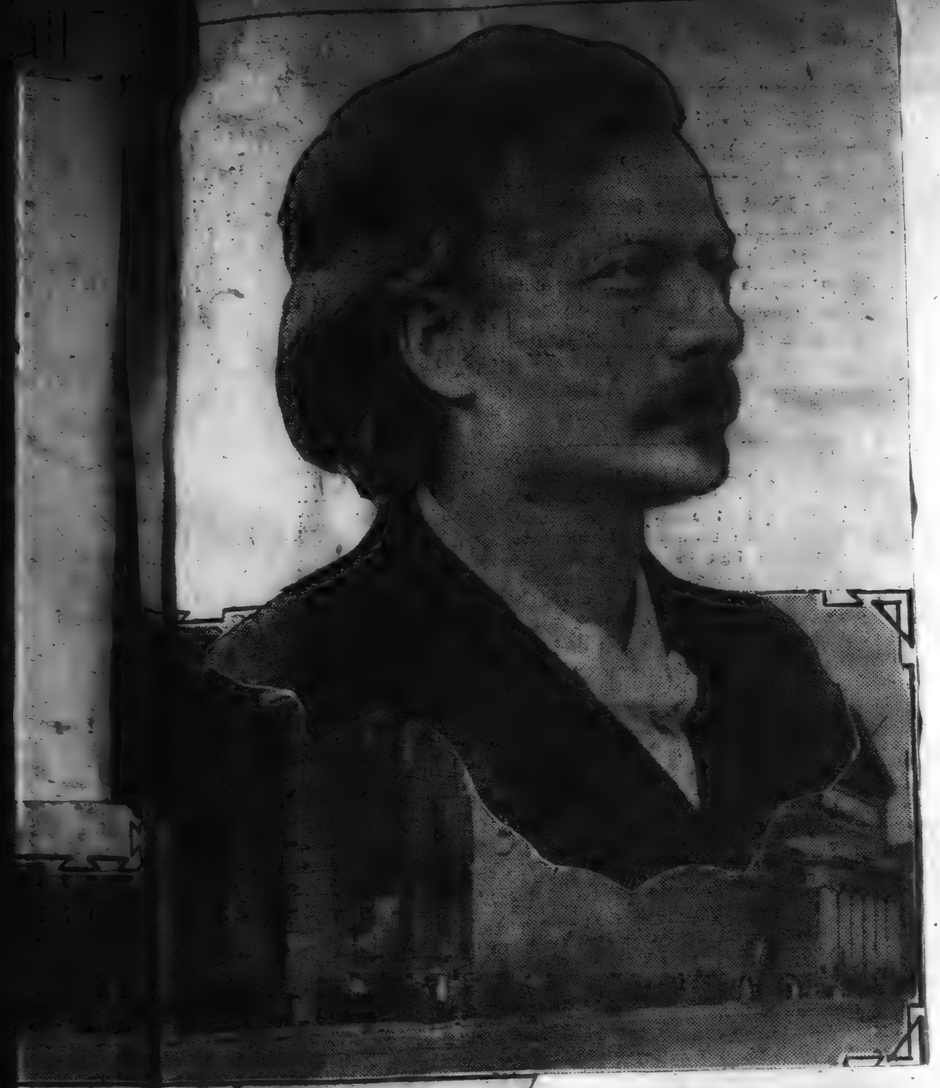
That the concerts will be largely attended is seen by the numerous requests for seats that are pouring in with each arrival of the mails, from every section of that part of the State. Mail orders are being filled by Frederick N. Sommer, No. 794 Broad street, Newark, who is the local representative for both concerts.

rk, 1884

Standard Unio
.....
ss ..... Brooklyn, N. Y
NOV 17 1907

One of the most interesting novelties scheduled for performance in Boston by Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a piece for orchestra and piano by Charles Martin Loeffler, for many years second concertmaster of the orchestra. It is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Like most of Loeffler's compositions, it is programme music, and is based on one of Virgil's Eclogues. 84

Hear Paderewski



the emine pianist, who was soloist.

Newark News - Nov. 16

only by the size of the big Carnegie Hall. In Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the few other cities included in the orchestra's annual tours, its appearances are greeted by such gatherings of music lovers as assemble when a star of the first magnitude in the musical firmament invites attention. The coming concert will be the occasion of the orchestra's first visit to Newark, and if the attendance is such as it should be this community is likely again to hear it.

No orchestra comparable in size and quality to the Boston organization ever has appeared here. The ninety-seven musicians comprising it, each one of whom is an artist, will assist in the concert, which will be on the same scale of magnitude and worth as are those given by them in New York and Boston. Its superiority to all other orchestras in the country is due to the fact that it is not a co-operative institution and that its members are obliged by the terms of their contracts with the organizer to devote all their time during the regular season to rehearsals and public performances. Since it was founded by Colonel Higginson, of Boston, whose wealth enabled him to command the services of the best orchestral players and conductors in the world and to maintain it until its exceptional worth was recognized and it became a profitable investment, the independent policy that enabled it to attain a foremost position among orchestral bodies in America has been adhered to. Up to a year ago it had such conductors as William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Georg Henschel and Emil Paur. A twelvemonth ago Dr. Karl Muck, one of the great living conductors, was imported from Berlin to succeed Mr. Gericke and has proven to be a worthy successor.

In order to make the concert here as interesting as possible, the management has engaged Mme. Olga Samaroff, an admirable pianist, as one of the two soloists, the other being the first violinist in the band. Mme. Samaroff has played frequently with the more prominent orchestras in the country, and with them and in the many recitals she has given since she made her American debut, about thirteen years ago, has proven herself to be a fine artist.

Newark - also suburban papers

CONCERTS IN NEWARK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Paderewski Will Appear During Coming Month.

Much interest is already manifested by the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Krueger Auditorium, Newark, Monday evening, December 9. This will be the first appearance of this world-renowned musical organization in Newark. The entire orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, conductor, will be in Newark.

As it is well known that it is impossible to secure seats for these concerts given in New York, the people of Newark and vicinity will now have a chance to hear this famous orchestra, which, no doubt, is as great as any in the world.

The announcement that Paderewski, the world's famous pianist, will give a

DR. KARL MUCK.
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

recital in the Krueger Auditorium, Newark, Tuesday evening, December 17, has been hailed with delight by the music-loving people of Newark and by those who appreciate what a truly wonderful artist this man is.

Paderewski will give eighty concerts in this country on his present tour and Newark is very fortunate in securing one of these concerts.

The New York Sun says: "Paderewski stands to-day the foremost and the greatest living pianist."

The New York World says: "Paderewski remains at the head of the living master-players of the piano. That was estiblished at his recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon before an audience that was limited only to the capacity of the house."

The New York Tribune says: "Since Rubinstein there has been but one great artist, Paderewski."

F. N. Sommer, who has the local management of both concerts, announces that the disposal of the seats will be done in the customary way and all mail orders received by him, accompanied by check or money order, will be filled the day before the regular sale opens at Lauter's, 657 Broad street, Newark. The prices for seats for the Paderewski recital will be $2.50, $2, $1.50 and $1. For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, the prices are $2, $1.50 and $1.

Nov 17th
Newark Call - N

FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It was in the late spring of 1881 that musical Boston was thrown into a turmoil by a modest communication which appeared in all the Boston papers over the name of Henry L. Higginson, of the well-known Boston banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. The announcement read in part as follows:

Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston we have never possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices, such as may be found in all large European cities, or even in the smaller centres of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours is necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent upon musicians whose work and time are largely pledged elsewhere.

To obviate this difficulty the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music and, though individual inasmuch as it is independent of societies and clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to any previously existing musical organizations.

The orchestra is to number sixty selected musicians, their time so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts to be engaged in advance.

Mr. George Henschel will be the conductor for the coming year.

The concerts will be twenty in number, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening from the middle of October to the middle of March.

The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the whole series of evening concerts will be either $10 or $6, according to location. Single tickets with reserved seats will be seventy-five cents and fifty cents, according to position.

Besides the concerts there will be a public rehearsal on one afternoon of every week, with single tickets at twenty-five cents and no reserved seats.

The intention is that this orchestra shall be made permanent and shall be called the "Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Both as the condition and the result of success, the sympathy of the public is asked.

The first public rehearsal was given on Friday afternoon, October 21, 1881, and the first concert on the following evening. The soloist was Annie Louise Cary, the famous contralto, who now as Mrs. Raymond is a resident of New York. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Dedication of the House"..... Beethoven
Aria, "Che faro senza a Eurydice," from "Orfeo"..... Gluck
Symphony No. 12, in B flat major..Haydn
Ballet music from the opera "Rosamunde"..... Schubert
Scene from "Odysseus," "Thou Far-Darling Sun"..... Bruch
Festival Overture..... Weber

Twenty-six years have passed, and while it has been found impossible, owing to the enormous increase in operating expenses, to maintain the original low-level prices, the Boston Symphony Orchestra still fulfills the function assigned to it in the beginning. It has been built up to its present high standard without thought of expense. The best artists of Europe have been brought to it—such men as Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Hess, Wendling, Hekking, Schroeder, Ferir, Pourtau, Mole, Longy, Grisez, Maquarre, Reiter, and other men almost as famous. As conductors it brought to America Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and now—Muck. It has never been a money-making institution, and the likelihood is that it will never be such.

Unquestionably its greatest service to the county is the tremendous impetus it has given to the cause of pure music. To the artistic success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be traced directly the organiation of such splendid institutions as the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, of Chicago; the Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Cincinnati Orchestras. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra that really broke the way for the others, in its early tours through the West in the eighties—tours that cost great sums of money, but were so rich in other results that it was money well spent.

In fact, since that first Symphony concert in Boston the musical topography, so to say, of the whole country has changed. Besides the great permanent orchestras which are at work, there are smaller bands, such as those in Minneapolis and St. Paul, St. Louis, Detroit, Kansas City, Denver, and even in far-off California, which owe their direct inspiration to Boston's great orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The coming to Newark of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Krueger Auditorium on Monday evening, December 9, is a musical event the importance of which can not easily be exaggerated. Now in its twenty-seventh season, since its organization it has held undisputed place as the foremost orchestra of America and one which hardly has its equal in the world. Although for twenty-two years it has been giving concerts regularly in New York and Philadelphia, this will be the first time it has ever visited New Jersey; and for this purpose, instead of returning directly to Boston after its matinee concert in New York on Saturday afternoon, December 7, it will stay over two days and make a special trip to Newark.

With the orchestra will come its celebrated conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck came to America a year ago last October by special permission of the German Emperor. So great was his success that the Emperor was petitioned to allow him to come to America for a second year, and after great hesitation he gave his consent, letting it be known, however, that he would have done this for no other orchestra in America.

The soloist at the concert will be Olga Samaroff, a pianist who is a native American despite her Russian name, and one whose success since she made her debut in New York three years ago has been of a most sensational character. Although a young woman, she is numbered among the greatest pianists now

Wie bereits angekündigt, ist es Herrn Fred. N. Sommer gelungen,

Frei Zeitung - Nov 17-07

Dr. Karl Muck.

den hiesigen Musikfreunden mit dem Engagement des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters einen ganz besonderen Kunstgenuß zu gewähren. Dasselbe wird hier am Montag Abend, 9. Dezember, ein Concert geben. Es ist dies das erste Mal, daß sich diese „Künstler-Vereinigung", denn eine solche ist dies Orchester, nach Newark verirrt, sodaß dessen Erscheinen nicht allein ein Ereigniß in der Musikgeschichte Newark's, sondern auch des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters sein dürfte. Das Orchester setzt sich aus 97 Musikern zusammen, von denen ein jeder in des Wortes vollster Bedeutung ein Meister auf seinem Instrument ist. Dirigent ist Dr. Karl Muck, der Kapellmeister der Berliner Hofoper und anerkannt einer der bedeutendsten musikalischen Interpreten der Jetztzeit. Die Leistungen dieser musikalischen Künstler sind vollendete — mag man auch bezüglich der Interpretation einer Composition vielleicht andere Ansichten haben oder fühlen als der Dirigent — stets mustergültige. Das Programm wird s. Zt. mitgetheilt werden.

[58]

Hear Paderewski

. the eminent pianist, who was soloist.

newark-news-Nov. 16

To lovers of orchestral music, the most important and interesting event marking the local musical season this year will be the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9. Even in New York, where all forms of the best musical entertainment crowd the season, the concerts by the great orchestra from the Hub rank among the most delectable of artistic offerings and attract audiences limited only by the size of the big Carnegie Hall. In Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the few other cities included in the orchestra's annual tours, its appearances are greeted by such gatherings of music lovers as assemble when a star of the first magnitude in the musical firmament invites attention. The coming concert will be the occasion of the orchestra's first visit to Newark, and if the attendance is such as it should be this community is likely again to hear it.

No orchestra comparable in size and quality to the Boston organization ever has appeared here. The ninety-seven musicians comprising it, each one of whom is an artist, will assist in the concert, which will be on the same scale of magnitude and worth as are those given by them in New York and Boston. Its superiority to all other orchestras in the country is due to the fact that it is not a co-operative institution and that its members are obliged by the terms of their contracts with the organizer to devote all their time during the regular season to rehearsals and public performances. Since it was founded by Colonel Higginson, of Boston, whose wealth enabled him to command the services of the best orchestral players and conductors in the world and to maintain it until its exceptional worth was recognized and it became a profitable investment, the independent policy that enabled it to attain a foremost position among orchestral bodies in America has been adhered to. Up to a year ago it had such conductors as William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Georg Henschel and Emil Paur. A twelvemonth ago Dr. Karl Muck, one of the great living conductors, was imported from Berlin to succeed Mr. Gericke and has proven to be a worthy successor.

In order to make the concert here as interesting as possible, the management has engaged Mme. Olga Samaroff, an admirable pianist, as one of the two soloists, the other being the first violinist in the band. Mme. Samaroff has played frequently with the more prominent orchestras in the country, and with them and in the many recitals she has given since she made her American debut, about thirteen years ago, has proven herself to be a fine artist.

Newark-all Suburban papers

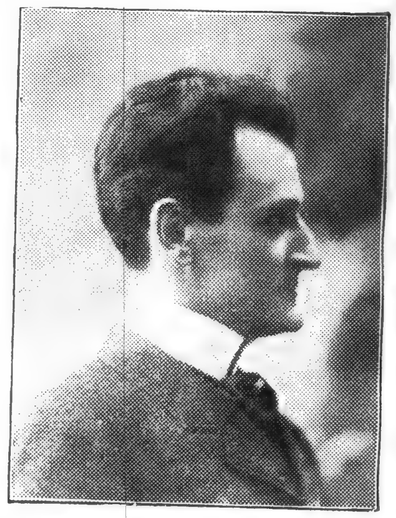
CONCERTS IN NEWARK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Paderewski Will Appear During Coming Month.

Much interest is already manifested by the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Krueger Auditorium, Newark, Monday evening, December 9. This will be the first appearance of this world-renowned musical organization in Newark. The entire orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera House, Berlin, conductor, will be in Newark.

As it is well known that it is impossible to secure seats for these concerts given in New York, the people of Newark and vicinity will now have a chance to hear this famous orchestra, which, no doubt, is as great as any in the world.

The announcement that Paderewski, the world's famous pianist, will give a



DR. KARL MUCK.
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

recital in the Krueger Auditorium, Newark, Tuesday evening, December 17, has been hailed with delight by the music-loving people of Newark and by those who appreciate what a truly wonderful artist this man is.

Paderewski will give eighty concerts in this country on his present tour and Newark is very fortunate in securing one of these concerts.

The New York Sun says: "Paderewski stands to-day the foremost and the greatest living pianist."

The New York World says: "Paderewski remains at the head of the living master-players of the piano. That was estiblished at his recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon before an audience that was limited only to the capacity of the house."

The New York Tribune says: "Since Rubinstein there has been but one great artist, Paderewski."

F. N. Sommer, who has the local management of both concerts, announces that the disposal of the seats will be done in the customary way and all mail orders received by him, accompanied by check or money order, will be filled the day before the regular sale opens at Lauter's, 657 Broad street, Newark. The prices for seats for the Paderewski recital will be $2.50, $2, $1.50 and $1. For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, the prices are $2, $1.50 and $1.

FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It was in the late spring of 1881 that musical Boston was thrown into a turmoil by a modest communication which appeared in all the Boston papers over the name of Henry L. Higginson, of the well-known Boston banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. The announcement read in part as follows:

Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston we have never possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices, such as may be found in all large European cities, or even in the smaller centres of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours is necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent upon musicians whose work and time are largely pledged elsewhere.

To obviate this difficulty the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music and, though individual inasmuch as it is independent of societies and clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to any previously existing musical organizations.

The orchestra is to number sixty selected musicians, their time so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts to be engaged in advance.

Mr. George Henschel will be the conductor for the coming year.

The concerts will be twenty in number, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening from the middle of October to the middle of March.

The price of season tickets with reserved seats for the whole series of evening concerts will be either $10 or $6, according to location. Single tickets with reserved seats will be seventy-five cents and fifty cents, according to position.

Besides the concerts there will be a public rehearsal on one afternoon of every week, with single tickets at twenty-five cents and no reserved seats.

The intention is that this orchestra shall be made permanent and shall be called the "Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Both as the condition and the result of success, the sympathy of the public is asked.

The first public rehearsal was given on Friday afternoon, October 21, 1881, and the first concert on the following evening. The soloist was Annie Louise Cary, the famous contralto, who now as Mrs. Raymond is a resident of New York. The program was as follows:

Overture, "Dedication of the House".. ..... Beethoven
Aria, "Che faro senza a Eurydice," from "Orfeo".....Gluck
Symphony No. 12, in B flat major..Haydn
Ballet music from the opera "Rosamunde" ..... Schubert
Scene from "Odysseus," "Thou Far-Darting Sun".....Bruch
Festival Overture.....Weber

Twenty-six years have passed, and while it has been found impossible, owing to the enormous increase in operating expenses, to maintain the original low-level prices, the Boston Symphony Orchestra still fulfills the function assigned to it in the beginning. It has been built up to its present high standard without thought of expense. The best artists of Europe have been brought to it—such men as Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Hess, Wendling, Hekking, Schroeder, Ferir, Pourtau, Mole, Longy, Grisez, Maquarre, Reiter, and other men almost as famous. As conductors it brought to America Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, and now—Muck. It has never been a money-making institution, and the likelihood is that it will never be such.

Unquestionably its greatest service to the county is the tremendous impetus it has given to the cause of pure music. To the artistic success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be traced directly the organiation of such splendid institutions as the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, of Chicago; the Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Cincinnati Orchestras. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra that really broke the way for the others, in its early tours through the West in the eighties—tours that cost great sums of money, but were so rich in other results that it was money well spent.

In fact, since that first Symphony concert in Boston the musical topography, so to say, of the whole country has changed. Besides the great permanent orchestras which are at work, there are smaller bands, such as those in Minneapolis and St. Paul, St. Louis, Detroit, Kansas City, Denver, and even in far-off California, which owe their direct inspiration to Boston's great orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The coming to Newark of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Krueger Auditorium on Monday evening, December 9, is a musical event the importance of which can not easily be exaggerated. Now in its twenty-seventh season, since its organization it has held undisputed place as the foremost orchestra of America and one which hardly has its equal in the world. Although for twenty-two years it has been giving concerts regularly in New York and Philadelphia, this will be the first time it has ever visited New Jersey; and for this purpose, instead of returning directly to Boston after its matinee concert in New York on Saturday afternoon, December 7, it will stay over two days and make a special trip to Newark.

With the orchestra will come its celebrated conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin. Dr. Muck came to America a year ago last October by special permission of the German Emperor. So great was his success that the Emperor was petitioned to allow him to come to America for a second year, and after great hesitation he gave his consent, letting it be known, however, that he would have done this for no other orchestra in America.

The soloist at the concert will be Olga Samaroff, a pianist who is a native American despite her Russian name, and one whose success since she made her debut in New York three years ago has been of a most sensational character. Although a young woman, she is numbered among the greatest pianists now before the public.

Wie bereits angekündigt, ist es Herrn Fred. N. Sommer gelungen, den hiesigen Musikfreunden mit dem Engagement des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters einen ganz besonderen Kunstgenuß zu gewähren. Dasselbe wird hier am Montag Abend, 9. Dezember, ein Concert geben. Es ist dies das erste Mal, daß sich diese „Künstler-Vereinigung", denn eine solche ist dies Orchester — nach Newark verirrt, sodaß dessen Erscheinen nicht allein ein Ereigniß in der Musikgeschichte Newark's, sondern auch des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters sein dürfte. Das Orchester setzt sich aus 97 Musikern zusammen, von denen ein jeder in des Wortes vollster Bedeutung ein Meister auf seinem Instrument ist. Dirigent ist Dr. Karl Muck, der Kapellmeister der Berliner Hofoper und anerkannt einer der bedeutendsten musikalischen Interpreten der Jetztzeit. Die Leistungen dieser musikalischen Künstler sind vollendete — mag man auch bezüglich der Interpretation einer Composition vielleicht andere Ansichten haben oder fühlen als der Dirigent — stets mustergültige. Das Programm wird s. Zt. mitgetheilt werden.

Dr. Karl Muck.

[58]

Providence Journal.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1907.

The Symphony Concerts.

Those who care for the best in music should not forget that the first of the Symphony Concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra allots to Providence takes place to-morrow evening, and that there are only two more afterwards. This is a scanty opportunity considering the size of the city; but it is the most we have a right to expect if we give but languid or perfunctory support to a great organization which is welcomed elsewhere with houses crowded to the doors. Doubtless there are many who "mean to go," but neglect to fulfill their intention. They do not seem to remember that what is a great pleasure may also be a duty. Nor should those who are able to hear music by going away from home be selfishly oblivious of the needs of those less fortunate. As for those who profess to be "musical" but wilfully neglect the chance to learn something about musical art by hearing its masterpieces, their case is perhaps hopeless.

JOURNAL—MONDAY,
NOVEMBER 18, 1907

ENCORE RECORD FOR PADEREWSKI

With Dr. Muck He Shares the Ovation From an Enthusiastic Symphony Audience.

Ignaz Paderewski and Dr. Carl Muck shared the honors at the Symphony concert Saturday night. Paderewski played the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. He has played better here; he has been in happier moods than he showed during the performance of the concerto; and he was visibly not at ease, though he sat in his own old-fashioned, red-fringed chair; yet the audience would not let him depart until he had broken the Symphony rule against encores and played the Chopin scherzo in B flat minor. In the scherzo his art was as magical as art can be.

Dr. Muck's reading of the beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 2 was equally as artistic and enjoyable as Paderewski's playing—great and glorious as that was in many moments. The rare pleasure the symphony gave, however, was marred by the departure between the several movements of a part of the audience. The encore Paderewski gave made the concert later than usual, and there are people who, for some reason, will not remain in the hall after 10 o'clock. Dr. Muck witnessed the exodus with a sad expression.

It is regrettable that the symphony was not placed first on the program. Its delights could then have been enjoyed by all. For Dr. Muck must have known that if Paderewski wants to give encores the rule against them will not stop him. He has always been excepted. The people want encores from him.

Merely as a matter of record it may added that the orhcestra played for the first time Pfitzner's Overture to "The Little Christ Elf," a Christmas fairy play by Ilse von Stach. The overture made but a slight impression.

The program of this week's concert includes C. M. Loeffler's new concert piece, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), for piano and orchestra. Heinrich Gebhard will play the piano part. Another novelty will be Reznicek's Adagio and Scherzo. Lalo's Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana," will fill out the evening, which, for a change, will be without a symphony.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
NOVEMBER 17, 1907

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Muck has placed two novelties on his next programme, which will be played on Friday afternoon, Nov. 22 and Saturday evening, Nov. 23. The first is of more than ordinary interest to Boston, because it is the latest work by Charles Martin Loeffler. It is written for piano and full orchestra, and is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Mr. Loeffler got his inspiration for this from Virgil's Eighth Eclogue. He made the first sketch of the work seven or eight years ago, and later he wrote it for two pianos. Since then he has made many important changes in it, and developed it for the orchestra. Mr. Gebhard will play at the piano. The work calls for the use of a full modern orchestra.

The other novelty is an "Adagio and Scherzo-Finale" by Reznicek. Reznicek is best known in Boston as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana," the overture of which has been played at our Symphony concerts. He is now a resident of Berlin, and does considerable conducting in Germany.

There will be no symphony on the programme. The first number will be the overture "Le Roi d'Ys," and Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana," will be played by Mr. Muck.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
NOVEMBER 18, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Pfitzner.....Overture to "The Christ-elf"
Rubinstein.....Concerto in D minor
Pianist, Ignaz Paderewski.
Brahms.....Second Symphony, D minor

The new overture by Pfitzner did not impress us favorably. It seemed an unsuccessful excursion into the Humperdinekian field of learned musical simplicity. There are themes that ought to sound like simple melodies; but are treated with a sort of pudding counterpoint until they are lost in the mass of tone. There is much fragmentary figure development that leads nowhere in particular. Altogether we cannot think that any reviewer will adopt the "Collier's Weekly" tone and call the composer "Honey Pfitz!"

But at this concert it was the soloist who was to charm the multitude; the orchestra was to be overshadowed for once by that wonderful personality which dominates everything that it comes in contact with. Paderewski! ! "Why man, he doth bestride the narrow world like a Colossus!" He started his part of the Rubinstein concerto, not as a pianist, but as a fortissimist. A line from Southey may best describe it—

"Crashing, smashing, dashing and flashing!"

But chiefly the first two. The subordinate theme of the orchestra was almost inaudible beside the piano part. But the heroism of the mood at least fitted the chief theme finely.

In the second movement there was more of the subtler Paderewski. The sweet, caressing tone, the gentle delicacy of the chief theme, were deserving of superlative adjectives. There was a little insecurity in the horn passages in this. The finale went with better balance than the first movement, but the final bravura exceeded the proper powers of the piano. Nevertheless it was all tremendously exciting and the usual public frenzy took place at the close.

All rules are set aside in favor of this phenomenon, and Dr. Muck did what another conductor had done at these concerts long before,—he allowed an encore! Why, after this, Ysaye, or Kreisler, or Melba, should not give encores we cannot explain. The audience, however, were delighted at the innovation and listened to Chopin's B flat minor Scherzo with rapture. It was played with the same excess of power that we criticized at the Paderewski recital. The sinister phrases of the beginning were given with much poetry. Chopin himself said of them—"They should suggest a charnel-house!" But again in the heroic parts the ideal of the performer went beyond the possibilities of hammers and wires. Paderewski here suggested orchestral effects beyond the domain of the piano-forte. Had any lesser pianist played thus it would have been called thumping. Rosenthal has been severely animadverted upon for just such work. "But Quod licet Jovis, non licet"—anybody else. Again the wild applause burst forth and there were even hopes of forcing another solo, but these were unfulfilled.

All this excitement harmed the symphonic part of the concert. We were never less impressed with the tender D major Brahms symphony. Yet it was well enough played; not as finely as we have had it, but still a worthy performance. There was the old-fashioned Brahms exodus at the end of the first movement. We had hoped that Boston had passed this stage of non-appreciation.

But those who stayed to the end were well repaid, for by the time that the finale was reached the effects of the musical champagne had worn off and both orchestra and audience were again in a normal condition.

Dr. Muck gave an excellent reading of the end of the work and here the orchestra played famously. The result was that the phalanx of Brahmsites displayed much enthusiasm and recalled the eminent conductor. Therefore if the proverb—"All's well that ends well"—be applied, the concert was very successful, in spite of its heterogeneous character and its blemishes.

Louis C. Elson.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess .....
.....

The Philadelphia Orchestra.

To the Editor of THE NEWS:

The Philadelphia Orchestra will appear in Baltimore for the first time under the baton of its distinguished new conductor, Carl Pohlig, at the Lyric on Monday evening next in a programme that must appeal strongly to our music lovers—the overture to "Der Freischuetz," the Saint-Saens Piano Concerto No. 4, the Fifth Symphony and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

As we have only 10 orchestral concerts announced for the entire season, including those by the Boston Symphony, the Lyric should be filled for every concert by the splendid orchestra which is so generously supported by art-loving citizens of Philadelphia, among whom are Mrs. A. J. Dallas Dixon, Miss Anne Thompson, Mrs. Horace Brock and Messrs. Alexander Van Rensselaer, Arthur Newbold, Thomas McKean and others.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.
Baltimore, Nov. 15.

1884

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE,
NOVEMBER 17, 1907.

Paderewski, Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Plans of the San Carlo Opera Company.

Concerts of Interest in the Near Future.

The fifth Symphony program was of unusual interest, for Paderewski was the soloist, there was a "first time" number and, contrary to custom at these concerts, an encore added to the announced selections. The audience was so demonstrative and insistent at the close of the Rubinstein piano concerto that Paderewski, after returning to the stage many times to bow, seated himself at the instrument and proceeded to upset established rules. And after playing a Liszt-Schubert piece the audience attempted to make him play again. The applause was not stilled until the orchestra came back for the last selection. At the rehearsal the crowd began to gather at 8 o'clock in the morning, and when the doors were opened at 1 o'clock only about half the line could gain admission to the second balcony, 500 seats.

The great D minor concerto as played by the masterly pianist fairly dwarfed the other pieces, which were Hans Pfitzner's overture, "Das Christ-Elflein," and Brahms' second symphony. Paderewski's performance was wonderfully expressive and executed with an enthusiasm and impetuosity that was so dazzling that the delighted auditors fairly showered him with plaudits.

Paderewski's mastery of the piano is so fully recognized and he has so recently displayed his genius at a recital in the same hall that it is needless to analyze or go into detail about his playing with the Symphony orchestra. In the fiery cadenzas and octave runs of the first movement his power and rapidity of execution seemed almost limitless; the romance in F major and the intricacies of the bewildering arpeggios of the second part were exquisite in their treatment, the first because of the delicacy and beautiful cantabile qualities, the second for its brilliancy and crispness.

The last movement was given with a vigor and dash that was astonishing. There were no retards in the immensely difficult double runs, all the figures in the different passage work were cleanly set forth and the overwhelming crash at the close moved the audience to outbursts of applause that demonstrated Paderewski's complete mastery of the big gathering. Then came the scenes mentioned earlier in this notice. The orchestra did noble work, Dr Muck and his players seeming to enjoy the solo work as much as did the audience.

The Pfitzner overture is a gentle and soothing work, without any special characteristics to warrant eulogy. Skilfully orchestrated and played in a sympathetic manner by competent musicians, it made a pleasing impression. The second symphony by Brahms, which has long been a subject of controversy in the musical world, was interpreted in the way that is expected from our orchestra conductor, Muck's reading being potently illustrated by the players.

There will be two novelties on this week's program. The first is the latest work by Charles Martin Loeffler. It is written for piano and full orchestra, and is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Mr Loeffler who got his inspiration for this from Virgil's eighth eclogue, made the first sketch of the work seven or eight years ago. Later he wrote it for two pianos, in which form it was once played at Mrs Gardner's. Since then he has made many important changes in it, and developed it for the orchestra. Mr Gebhard will be at the piano.

The other novelty is an "Adagio and Scherzo-Finale" by Reznicek, who is best known in Boston as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana," the overture of which has been played at our symphony concert. The first number will be Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and the final number Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

1884

RETURN OF PADEREWSKI.

Will Be Next Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 4. The soloist will be Paderewski, whose only appearance it will be in Baltimore with an orchestra, and his last appearance here during his present tour.

PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 17

Paderewski With the Boston Symphony

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor." In accordance with the announcement made at the beginning of the season, the soloists will be chosen from this country.

[59]

TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 18, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

PADEREWSKI [illegible] HIS AUDIENCE

A Touch of Frenzy in It and Him on Saturday Night—A Miscellaneous Concert by the Handel and Haydn Society—Triumphant Gluck—An Amusing London Comedy for America—Pachmann's and Paderewski's Programmes Here—A Life of Mansfield

Again, on Saturday evening, as on Friday afternoon, Mr. Paderewski absorbed the interest of the audience at the Symphony Concert, and again it was subordinated in all its details to his presence. A long interval before his appearance delayed the progress of the concert; he added a long solo piece; his presence and his playing stirred his hearers to excited applause; and again in reaction and weariness they departed in numbers through the performance of Brahms's symphony. Mr. Paderewski's playing of Rubinstein's concert was in truth exciting, but by that very token it lacked, except in the slow movement, the finer aspects of his talents. He drove his piano to the utmost; he fairly pitted it as an orchestra against an orchestra. The power and the passion of the performance were momentarily overwhelming. All else but the whirl and the fire of it disappeared. Rubinstein's music barely withstood the shock of the mighty temperament that had seized upon it and made it as its own voice. Here and there, as the eye sees in glimpses a landscape through which it is whirling, the ear heard the crystalline and many-tinted tone, the weaving and haunting song, the changeful curves of deep or delicate arabesque, the flashing or the caressing phrase of which the Paderewski of the recitals and of all his glories is capable. Then they were swallowed in the devouring pursuit and the consuming conquest of power and passion. Except in the slow movement, the concerto went like a frenzied rhapsody. Judgment, for the moment, was burned away, and only cooler blood brought the reflection that in the performance of it was only one side, and by no means the most persuasive, of the pianist. In the mood in which it left the audience the moment was not exactly fitting for reflections upon the wisdom of encores at Symphony Concerts. Those which Mr. Paderewski received and was permitted on Friday and Saturday must pass among the curious phenomena that in recent years have attended all his appearance through half the world.

Again, none the less, the performance of Brahms's second symphony remained the notable and the normal incident of the concert. Now Dr. Muck quickened the music beyond the pace that other conductors have given it; again he took it a little more slowly. Here he brought some underlying rhythm into more audible play, or there he emphasized another. At one moment he enhanced the songful quality of a particular passage; at another he was sharpening this or that phrase. The sum of these changes was a vitalizing, a recreation of the whole symphony that gave it a new and exhilarating voice. Brahms spoke out in it. There were divination in Dr. Muck's reading and eloquence in the orchestra's playing.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....
dress .....
te .....

NOV 16 1907

Paderewski's recital at Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night will be one of Buffalo's greatest musical events for the winter. The peerless Polish pianist long ago established himself as the foremost exponent of pianoforte music in the world and this season he is breaking his own American records.

This is Paderewski's seventh tour of the United States and nearly 100 concerts have been booked for him, Buffalo being one of the fortunate cities. In the zenith of his fame, the celebrated pianist and composer will present here a program that will include at least one of his own compositions, perhaps more. As a maker of programs Paderewski excels, just as he does in everything else he undertakes. He is one of the greatest men of his time, a king in the artist world.

Even since Mr. Paderewski's local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announced that she would fill mail orders for seats for the Paderewski recital, these orders have been coming in. She will continue to receive them until the opening of the general sale, on Monday, November 25th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store. The first four rows of Convention Hall will be sold for $2, the next 33 rows for $1.50, the rest of the house, including the balcony, for $1.

Mrs. Smith is also receiving many orders for the concerts to be given here in January by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Walter Damrosch, conducting the New York Orchestra, will come here on Friday evening, January 3; Dr. Karl Muck, the famous new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brings his great organization to Buffalo on Monday evening, January 27th. The prices of seats for either concert are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those subscribing for both concerts at the same time will get the $2 seats for $3, the $1.50 seats for $2.50, no reductions on the $1 and the 75 cent seats.

Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith [illegible]

The Providence Journal.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1907.

The Symphony Concerts.

Those who care for the best in music should not forget that the first of the Symphony Concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra allots to Providence takes place to-morrow evening, and that there are only two more afterwards. This is a scanty opportunity considering the size of the city; but it is the most we have a right to expect if we give but languid or perfunctory support to a great organization which is welcomed elsewhere with houses crowded to the doors. Doubtless there are many who "mean to go," but neglect to fulfill their intention. They do not seem to remember that what is a great pleasure may also be a duty. Nor should those who are able to hear music by going away from home be selfishly oblivious of the needs of those less fortunate. As for those who profess to be "musical" but wilfully neglect the chance to learn something about musical art by hearing its masterpieces, their case is perhaps hopeless.

JOURNAL—MONDAY,
NOVEMBER 18, 1907

ENCORE RECORD FOR PADEREWSKI

With Dr. Muck He Shares the Ovation From an Enthusiastic Symphony Audience.

Ignaz Paderewski and Dr. Carl Muck shared the honors at the Symphony concert Saturday night. Paderewski played the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. He has played better here; he has been in happier moods than he showed during the performance of the concerto; and he was visibly not at ease, though he sat in his own old-fashioned, red-fringed chair; yet the audience would not let him depart until he had broken the Symphony rule against encores and played the Chopin scherzo in B flat minor. In the scherzo his art was as magical as art can be.

Dr. Muck's reading of the beautiful Brahms Symphony No. 2 was equally as artistic and enjoyable as Paderewski's playing—great and glorious as that was in many moments. The rare pleasure the symphony gave, however, was marred by the departure between the several movements of a part of the audience. The encore Paderewski gave made the concert later than usual, and there are people who, for some reason, will not remain in the hall after 10 o'clock. Dr. Muck witnessed the exodus with a sad expression.

It is regrettable that the symphony was not placed first on the program. Its delights could then have been enjoyed by all. For Dr. Muck must have known that if Paderewski wants to give encores the rule against them will not stop him. He has always been excepted. The people want encores from him.

Merely as a matter of record it may added that the orhcestra played for the first time Pfitzner's Overture to "The Little Christ Elf," a Christmas fairy play by Ilse von Stach. The overture made but a slight impression.

The program of this week's concert includes C. M. Loeffler's new concert piece, "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), for piano and orchestra. Heinrich Gebhard will play the piano part. Another novelty will be Reznicek's Adagio and Scherzo. Lalo's Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana," will fill out the evening, which, for a change, will be without a symphony.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
NOVEMBER 17, 1907

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Muck has placed two novelties on his next programme, which will be played on Friday afternoon, Nov. 22 and Saturday evening, Nov. 23. The first is of more than ordinary interest to Boston, because it is the latest work by Charles Martin Loeffler. It is written for piano and full orchestra, and is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Mr. Loeffler got his inspiration for this from Virgil's Eighth Eclogue. He made the first sketch of the work seven or eight years ago, and later he wrote it for two pianos. Since then he has made many important changes in it, and developed it for the orchestra. Mr. Gebhard will be at the piano. The work calls for the use of a full modern orchestra.

The other novelty is an "Adagio and Scherzo-Finale" by Reznicek. Reznicek is best known in Boston as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana," the overture of which has been played at Symphony concerts. He is now a resident of Berlin, and does considerable conducting in Germany.

There will be no symphony on the programme. The first number will be the overture "Le Roi d'Ys," and the second number will be Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," which was played with such great success by Mr. Muck

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
NOVEMBER 18, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Pfitzner.....Overture to "The Christ-elf"
Rubinstein.....Concerto in D minor
Pianist, Ignaz Paderewski.
Brahms.....Second Symphony, D minor

The new overture by Pfitzner did not impress us favorably. It seemed an unsuccessful excursion into the Humperdinckian field of learned musical simplicity. There are themes that ought to sound like simple melodies, but are treated with a sort of pudding counterpoint until they are lost in the mass of tone. There is much fragmentary figure development that leads nowhere in particular. Altogether we cannot think that any reviewer will adopt the "Collier's Weekly" tone and call the composer "Honey Pfitz!"

But at this concert it was the soloist who was to charm the multitude; the orchestra was to be overshadowed for once by that wonderful personality which dominates everything that it comes in contact with. Paderewski! ! "Why man, he doth bestride the narrow world like a Colossus!" He started his part of the Rubinstein concerto, not as a pianist, but as a fortissimist. A line from Southey may best describe it—

"Crashing, smashing, dashing and flashing!"

But chiefly the first two. The subordinate theme of the orchestra was almost inaudible beside the piano part. But the heroism of the mood at least fitted the chief theme finely.

In the second movement there was more of the subtler Paderewski. The sweet, caressing tone, the gentle delicacy of the chief theme, were deserving of superlative adjectives. There was a little insecurity in the horn passages in this. The finale went with better balance than the first movement, but the final bravura exceeded the proper powers of the piano. Nevertheless it was all tremendously exciting and the usual public frenzy took place at the close.

All rules are set aside in favor of this phenomenon, and Dr. Muck did what another conductor had done at these concerts long before,—he allowed an encore! Why, after this, Ysaye, or Kreisler, or Melba, should not give encores we cannot explain. The audience, however, were delighted at the innovation and listened to Chopin's B flat minor Scherzo with rapture. It was played with the same excess of power that we criticized at the Paderewski recital. The sinister phrases of the beginning were given with much poetry. Chopin himself said of them—"They should suggest a charnel-house!" But again in the heroic parts the ideal of the performer went beyond the possibilities of hammers and wires. Paderewski here suggested orchestral effects beyond the domain of the piano-forte. Had any lesser pianist played thus it would have been called thumping. Rosenthal has been severely animadverted upon for just such work. "But Quod licet Jovis, non licet"—anybody else. Again the wild applause burst forth and there were even hopes of forcing another solo, but these were unfulfilled.

All this excitement harmed the symphonic part of the concert. We were never less impressed with the tender D major Brahms symphony. Yet it was well enough played; not as finely as we have had it, but still a worthy performance. There was the old-fashioned Brahms exodus at the end of the first movement. We had hoped that Boston had passed this stage of non-appreciation.

But those who stayed to the end were well repaid, for by the time that the finale was reached the effects of the musical champagne had worn off and both orchestra and audience were again in a normal condition.

Dr. Muck gave an excellent reading of the end of the work and here the orchestra played famously. The result was that the phalanx of Brahmsites displayed much enthusiasm and recalled the eminent conductor. Therefore if the proverb—"All's well that ends well"—be applied, the concert was very successful, in spite of its heterogeneous character and its blemishes.

Louis C. Elson.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess ..... m .....

..... ress .....

e .....

The Philadelphia Orchestra.

To the Editor of THE NEWS:

The Philadelphia Orchestra will appear in Baltimore for the first time under the baton of its distinguished new conductor, Carl Pohlig, at the Lyric on Monday evening next in a programme that must appeal strongly to our music lovers—the overture to "Der Freischuetz," the Saint-Saens Piano Concerto No. 4, the Fifth Symphony and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

As we have only 10 orchestral concerts announced for the entire season, including those by the Boston Symphony, the Lyric should be filled for every concert by the splendid orchestra which is so generously supported by art-loving citizens of Philadelphia, among whom are Mrs. A. J. Dallas Dixon, Miss Anne Thompson, Mrs. Horace Brock and Messrs. Alexander Van Rensselaer, Arthur Newbold, Thomas McKean and others.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.
Baltimore, Nov. 15.

[59]

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 17, 1907.

Paderewski, Soloist at Symphony Concert.

Plans of the San Carlo Opera Company.

Concerts of Interest in the Near Future.

The fifth Symphony program was of unusual interest, for Paderewski was the soloist, there was a "first time" number and, contrary to custom at these concerts, an encore added to the announced selections. The audience was so demonstrative and insistent at the close of the Rubinstein piano concerto that Paderewski, after returning to the stage many times to bow, seated himself at the instrument and proceeded to upset established rules. And after playing a Liszt-Schubert piece the audience attempted to make him play again. The applause was not stilled until the orchestra came back for the last selection. At the rehearsal the crowd began to gather at 8 o'clock in the morning, and when the doors were opened at 1 o'clock only about half the line could gain admission to the second balcony, 500 seats.

The great D minor concerto as played by the masterly pianist fairly dwarfed the other pieces, which were Hans Pfitzner's overture, "Das Christ-Elflein," and Brahms' second symphony. Paderewski's performance was wonderfully expressive and executed with an enthusiasm and impetuosity that was so dazzling that the delighted auditors fairly showered him with plaudits.

Paderewski's mastery of the piano is so fully recognized and he has so recently displayed his genius at a recital in the same hall that it is needless to analyze or go into detail about his playing with the Symphony orchestra. In the fiery cadenzas and octave runs of the first movement his power and rapidity of execution seemed almost limitless; the romance in F major and the intricacies of the bewildering arpeggios of the second part were exquisite in their treatment, the first because of the delicacy and beautiful cantabile qualities, the second for its brilliancy and crispness.

The last movement was given with a vigor and dash that was astonishing. There were no retards in the immensely difficult double runs, all the figures in the different passage work were cleanly set forth and the overwhelming crash at the close moved the audience to outbursts of applause that demonstrated Paderewski's complete mastery of the big gathering. Then came the scenes mentioned earlier in this notice. The orchestra did noble work, Dr Muck and his players seeming to enjoy the solo work as much as did the audience.

The Pfitzner overture is a gentle and soothing work, without any special characteristics to warrant eulogy. Skilfully orchestrated and played in a sympathetic manner by competent musicians, it made a pleasing impression. The second symphony by Brahms, which has long been a subject of controversy in the musical world, was interpreted in the way that is expected from our orchestra conductor, Muck's reading being potently illustrated by the players.

There will be two novelties on this week's program. The first is the latest work by Charles Martin Loeffler. It is written for piano and full orchestra, and is entitled "A Pagan Poem." Mr Loeffler, who got his inspiration for this from Virgil's eighth eclogue, made the first sketch of the work seven or eight years ago. Later he wrote it for two pianos, in which form it was once played at Mrs Gardner's. Since then he has made many important changes in it, and developed it for the orchestra. Mr Gebhard will be at the piano.

The other novelty is an "Adagio and Scherzo-Finale" by Reznicek, who is best known in Boston as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana," the overture of which has been played at our symphony concert. The first number will be Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," and the final number Chabrier's rhapsody, 'Espana."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

..... m .....

..... ress .....

..... e .....

RETURN OF PADEREWSKI.

Will Be Next Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 4. The soloist will be Paderewski, whose only appearance it will be in Baltimore with an orchestra, and his last appearance here during his present tour.

1884

1884

..... :88 .....

Paderewski With the Boston Symphony

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor." In accordance with the announcement made at the beginning of the season the prices of single tickets for this con-

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
NOVEMBER 18, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

PADEREWSKI ... HIS AUDIENCE

A Touch of Frenzy in It and Him on Saturday Night—A Miscellaneous Concert by the Handel and Haydn Society—Triumphant Gluck—An Amusing London Comedy for America—Pachmann's and Paderewski's Programmes Here—A Life of Mansfield

Again, on Saturday evening, as on Friday afternoon, Mr. Paderewski absorbed the interest of the audience at the Symphony Concert, and again it was subordinated in all its details to his presence. A long interval before his appearance delayed the progress of the concert; he added a long solo piece; his presence and his playing stirred his hearers to excited applause; and again in reaction and weariness they departed in numbers through the performance of Brahms's symphony. Mr. Paderewski's playing of Rubinstein's concert was in truth exciting, but by that very token it lacked, except in the slow movement, the finer aspects of his talents. He drove his piano to the utmost; he fairly pitted it as an orchestra against an orchestra. The power and the passion of the performance were momentarily overwhelming. All else but the whirl and the fire of it disappeared. Rubinstein's music barely withstood the shock of the mighty temperament that had seized upon it and made it as its own voice. Here and there, as the eye sees in glimpses a landscape through which it is whirling, the ear heard the crystalline and many-tinted tone, the weaving and haunting song, the changeful curves of deep or delicate arabesque, the flashing or the caressing phrase of which the Paderewski of the recitals and of all his glories is capable. Then they were swallowed in the devouring pursuit and the consuming conquest of power and passion. Except in the slow movement, the concerto went like a frenzied rhapsody. Judgment, for the moment, was burned away, and only cooler blood brought the reflection that in the performance of it was only one side, and by no means the most persuasive, of the pianist. In the mood in which it left the audience the moment was not exactly fitting for reflections upon the wisdom of encores at Symphony Concerts. Those which Mr. Paderewski received and was permitted on Friday and Saturday must pass among the curious phenomena that in recent years have attended all his appearance through half the world.

Again, none the less, the performance of Brahms's second symphony remained the notable and the normal incident of the concert. Now Dr. Muck quickened the music beyond the pace that other conductors have given it; again he took it a little more slowly. Here he brought some underlying rhythm into more audible play, or there he emphasized another. At one moment he enhanced the songful quality of a particular passage; at another he was sharpening this or that phrase. The sum of these changes was a vitalizing, a recreation of the whole symphony that gave it a new and exhilarating voice. Brahms spoke out in it. There were divination in Dr. Muck's reading and eloquence in the orchestra's playing.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau "The World"

m .....

dress .....

te .....

Paderewski's recital at Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night will be one of Buffalo's greatest musical events for the winter. The peerless Polish pianist long ago established himself as the foremost exponent of pianoforte music in the world and this season he is breaking his own American records.

This is Paderewski's seventh tour of the United States and nearly 100 concerts have been booked for him, Buffalo being one of the fortunate cities. In the zenith of his fame, the celebrated pianist and composer will present here a program that will include at least one of his own compositions, perhaps more. As a maker of programs Pederewski excels, just as he does in everything else he undertakes. He is one of the greatest men of his time, a king in the artist world.

Even since Mr. Paderewski's local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announced that she would fill mail orders for seats for the Paderewski recital, these orders have been coming in. She will continue to receive them until the opening of the general sale, on Monday, November 25th, at the Danton, Cottier & Daniels' music store. The first four rows of Convention Hall will be sold for $2, the next 33 rows for $1.50, the rest of the house, including the balcony, for $1.

Mrs. Smith is also receiving many orders for the concerts to be given here in January by the New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras. Walter Damrosch, conducting the New York Orchestra, will come here on Friday evening, January 3; Dr. Karl Muck, the famous new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brings his great organization to Buffalo on Monday evening, January 27th. The prices of seats for either concert are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those subscribing for both concerts at the same time will get the $2 seats for $3, the $1.50 seats for $2.50, no reductions on the $1 and the 75 cent seats.

Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 28 Irving place.

NOVEMBER 17, 1907

PADEREWSKI PLAYS AT FIFTH SYMPHONY

An Unsatisfactory Overture by Pfitzner Opened the Programme.

NOTED PIANIST GRANTS AUDIENCE AN ENCORE

Brahms Number to Close, Under Dr. Muck's Direction, Is Feature of Concert.

BY PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The Little Christ-Elf".....Pfitzner
Concerto in D minor No. 4 for piano.....Rubinstein
Symphony in D major No. 2.....Brahms

Hans Pfitzner wrote this overture and other music for a Christmas fairy drama by Ilsa von Sach. The play was produced at Munich, the 11th of last December. The overture was performed about three weeks before that, in Berlin. The drama itself was harshly criticised. It was condemned as foolish, affected, sentimental, silly, ridiculous—these were only a few of the adjectives jauntily employed to voice disapprobation.

A composer is not always to be pitied when he sets music to a weak libretto, or writes incidental music for a stupid play. If his music be good, he shines all the more brilliantly. If it be mediocre or poor, he and his friends can shrug shoulders and say, "How could any one be inspired by such a text? The wonder is that the music is as good as it is."

Inasmuch as the overture has been played three or four times in European concert halls without reference to the drama, it may fairly be judged as absolute music, as any overture without a printed or implied argument. We are told that the play and the music were intended to interest children. Any story that really entertains healthy children will also delight healthy grown persons. Sometimes the older ones find a keener delight than the younger; witness two widely dissimilar books, "Alice in Wonderland" and "Gulliver's Travels." But must music be necessarily simple to amuse children? Are they swayed only by marked rhythms and strongly accented tunes?

Whether the themes in Pfitzner's overture are typical of characters or are associated with scenes in the play is immaterial when the music is brought into the concert hall. The opening measures may or may not accompany the final tableau of the drama when angels pray and the Christ child climbs the ladder to heaven. In the concert hall, without an explanatory note of any purpose or wish of the composer, the music is merely music.

Pfitzner, who, now living in Munich, will soon make Strassburg his home, wrote two operas, the later of which "Die Rose vom Liebegartens" (1901), made him a much discussed man. Pages in this opera which are of a deliberately realistic nature provoked the greatest of compliments, a parody. He himself thinks that the world is down on him, that there is a conspiracy to crush him, and when a man thinks this and says this he is in a parlous state.

Surely there is nothing in this overture to awaken jealousy or animosity in the breasts of Pfitzner's contemporaries. If his Scherzo, an early work, or his overture to "Katchaen von Heilbronn" had been performed last night, we might all recognize him today as a person of importance. The overture to "The Little Christ-Elf" may serve in the theatre. As a concert piece it is of little importance. The themes are childish rather than childlike, and while the structure of the work is clean-cut and decided, there is little beauty of decoration or color. Although the orchestra indicated by Pfitzner is a small one, he nevertheless succeeds at times at being muddy in his coloring, and when this coloring is not muddy it is conventional or drab.

Mr. Paderewski was, of course, welcomed enthusiastically, although the concerto he chose was a familiar virtuoso piece with some pages of amiable sentiment. It seems impossible that 40 years ago this composition raised a storm of abuse in London because, forsooth, is was "chaotic and incomprehensible." Mr. Paderewski is fortunate, or unfortunate, in this, that it makes little difference to the great majority what he does play. The throng submits willingly to his spell after the first leonine attack, nor at a symphony concert is it willing to let the weaver of spells go after a concerto. He must play other pieces, or at least another piece.

So whenever Paderewski appears at a symphony concert, the sane rule forbidding encores is broken and the balance of the programme is destroyed. It was so when he first played here at a symphony concert 16 years ago, and it will be so, undoubtedly, if he should play at one in 1933. It is true that this rule about encores was broken the season before Mr. Paderewski's first appearance, when Mr. de Pachmann aroused so great enthusiasm that he appeased the applauders only by playing three or four pieces.

But let the pianist be Mr. Paderewski, or the singer the angel Israfel, who sings so wildly well that the stars cease their hymns to listen; even then, is a symphony concert the place for an intermezzo in the nature of a recital? In an ideal symphony concert should not a solo be one incidental or necessary to the general scheme of ensemble? And in fairness to all, if one pianist be allowed to add to the programme, why should not another, or a violinist, or a singer, or even a 'cellist be permitted to add a group of little pieces in answer to the roaring applause?

Mr. Paderewski played the concerto with a verve that is peculiar to him, but his strength and his more engrossing qualities did not prevent much of the concerto from seeming old fashioned, without the grace and perfume that save, even when the substance is clearly of a generation long past. At times Mr. Paderewski forced tone till it lost pretation than to the music itself. Recalled enthusiastically, he played Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor.

After a display of phenomenal personality and after the excitement of anticipation, realization and tribute, any symphony, however great it may be, or however glorious the performance of it, will suffer. This is inevitable. Yet to some, the symphony of Brahms, one of that master's finest and most musical works, as interpreted by Dr. Muck, was the feature of the concert.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
ss

OLGA SAMAROFF.
Pianist With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
rom
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
ddress
ate NOV 17

The first of the three concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Providence during the coming winter will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. On this first programme Dr. Muck has placed one of the most interesting novelties that has been played in Boston in several years. It is a symphonic triology by Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, entitled "Wallenstein." It had its first performance in America at one of Anton Seidl's concerts in Steinway Hall, New York, in 1888, and it has since been performed in Chicago in 1901 and in Boston four weeks ago.

Vincent d'Indy, the composer, is one of the leaders of the modern movement in French music. It will be remembered that two years ago he was brought to America to conduct a series of guest performances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and if he did not leave a deep impression as a conductor the esteem in which he is held by connoisseurs as a composer was not lessened in the least. The composer has drawn his inspiration from "Wallenstein" from Schiller's triology of dramas. "Wallenstein's Camp," the "Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The work is in three movements and the first and last bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla."

The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who is not a stranger to the music lovers of Providence, and it is at the direct request of a large number of the Boston Symphony subscribers that she has been made soloist at the first concert. Mme. Samaroff is one of the few artists who started their career in America and were successful from the beginning. Mme. Samaroff will play Schumann's concerto in A-minor. The final number on the programme will also be by Schumann, his overture to "Genoveva."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
NOV 17 1907

The sale of seats for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 30 is going on at a lively rate. We shall all be curious to know what program Dr. Muck will give us. Either the Brahms D minor or the Tschaikowsky Pathetique would be most acceptable for the Symphony.

[60]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

PADEREWSKI FIRST, ORCHESTRA SECOND

An Audience That Thought Only of the Pianist and Set Rule at Naught—His Playing of Rubinstein's Fourth Concerto—Dr. Muck and the Band Give a Vivid and Vital Performance of Brahms's Second Symphony—Mr. Denghausen's Recital of German Songs—Other Musical News

Once in a long time a singer or a virtuoso, who nominally assists at a Symphony Concert overshadows all else to the audience. It was so—and to the clouding of the first performance of Mr. Converse's "Mystic Trumpeter"—when Mme. Melba, in the rich noon of her powers, sang with the orchestra last winter. And it was so—and to the obscuring of a vivid and vital performance of Brahms's second symphony—when Mr. Paderewski played with the orchestra yesterday. Waiting for him the audience took as agreeable pastime the new overture with which Dr. Muck began the concert. A Christmas fairy tale of "The Little Christ-Elf" moved Hans Pfitzner to write it. The peculiar vein of naive German sentimentality, that none but Germans quite feel or understand stirred in it. Up to Heaven went the little Christ-child, even as Humperdinck's angels descend from it in "Hänsel and Gretel." Germans and the rest of the world are equally incorrigible in their moods toward such music, and the slight and passing impression that it made upon its hearers yesterday need not be laid at Mr. Paderewski's door. Still waiting for him, the listeners endured patiently a delay that helped to make the concert nearly two hours and a quarter long. At length he came, duly played a concerto, and then filled the intermission—or rather one intermission—with a solo piece, while rule and precedent against repetitions or additional numbers bent before his willingness and the insistence of the audience. Then, when it was sure that he would play no more—and a very long time, much desultory clapping, and a little irritated hissing were necessary to satisfy a noisy group of music-school children in the second balcony—it was virtually done with the concert. The audience melted at each pause in the symphony, while Dr. Muck watched the departing with a touch of contemptuously tolerant patience. Before the end there were long rifts of empty seats, and very scanty applause rewarded what was a more notable performance of the symphony than Mr. Paderewski happened to give of the concerto.

It is easy to be cynical and censorious over all these episodes, to say that they are not quite in accord with dignity and precedent at the Symphony Concerts and so forth in the alluring vein of superior righteousness. But to look up to the "rush seats" of the second balcony was straightway to be kind. There sat elderly women, not so well-to-do that they could take their pleasure when and how they would. They had waited for hours at the door that they might be sure of their places. Eagerness was written deep on their faces. They had come to hear Mr. Paderewski for the first, perhaps the only time; under the only conditions, as it might be, that they could afford. To have heard him only with the orchestra would have left them half satisfied. They craved him by himself, and before such visible longing and such clear rapture in the satisfaction of it, an "encore rule" may well break. And among these elderly women were young girls, seizing, too, a first and perhaps the only possible opportunity for them to hear the foremost pianist of our time and to feel the spell of a unique personality. It is good that our Symphony Concerts should have form and rule and dignity. It is as good as well that on occasion they should be humanly disdainful of all three.

The pity was, though these rapt listeners hardly suspected it, that Mr. Paderewski's playing of the concerto sometimes failed to disclose his finest and most distinguishing powers. For some reason, he could hardly summon in the first movement his transparent beauty and iridescence of singing tone; while his articulation lacked the precise yet elastic clearness with which he is wont to play such concise music. The ear missed both the prismatic and the songful quality of his playing. He was gravely, minutely, absorbedly expository. His mood seemed a little constrained; his tone a little pale and lifeless. Happily in the slow movement he was free again. He persuaded its truly lyrical content to speech in the changeful and caressing quality of his tones. He brooded over its gentle melancholy. He led its melodies in shadowy gradations or warm shadings. The whole was softly clear of phrase, and the impression was of pensive song, singing almost to itself. Then, with the contrast of the finale, Mr. Paderewski struck fire, and pianist, conductor and band threw off the music, like so much improvisation, tossed measure by measure to the ears of equally exhilarated hearers. The truest Paderewski of all played the little extra piece—the pianist of the secrets of pellucid tone, winding melody, delicate traceries of ornament and shadowy or streaming harmonic backgrounds. The sensitive felicity of feeling and of expression recalled even the young Paderewski of the nineties and the matured pianist seldom has quite his voice.

It was the turn of Dr. Muck with Brahms's symphony in D major, the serene symphony, the light symphony, even the Viennese symphony, as the priggish Leipzigers despitefully called it. Really it is the symphony of Brahms that gives the quickest and clearest pleasure to its hearers. He has hidden his reflection, and the music seems to spring spontaneously. He labors over no barren places, as though diligence might make them fertile. Sheer freshness of mood has already brought them to blossom. Warmth of spirit has cleared and brightened the instrumental voices, but it is still a Brahmsian voice in its reticence. He will sing, but not passionately in the first and the second movements. He will caper, but not boisterously in the intermezzo. He will rejoice, but not tumultuously, in the finale. The sunny energy of the music is persuasive. There is little scaffolding in tones, and for once charm of instrumental voices hides even that.

And Dr. Muck came to the symphony with a distinctness of comprehension as true and clear as that which he brought to its predecessor last year. At moments he and his men almost made Brahms sound like a deeper-voiced Mozart. Steadily the conductor found the underlying melody and kept it. Steadily he gained from his men a richness of tone that clothed it with a new depth and mellowness. The insistent song of the first movement flowed warmly against its dusky background until both merged in the calm pool of golden tone with which conductor and men brought the first movement to its close. Clear and warm again was the more wandering song of the slow movement—music of Indian summer in mood and expression even if the Brahmsians, who, as a rule, hardly open the windows of their studies, will have it of their conventional spring. The scherzo sounded like a playful and capricious minuet, and Dr. Muck made the little passages that interrupt its flow like little darting claws playing in and out of its grace. The finale leaped to the ear, warm and exultant. The pace, the spirit of the performance gave it a new and strange ardor. Once more, as often in the whole symphony, the conductor seemed to be divining and adding what the reticent Brahms—reticent even in high spirits—would not quite express.

H. T. P.

rom
ldress
ate

Baltimore A Music-Loving City, But Deficient In Encouragement Of Painting, Sculpture, Arts And Crafts.

To the Editor of THE NEWS:

It has been proved beyond doubt that Baltimore is a music-loving city. Anyone who attended the Boston Symphony concert on November 6 will vouch for the size and enthusiasm of the audience, on a frightfully rainy night.

We remember last spring when the Metropolitan Opera Company had such a successful season here that the management announced it found it well worth while and would return next year. And the operas were given in Holy Week!

But is Baltimore artistically disposed toward painting, sculpture, arts and crafts?

I have two artist friends who left Baltimore 10 years ago because they feared starvation, physical and mental. They have succeeded in New York.

We are all very proud of the new Maryland Institute building, on Mount Royal avenue. This school trains boys in architecture, mechanical drawing, etc., and has also a school for free-hand drawing, painting, sculpture, etc., for boys and girls.

One would suppose that our citizens would have rushed to the rescue, when money was needed to rebuild after the fire of 1904.

Mr. Michael Jenkins did give generously the land upon which the new Institute was built, but this was only after Mr. Andrew Carnegie had augmented the funds and made possible the building of the white palace that is now complete.

Our Arts and Crafts Society went under at the time of the fire, and has never recovered. The Designers and Artisans' Club has been in existence for over a year and is doing excellent, original work, most of which is sent to New York, Chicago and other cities for want of patronage at home.

And now the Municipal Art Society is planning for an exhibition of American sculpture, in the spring. The Fifth Regiment Armory has been secured for this purpose. Members of the Society are working quietly to collect necessary funds for the enterprise.

If anyone is indignant at the facts stated in this letter, he has the opportunity of proving his artistic appreciation by sending a check to the Society. In so doing he will ease his conscience and enable his fellow-citizens to have an intellectual treat that they cannot afford to miss.

C. T. W.

BOSTON
COLUMBUS, O.
NOV 24 1907
ess
e

Mr. Howe, Miss Keating.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has made the first of its five trips to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

At none of these concerts was there a soloist. The four symphonies chosen by Dr. Muck for these programs were Mozart's in G minor, Beethoven's "Pastorale," Bruckner's in D minor (the unfinished) and d'Indy's "Wallenstein Trilogy" which met with such great success in Boston when it was played there for the first time a few weeks ago.

Dr. Muck did a very bold thing for his first matinee concert in New York on Saturday afternoon, November 9. He placed on his program two symphonies, and nothing but two symphonies, Mozart's in G minor, and Beethoven's "Pastorale."

...BOSTON, NOVEMBER 17, 1907

MUSIC FROM AUTHOR DELIGHTING IN MACABRE

Symphony Orchestra to Play "Pagan Poem After Virgil," by C. M. Loeffler, Who Catches but Is Not Caught by Rhythm of Satanic Goat.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck purposes to produce at the Symphony concerts this week, new and strange music by Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, who has lived for some time in Medfield.

Mr. Loeffler delights in the macabre. His soul is tranquil in the shadows through his eyes peer curiously. He ...ows the sabbat and is cool enough ...take notes. He analyses the witch ...remembers it, and at his leisure improves on it, yet he himself is never victim of the spell. He catches the rhythm of the satanic goat, but he is not tempted to fall prostrate before the enthroned beast.

There was a time when the Dies Irae obsessed his mind. In the voices of Nature, whether she smiled or raged, he heard the awful chant. The tragedy of the little boy Tintagiles moved him and he found in the viola d'amore the child's supplication and lament. With a peculiar pleasure he illustrated in tones wild poems of Baudelaire and Rollinat. The exquisite fancy and the bitter irony of Verlaine appealed alike to him. The Helen sung by Poe inspired him to strains of wondrous beauty. With Rossetti he felt a sudden light bursting upon him and he, too, recognized the sounds and sights and love known in some period of life lived long ago. The verbal and rhythmical caprices of Gustave Kahn challenged him to an imitation that was a victory.

It would seem that he might have been tempted again to musical endeavor by "Kubla Khan," by "Sister Helen," or by the thought of the Grecian youth, ...seeing Pan face to face, or remembering "the breast of the nymphs ...brake," wasted away in his passion for the unattainable; but Mr. Loeffler turned his eyes toward Thessaly.

Voltaire once said: "It is a singular fact that vampires are found only in Hungary." For years the old world believed that Thessaly was the favorite dwelling place of witches. What adventures did not Lucius Apuleius have in that far off land, that country where the sun was at will restrained by the knowing from his natural race, where the moon was compelled for some fell purpose to purge her skim upon herbs and trees! There dwelt the old women greatly feared who entered a stranger's room in the dark night, cut into his body, thrust in hands and plucking out the heart replaced it with a sponge, so that the wound would open when the wretch drew nigh a river to drink; the sponge would fall into the water; the body would forever after be without ...

Possibly in Libya near the border of Ethiopia there were more mysterious sorceries than those worked by the witches of Thessaly. The brother of Apheliion, who was killed by an embalmer jealous of her sister's love for the guest of a night, believed that Libya was the land to be more dreaded. As he tells his story through the mouth of Marcel Schwob, "it is indeed terrible to think that the incantations of women can make the moon descend into the box of a looking glass; or plunge when it is full into a bucket of silver, with dripping stars; or fry as a yellow jellyfish in a stove, while the Thessalian night is black and men who change their skin are free to roam. All this is terrible; but I should fear less these things than to meet again in the blood-hued desert the embalming women of Libya."

...ffler calls his latest composition "Pagan Poem After Virgil." His ... was suggested by lines in the ...th eclogue from the song sung by ...ilboeus chanting in rivalry with ... The eclogue has been entitled "Pharmaceutria," the Sorcerer. A Thessalian girl works magical spells that ...may bring back to her, Daphnis, her lover. Virgil here borrowed from the second Idyll of Theocritus, in which the enamored and ...ted woman is Simaetha of Syracuse. The passages in Virgil's eclogue ...at appealed especially to Mr. Loeffler ...those as Englished by Mr. F. W. ...Marshall:

"Fetch water forth, and twine the ...altars here with the soft fillet, and ...burn resinous twigs and make frankincense, that I may try by magic rites to ...lover's sense from sanity; ...wanting now but the songs. ...from the city, my songs, draw ...home.

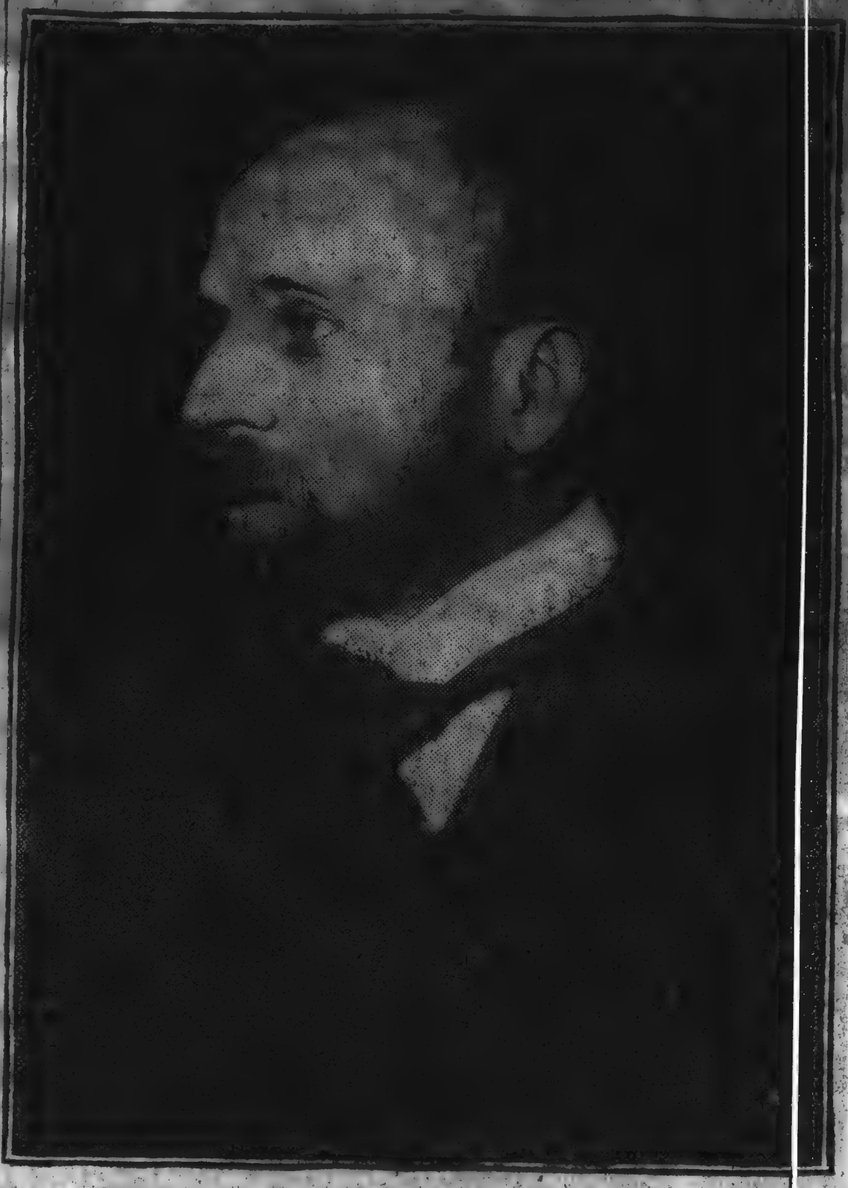
"...have might, even, to draw ...moon from heaven; with songs ...formed the crew of Ulysses; ...the cold snake is burst asunder in the meadows.

"...w from the city, my songs, draw ...home.

"...first I twine about thee ...three triple-hued threads, and ...these altars I draw thine ...an odd number is the god's delight.

"...from the city, my songs, draw ...home.

"...old colors in three ...it to them; and say, ...my songs, draw ...home.



CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER,

Whose New and Strange Music Is to Be Played by Symphony Orchestra.

"Sprinkle barley meal and kindle the brittle bay twigs with bitumen. Cruel Daphnis burns me; I burn this bay at Daphnis.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

"These herbs and these poisons gathered in Pontus, Moeris himself gave me; in Pontus they grow thickest. By their might I have often seen Moeris become a wolf and plunge into the forest, often seen him call up souls from their deep graves and transplant the harvests to where they were not sown.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

"Fetch ashes, Amaryllis, out-of-doors, and fling them across thy head into the running brook; and look not back. With these I will assail Daphnis; nothing cares he for gods, nothing for songs.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

"See! the embers on the altar have caught with a flickering flame, themselves, of their own accord, while I delay to fetch them. Be it for good! Something there is for sure; and Hylax basks in the doorway. May we believe? or do lovers fashion dreams of their own?

"Forbear: from the city—forbear now, my songs—Daphnis comes."

"As this wax softens * * * so let Daphnis do for love of me." Was this spell ever worked in New England, which was once a land of witchcraft, where strange superstitions still survive in remote villages on sullen hills or by the conniving sea?

This spell is a very old one and many have been thought to die of it. The potency of it was believed by the ancient Greeks and Romans; the spell came down through the centuries; it is still worked, they say, even in English provinces. The French name the spell "Envoutement," and the wax image itself of the man or woman who was to be brought back to lonely arms or killed by a wasting disease is called "vols" or "voust." An image resembling the victim was fashioned. Sometimes hair or a shred of clothing of the human being ornamented the doll. If the figure were pierced in any place, the man or woman suffered in the same region. If the doll were melted, there was mysterious wasting away.

Read the sane and pious Jeremy Collier's account of Duffus, the 78th King of Scotland. There was a plot against Duffus in the 10th century as a contemner of the nobility. "A club of witches at Forresse in Murray, did, by wasting his image in wax, so waste and torment him with continual pain and sweating, that he pin'd daily, and no remedy could be found till the witchcraft was discovered, the image broke and the witches punished."

It was believed that protestant sorcerers, wishing to bring about the death of Charles IX. of France, who, after St. Bartholomew's day, saw bloody crows and other horrid visions, killed him by means of waxen dolls made in his image. In like manner, the Duchess of Gloucester, Roger Bolingbroke and Margerey Jourdain were accused of putting a wax image of Henry VI. over a slow fire, and for this the duchess was imprisoned, the conjuror Bolingbroke hanged, and the witch Jourdain, or as some call her, Gardemain, was burned alive.

Then there was Enguerrand de Marigny of a noble Norman family, prime minister under Philippe-le-Bel and minister under Louis X. His wife Alix de Mons, and his sister, the Dame de Cantelon, were accused of having employed magical means to slay Louis, known as Hutin. Charles de Valois and other barons to effect the escape of Marigny ...and ... from prison. ... accuser, who, jailed in consequence, killed himself in his cell. Marigny's wife and sister swore that De Marigny had hired Dulot to mould wax images of the King, then to run pins through them, while magical incantations were recited. The images were shown to the King, and De Marigny, in 1315, was hanged from a gibbet which he himself, as minister, had erected at Montfaucon.

There are two striking instances of the use of this superstition in modern literature. One is Dante Gabriel Rossetti's poem, "Sister Helen," which begins:

"Why did you melt your waxen man,
Sister Helen?
Today is the third since you began."
"The time was long, yet the time ran,
Little Brother."
("O Mother, Mary Mother,
Three days today, between Hell and Heaven!")

The other is the passage in Thomas Hardy's "The Return of the Native," where Susan Nunsuch, wishing to protect her boy from the evil influence of Eustacia Vye, moulded an image from beeswax, put a red ribbon round the neck of the doll and made with ink the semblance of sandal shoes. "To counteract the malign spell which she imagined poor Eustacia to be working, the boy's mother busied herself with a ghastly invention of superstition, calculated to bring powerlessness, atrophy and annihilation on any human being against whom it was directed. It was a practice well known on Egdon at that date and one that is not quite extinct at the present day." And after she had fashioned this doll, the old woman pierced it with at least 50 pins "of the old long and yellow sort, whose heads were made to come off at their first usage." She then held it in the tongs the image of Eustacia over a glowing turf fire, and while it wasted slowly away repeated the Lord's prayer backward.

Did not King James in his "Daemonology" state: "the devil teaches how to make pictures of wax or clay, that by roasting thereof, the persons that they bear the name of may be continually melted or dried away by continual sickness"? Did not Bishop Jewell, in 1558, preaching before the Queen, speak of the increase of this practice? "Your Grace's subjects pine away, even unto the death, their color fadeth, their flesh rotteth, their speech is benumbed, their senses are bereft." Was not a waxen image, with hair like that of the unfortunate Earl of Derby found in his chamber after his death from an odd disease of constant retching? On the other hand, the wife of Marshal d'Ancre was beheaded for a witch, for she enchanted the Queen to dote upon her husband; "and they say the young King's picture was found in her closet in virgin wax, with one leg melted away." Let us dismiss the fascinating subject with these lines from a sonnet of old Daniel:

The sly enchanter, when to work his will
And secret wrong on some forspoken wight,
Frames waxe, in forme to represent aright
The poore unwitting wretch he meanes to kill,
And prickes the image, fram'd by magick's skill,
Whereby to vex the partie day and night."

Mr. Loeffler wrote this "Pagan Poem" originally in 1901 for a small combination of instruments and for a chamber concert. He afterward arranged it for two pianos and three trumpets, and in this version it was performed at a private house in Boston. He afterward (in 1905-6) remodelled it, making it much more symphonic in form, for orchestra, with piano, English horn and ... He also made ... version ...

form the "Pagan Poem" was played on the 25th of last month at a private house in East Walpole.

It was not the intention of the composer to undertake the necessarily vain task of supplying a literal, interlineal translation of Virgil's verses into tones. The refrain is given to trumpets behind the scenes until the spell brings Daphnis to the door when they give forth on the stage an exultant but wildly conceived fanfare. The first chief theme may be called the theme of evocation, but the other themes are not intended to be typical. They have only musical significance and form material for musical development. Yet the imaginative may find certain pages descriptive of the wolf-hunt suggested by the mention of Moeris the lycanthrope, and also passages at the end that may refer to Hylax barking in the doorway. This extraordinary composition, extraordinary both in imaginative force and in complexity of workmanship, is not merely descriptive, pictorial music. It is a sustained flight of rare fantasy evoked by the thought of Virgil's lines.

The "Pagan Poem," "In memory of Gustave Schirmer," is scored for three flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo) two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, a set of three kettle drums, antique cymbals, tam-tam, harp, piano and strings. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard will be the pianist.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.
NOV 18 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski

Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager of the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mme Olga Samaroff, pianist, as one of the soloists in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9, and of the recital by Ignace Jan Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, in the same hall Tuesday night, December 17, is receiving many orders for reserved seats from parties in New York, the Oranges, Montclair and other neighboring places. Thus far music-loving Newarkers have been rather slow in showing their interest in these important events. If they wish to secure the more desirable reserved seats they should send their orders so soon as possible to Mr. Sommer at his office, No. 79 Broad street.

NEWS
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 17 1907

IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

The Famous Pianist Will Be Heard at Convention Hall in the Future.

Fresh from his rest of a year at his beautiful estate in Switzerland, more the wizard than ever, Paderewski gives his only Buffalo recital this season at Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night and the indications are that his audience will be limited only by the capacity of the hall.

His concert on Thanksgiving night will be a great musical treat. Ever since his local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announced that she would receive mail orders for his recital, the letters have been pouring in. Such orders will be filled during the coming week and until the opening of the public sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store on Monday, Nov. 25.

For the Paderewski recital the first four rows of Convention Hall are $2, the next three rows, $1.50, the rest of the hall, including the balcony, $1.

Orders are also coming in for the January concerts by the New York and Boston Symphony orchestras, both coming here under Mrs. Smith's management this season. The prices for these concerts are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents, but those subscribing for the two at the same time secure both seats for $3 and the $1.50 seats for $2.50, no reductions on the $1 and 75 cent seats.

The New York Symphony orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, plays here on Friday evening, Jan. 3; the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, on Monday evening, Jan. 27.

Mail orders for any or all of these concerts, accompanied by checks payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving Place.

...m .....

...dress .....

PADEREWSKI AGAIN

Paderwiski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor." In accordance with the announcements made at the beginning of the season, the ... concert

HERALD—BOSTON, NOVEMBER 17, 1907

NEW MUSIC FROM AUTHOR DELIGHTING IN MACABRE

Symphony Orchestra to Play "Pagan Poem After Virgil," by C. M. Loeffler, Who Catches but Is Not Caught by Rhythm of Satanic Goat.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Dr. Muck purposes to produce at the Symphony concerts this week, new and strange music by Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler, who has lived for some time in Medfield.

Mr. Loeffler delights in the macabre. His soul is tranquil in the shadows though his eyes peer curiously. He watches the sabbat and is cool enough to take notes. He analyses the witch song, remembers it, and at his leisure improves on it, yet he himself is never victim of the spell. He catches the rhythm of the satanic goat, but he is not tempted to fall prostrate before the enthroned beast.

There was a time when the Dies Irae obsessed his mind. In the voices of Nature, whether she smiled or raged, he heard the awful chant. The tragedy of the little boy Tintagiles moved him and he found in the viola d'amore the child's supplication and lament. With a peculiar pleasure he illustrated in tones wild poems of Baudelaire and Rollinat. The exquisite fancy and the bitter irony of Verlaine appealed alike to him. The Helen sung by Poe inspired him to strains of wondrous beauty. With Rossetti he felt a sudden light bursting upon him and he, too, recognized the sounds and sights and love known in some period of life lived long ago. The verbal and rhythmical caprices of Gustave Kahn challenged him to an imitation that was a victory. It would seem that he might have been tempted again to musical endeavor by "Kubla Khan," by "Sister Helen," or by the thought of the Grecian youth, who seeing Pan face to face, or remembering "the breast of the nymphs in the brake," wasted away in his passion for the unattainable; but Mr. Loeffler turned his eyes toward Thessaly.

Voltaire once said: "It is a singular fact that vampires are found only in Hungary." For years the old world believed that Thessaly was the favorite dwelling place of witches. What adventures did not Lucius Apuleius have in that far off land, that country where the sun was at will restrained by the knowing from his natural race, where the moon was compelled for some fell purpose to purge her skim upon herbs and trees! There dwelt the old women greatly feared who entered a stranger's room in the dark night, cut into his body, thrust in hands and plucking out the heart replaced it with a sponge, so that the wound would open when the wretch drew nigh a river to drink; the sponge would fall into the water; the body would forever after be without

Possibly in Libya near the border of Ethiopia there were more mysterious sorceries than those worked by the witches of Thessaly. The brother of Ophelion, who was killed by an embalmer jealous of her sister's love for the guest of a night, believed that Libya was the land to be more dreaded. As he tells his story through the mouth of Marcel Schwob, "it is indeed terrible to think that the incantations of women can make the moon descend into the box of a looking glass; or plunge when it is full into a bucket of silver, with dripping stars; or fry as a yellow jellyfish in a stove, while the Thessalian night is black and men who change their skin are free to roam. All this is terrible; but I should fear less these things than to meet again in the blood-hued desert the embalming women of Libya."

Mr. Loeffler calls his latest composition "Pagan Poem After Virgil." His music was suggested by lines in the eighth eclogue from the song sung by Alphesiboeus chanting in rivalry with Damon. The eclogue has been entitled "Pharmaceutria," the Sorcerer. A Thessalian girl works magical spells that she may bring back to her, Daphnis, her errant lover. Virgil here borrowed freely from the second Idyll of Theocritus in which the enamored and slighted woman is Simaetha of Syracuse. The passages in Virgil's eclogue that appealed especially to Mr. Loeffler are these as Englished by Mr. F. W. Mackail:

"Fetch water forth, and twine the altars here with the soft fillet, and burn resinous twigs and make frankincense, that I may try by magic rites to turn my lover's sense from sanity; nothing is wanting now but the songs.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

"Songs have might: even, to draw down the moon from heaven; with songs Circe transformed the crew of Ulysses; by singing, the cold snake is burst asunder in the meadows.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

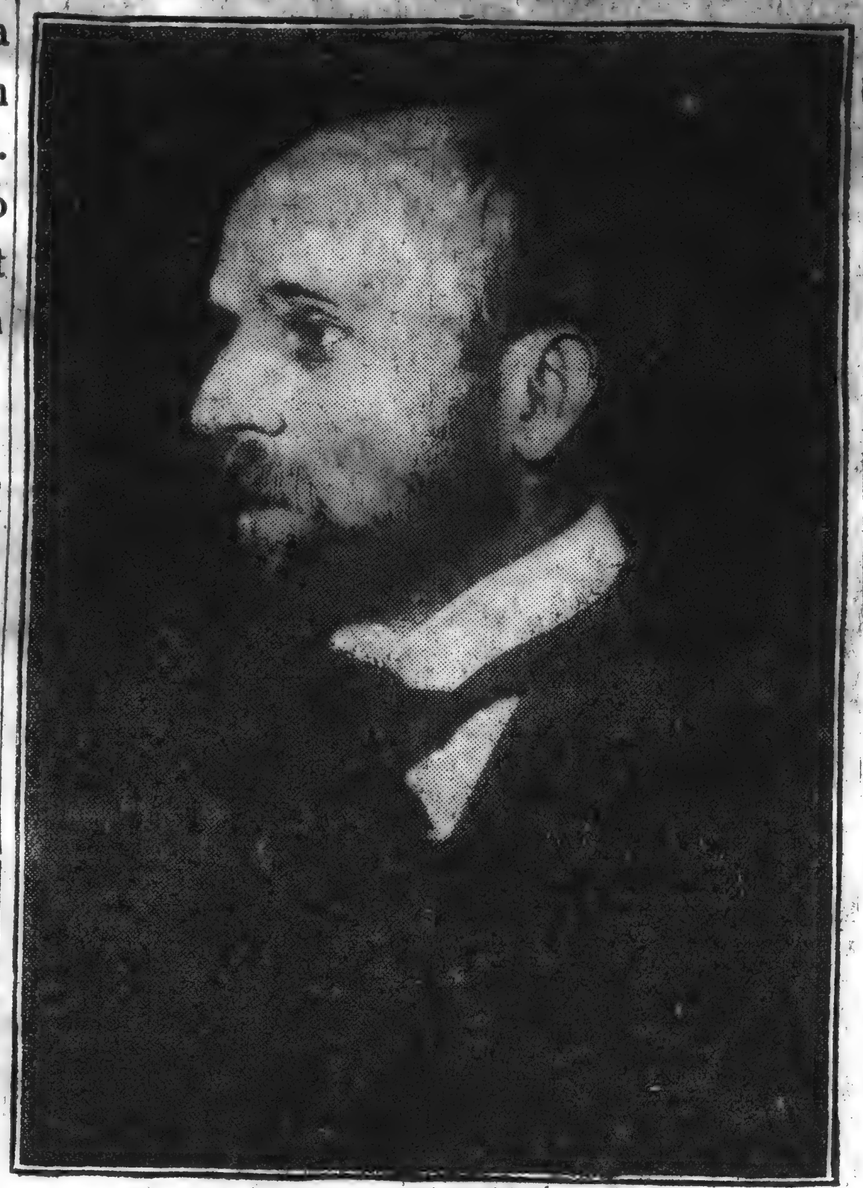
"Three-fold first I twine about thee these diverse triple-hued threads, and thrice round these altars I draw thine image; an odd number is the god's delight.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

"Bind the three-fold colors in three knots, Amaryllis, but tie them; and say, 'These bands.'

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw

"As this wax [illegible] and as this wax [illegible] fire,



CHARLES MARTIN LOEFFLER,
Whose New and Strange Music Is to Be Played by Symphony Orchestra.

Sprinkle barley meal and kindle the brittle bay twigs with bitumen. Cruel Daphnis burns me; I burn this bay at Daphnis.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

"These herbs and these poisons gathered in Pontus, Moeris himself gave me; in Pontus they grow thickest. By their might I have often seen Moeris become a wolf and plunge into the forest, often seen him call up souls from their deep graves and transplant the harvests to where they were not sown.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

"Fetch ashes, Amaryllis, out-of-doors, and fling them across thy head into the running brook; and look not back. With these I will assail Daphnis; nothing cares he for gods, nothing for songs.

"Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

"See! the embers on the altar have caught with a flickering flame, themselves, of their own accord, while I delay to fetch them. Be it for good! Something there is for sure; and Hylax basks in the doorway. May we believe? or do lovers fashion dreams of their own?

"Forbear: from the city—forbear now, my songs—Daphnis comes."

"As this wax softens * * * so let Daphnis do for love of me." Was this spell ever worked in New England, which was once a land of witchcraft, where strange superstitions still survive in remote villages on sullen hills or by the conniving sea?

This spell is a very old one and many have been thought to die of it. The potency of it was believed by the ancient Greeks and Romans; the spell came down through the centuries; it is still worked, they say, even in English provinces. The French name the spell "Envoutement," and the wax image itself of the man or woman who was to be brought back to lonely arms or killed by a wasting disease is called "vois" or "voust." An image resembling the victim was fashioned. Sometimes hair or a shred of clothing of the human being ornamented the doll. If the figure were pierced in any place, the man or woman suffered in the same region. If the doll were melted, there was mysterious wasting away.

Read the sane and pious Jeremy Collier's account of Duffus, the 78th King of Scotland. There was a plot against Duffus in the 10th century as a contemner of the nobility. "A club of witches at Forresse in Murray, did, by wasting his image in wax, so waste and torment him with continual pain and sweating, that he pin'd daily, and no remedy could be found till the witchcraft was discovered, the image broke and the witches punished."

It was believed that protestant sorcerers, wishing to bring about the death of Charles IX. of France, who, after St. Bartholomew's day, saw bloody crows and other horrid visions, killed him by means of waxen dolls made in his image. In like manner, the Duchess of Gloucester, Roger Bolingbroke and Margerey Jourdain were accused of putting a wax image of Henry VI. over a slow fire, and for this the duchess was imprisoned, the conjuror Bolingbroke hanged, and the witch Jourdain, or as some call her, Gardemain, was burned alive.

Then there was Enguerrand de Marigny of a noble Normand family, prime minister under Philippe-le-Bel and minister under Louis X. His wife Alix de Mons, and his sister, the Dame de Cantelen, were accused of having employed magical means to slay Louis, known as Hutin, Charles de Valois and other barons, to effect the escape of Marigny, who had been thrown into prison. The women were charged with seeking the cerer, who, jailed in consequence, killed himself in his cell. Marigny's wife and sister swore that De Marigny had hired Dulot to mould wax images of the King, then to run pins through them while magical incantations were recited. The images were shown to the King, and De Marigny, in 1315, was hanged from a gibbet which he himself, as minister, had erected at Montfaucon.

There are two striking instances of the use of this superstition in modern literature. One is Dante Gabriel Rossetti's poem, "Sister Helen," which begins:

"Why did you melt your waxen man,
Sister Helen?
Today is the third since you began."
"The time was long, yet the time ran,
Little Brother."
("O Mother, Mary Mother,
Three days today, between Hell and Heaven)."

The other is the passage in Thomas Hardy's "The Return of the Native," where Susan Nunsuch, wishing to protect her boy from the evil influence of Eustacia Vye, moulded an image from beeswax, put a red ribbon round the neck of the doll and made with ink the semblance of sandal shoes. "To counteract the malign spell which she imagined poor Eustacia to be working, the boy's mother busied herself with a ghastly invention of superstition, calculated to bring powerlessness, atrophy and annihilation on any human being against whom it was directed. It was a practice well known on Egdon at that date, and one that is not quite extinct at the present day." And after she had fashioned this doll, the old woman pierced it with at least 50 pins "of the old long and yellow sort, whose heads were made to come off at their first usage." She then held in the tongs the image of Eustacia over a glowing turf fire, and while it wasted slowly away repeated the Lord's prayer backward.

Did not King James in his "Daemonology" state: "the devil teaches how to make pictures of wax or clay, that by roasting thereof, the persons that they bear the name of may be continually melted or dried away by continual sickness"? Did not Bishop Jewell, in 1558, preaching before the Queen, speak of the increase of this practice? "Your Grace's subjects pine away, even unto the death, their color fadeth, their flesh rotteth, their speech is benumbed, their senses are bereft." Was not a waxen image, with hair like that of the unfortunate Earl of Derby found in his chamber after his death from an odd disease of constant retching? On the other hand, the wife of Marshal d'Ancre was beheaded for a witch, for she enchanted the Queen to dote upon her husband; "and they say the young King's picture was found in her closet, in virgin wax, with one leg melted away." Let us dismiss the fascinating subject with these lines from a sonnet of old Daniel:

The elfe enchanter, when to work his will
And secret wrong on some forspoken wight,
Frames waxe, in forme to represent aright
The poore unwitting wretch he meanes to kill,
And prickes the image, fram'd by magick's skill,
Whereby to vex the partie day and night."

Mr. Loeffler wrote this "Pagan Poem" originally in 1901 for a small combination of instruments and for a chamber concert. He afterward arranged it for two pianos and three trumpets, and in this version it was performed at a private house in Boston. He afterward (in 1905-6) remodelled it, making it much more symphonic in form, for orchestra, with piano, English horn and three trumpets obbligati. He also made [illegible] this version [illegible] form the "Pagan Poem" was played on the 29th of last month at a private house in East Walpole.

It was not the intention of the composer to undertake the necessarily vain task of supplying a literal, interlinear translation of Virgil's verses into tones. The refrain is given to trumpets behind the scenes until the spell brings Daphnis to the door when they give forth on the stage an exultant but wildly conceived fanfare. The first chief theme may be called the theme of evocation, but the other themes are not intended to be typical. They have only musical significance and form material for musical development. Yet the imaginative may find certain pages descriptive of the wolf-hunt suggested by the mention of Moeris the lycanthrope, and also passages at the end that may refer to Hylax barking in the doorway. This extraordinary composition, extraordinary both in imaginative force and in complexity of workmanship, is not merely descriptive, pictorial music. It is a sustained flight of rare fantasy evoked by the thought of Virgil's lines.

The "Pagan Poem," "In memory of Gustave Schirmer," is scored for three flutes (one interchangeable with piccolo) two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, a set of three kettle drums, antique cymbals, tam-tam, harp, piano and strings. Mr. Heinrich Gebhard will be the pianist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS

NEWARK, N.J.

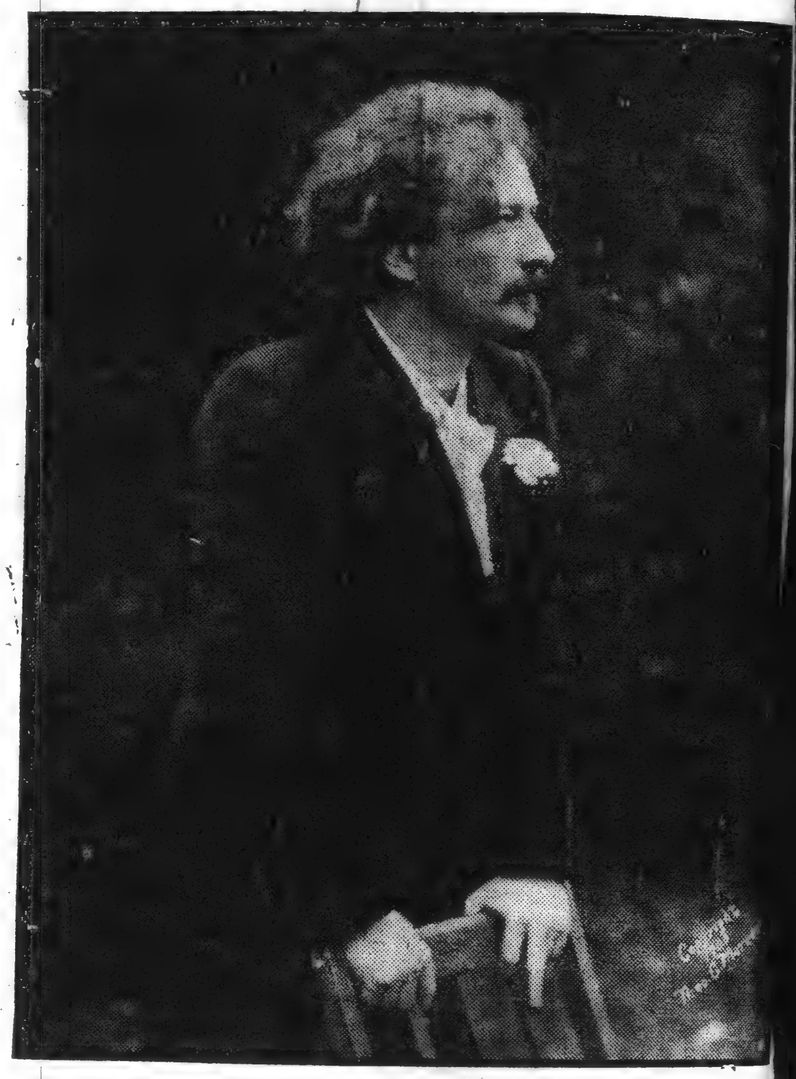
NOV 18 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski

Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager of the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mme Olga Samaroff, pianist, as one of the soloists in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9, and of the recital by Ignace Jan Paderewski, the great Polish pianist, in the same hall Tuesday night, December 17, is receiving many orders for reserved seats from parties in New York, the Oranges, Montclair and other neighboring places. Thus far music-loving Newarkers have been rather slow in showing their interest in these important events. If they wish to secure the more desirable reserved seats they should send their orders so soon as possible to Mr. Sommer at his office, No. 79 Broad street.

NOV 17 1907

IGNACE PADEREWSKI.



The Famous Pianist Will Be Heard at Convention Hall in the Future.

Fresh from his rest of a year at his beautiful estate in Switzerland, more the wizard than ever, Paderewski gives his only Buffalo recital this season at Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night and the indications are that his audience will be limited only by the capacity of the hall.

His concert on Thanksgiving night will be a great musical treat. Ever since his local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announced that she would receive mail orders for his recital, the letters have been pouring in. Such orders will be filled during the coming week and until the opening of the public sale at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store on Monday, Nov. 25.

For the Paderewski recital the first four rows of Convention Hall are $2, the next three rows, $1.50, the rest of the hall, including the balcony, $1.

Orders are also coming in for the January concerts by the New York and Boston Symphony orchestras, both coming here under Mrs. Smith's management this season. The prices for these concerts are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents, but those subscribing for the two at the same time secure both seats for $3 and the $1.50 seats for $2.50, no reductions on the $1 and 75 cent seats.

The New York Symphony orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, plays here on Friday evening, Jan. 3; the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, on Monday evening, Jan. 27.

Mail orders for any or all of these concerts, accompanied by checks payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving Place.

om .....

dress .....

ite .....

PADEREWSKI AGAIN

Paderwiski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor." In accordance with the announcements made at the beginning of the season, the prices of single tickets for this concert

[61]

EXPRESS
om
dress BUFFALO, N. Y.
te NOV 17 1907

LIKE carrying coals to Newcastle seems any attempt at this late day to pay tribute to the art of Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist whose recital at Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night is one of the chief events in a season rich in musical offerings. But in this, his seventh American tour

Paderewski has eclipsed even his own former records. After his New York recital early this month, H. E. Krehbiel said of him in the New York Tribune:

"He has been heard here again and again, yet there is no loss of interest in his playing, for here it is not the virtuoso, not the instrument, nor alone the composer's music that exerts the charm. It is the marvelous and indescribable blending of all the elements described in the words—the perfection of technical execution which must, nowadays, belong to the virtuoso; the tonal charm which wondrous gifts can evoke out of the jangling wire and vibrating wood of the pianoforte; logicalness and emotionality, and sensuous beauty in the music itself. Admiration has been expressed in these columns for his splendid variations—kaleidoscopic in color and outlines, rich in display of tonal devices, but loveliest in their sweet and strong artistic sanity."

Since Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, Mr. Paderewski's local manager, first announced that she would fill mail orders for the Paderewski recital, they have been pouring in. She will continue to honor such orders until the opening of the public sale on Monday, November 25th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. The first four rows of Convention Hall for this recital will be $2, the next 33 rows, $1.50, the rest of the house, including the balcony, $1.

Mrs. Smith is also receiving mail orders for the two splendid orchestra concerts to be given here in January under her management, Walter Damrosch with the New York Symphony on Friday evening, January 3d; Dr. Karl Muck with the Boston Symphony, on Monday evening, January 27th.

The prices of seats for these orchestra concerts are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those buying for both orchestras at the same time will get the $2 seats for the two at $3 and the $1.50 seats for $2.50. There will be no reductions on the $1 and 75 cent seats.

Mail orders for any or all of these concerts, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place.

NEW YORK
First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COURIER
BUFFALO, N
NOV 17 1907

One of the few great artists of his time is Ignace Jan Paderewski, the world-famous pianist, whose coming to Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night is the leading musical event of the season. A recent writer has well said of him: "It is difficult to know whether to put first the art of the personality of Paderewski, but happily, one need not consider them apart. It is scarcely possible to be conscious of the one without the other, for Paderewski is one of Nature's harmonies."

His is a magnetism which compels all the veriest cynic cannot resist him as an artist and the announcement of his coming evokes a witchery of echoes and impressions in the minds of all who have been his listeners, while those who have never hear him are awainting his coming to hail him master, for master he is, the king of the keyboard, the pianist without a peer.

From the day that she made known she would receive mail orders, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, Mr. Paderewski's local manager, has been getting letters by the score, reserving seats for the great Polish artist's one appearance in Buffalo this season. She will continue to fill such orders until the opening of the general sale, on Monday, November 25th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

For Paderewski the first four rows, of Convention Hall will be sold for $2, the next 33 rows for $1.50, the rest of the hall, including the balcony, for $1.

Mrs. Smith is also receivnig mail orders for the two January concerts by the New York and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. The New York men, under the magnetic baton of Walter Damrosch, will play at Convention Hall on Friday evening, January 3d; the Boston organization, headed by its celebrated conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, giving a concert here on Monday evening, January 27th.

Singly, the prices of these concerts will be $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those subscribing for both concerts at once, secure a reduction, getting both $2 seats for $3 and both $1.50 seats for $2.50, with no reduction on the $1 and 75 cent seats.

Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TIMES om Illustrated
dress BUFFALO, N. Y.
te NOV 17 1907

As great as Paderewski is the highest claim made for the modern pianist but to Buffalo on Thanksgiving night comes Paderewski himself, the king of the keyboard, the man by whom all other artists are measured and judged. This is Paderewski's seventh tour of America and so far he has broken his own records in the matter of receipts and enthusiasm, an indication that when he comes to Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night he will play to a capacity house. There is something compelling about the man. He is a wizard, swaying all who meet him to his mood, making even the unmusical respond to the magic of his art. He is the artist of the people, for he reaches them all. Ever since Mr. Paderewski's local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announced that she would fill mail orders for seats in advance of the general sale, the orders have been coming in. She will continue to fill them until Monday, November 25th, when the public sale begis at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store. For Paderewski the prices at Convention Hall will be $2 for the first four rows, $1.50 for the next 33 rows and the rest of the hall at $1, including the balcony. Mrs. Smith is also receiving many mail orders for the concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conductor, on Friday evening, January 3d, and for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, on Monday evening, January 27th. The prices for either orchestra alone are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those subscribing for the two get both $2 seats for $3, the $1.50 seats for $2.50, no reduction on either the $1 or the 75 cent seats. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

110-112 West 26th St., N. Y. City.
CABLE ADDRESS, "OMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World EMPIRE
om PROVIDENCE, R. I.
ddress
ate NOV 18 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its first concert of the season here next Tuesday evening at 8:15 under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

Madame Olga Samaroff is the soloist, and undoubtedly will be warmly welcomed, having made many friends here during her former appearances.

The chief feature of the program will be D'Indy's symphonic trilogy entitled "Wallenstein." The composer has drawn his inspiration from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," the "Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The work is in three movements, and the first and last bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." It was written in 1873-74.

The other work on the program will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

k, 1884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
om PHILADELPHIA, PA.
dress
ate NOV 19 1907

NEW YORK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Damrosch Opens Series of Concerts at Academy of Music.

Last night Mr. Walter Damrosch gave the first of his course of concerts at the Academy of Music, for which his afternoon lecture had prepared the way. Regarding the achievements of the New York Symphony Orchestra, it would be quite in keeping with the example set by certain of the New York papers in their treatment of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra to be captious and carping or sarcastic and scornful, or else to ignore it altogether. But Philadelphia is not vindictive, and while New York delights in calling her provincial, that particular phase of provincialism that affects to despise the efforts of her neighbors is more characteristic of Gotham herself, and can well be left to the great and glorious journals of the great and glorious metropolis, while our columns can show courtesy and justice to guests from out of town.

Courtesy requires the recognition of a very fine body of stringed instruments which does splendid work in the New York Symphony Orchestra, also a strong choir of wood wind, well controlled. Justice compels the statement that the brasses are uneven and at times rough and ragged. The orchestra as a whole has nowhere nearly the unity of our organization, while as to the Bostonians, it is not a circumstance to them, as far as finish goes. Either our musical standards have been raised till we are much more keenly sensitive than of yore, or else the Damrosch Orchestra, as it is familiarly called, has fallen off, a result possibly due to playing summer parks, where a strong effect pleasing to the masses is more to be sought than artistic perfection of detail. Last night's programme was more of the popular than strictly classical order and while well enough in itself just as an al fresco overture, was hardly dignified or impressive enough for a true symphony concert. The opening number was the Lohengrin overture and, of course, it goes without saying that when Walter Damrosch led that was sure to be well played. Following that came Dvorak's New World symphony, which, while always interesting, has been much better given here both by the Boston Orchestra and by our own men. The Misses Sassard then sang a series of five duets by Dvorak—"Echoes from Moravia"—charming little morceaux, and very charmingly sung. The sisters make an attractive pair, one one fair and one dark, and their voices blend delightfully. Indeed, so much alike are they in quality and register it is difficult to tell which is which, save that Miss Virginia is billed as a soprano and Miss Eugenie as a contralto. They are both sweet, fresh and pleasant, but not strong, which is partly constitutional and partly lack of proper training. They could hardly become great, but they could acquire more power if they knew how. In chamber concerts they would be quite delightful, but they need more force for large auditoriums. The accompaniments to the five quaint, little Moravian folk-lore songs wer played on the piano by Mr. Damrosch himself.

Mr. Edward German then appeared, receiving an enthusiastic welcome, to conduct the playing of his "Welsh Rhapsody," a composition of Welsh country airs arranged in sequence and held together by martial interludes, keeping up a kind of quick step between the melodies of folk songs and pleasant dances. It is interesting at times, but rather too long, and comes sadly near being commonplace in spots. After that the Sisters Sassard returned to sing a duet from Delibe's "Lakme," which they gave very successfully, with evn better effect than their first performance. The concert closed with an ordinary seashore band concert kind of a composition by Chabrier, called "Spanish Rhapsody," but too much rhapsody at once is never very satisfactory, and that was an overdose.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
dress
te

James O'Neill Offers Virginius in Providence—A Good Vaudeville Bill at Keith's—Barney Gilmore at the Empire.

(Special to The Dramatic News.)

PROVIDENCE, Nov. 18.—Jas. O'Neill appeared at the Providence Opera House for three nights and a Wednesday matinee in a repertoire of Virginius, Monte Cristo and Julius Cæsar. Much attention has been paid to the staging of the popular classics by the manager, Edgar Forrest, and seldom has ever a star been surrounded with better exponents of the classic drama.

On Friday, November 17, at the Providence Opera House, was given for the first time on any stage Augustus Thomas' new play, The Witching Hour, John Mason in the leading role. A large audience greeted the actor and manifested to the fullest extent its appreciation at the close of each act.

Heading the bill at Keith's this week will be the Six English Rockers, with Nellie Floride. The act is proving itself to be one of the best singing and dancing acts of the season thus far. Lamberti, the celebrated violinist, in his impersonation of famous composers, is winning the admiration of music lovers. Byron and Langdon are surely mirth-provokers in their laughable absurdity, The Dude Detective. The Swor Brothers are excellent in their black face act. Bobby North, in a Hebrew act, is one of the best fun-makers on the bill. Holden's manikins are greatly pleasing the children, and Wotpert Trio European acrobats are certainly wonderful in their stunts. Others on the bill are Fentell and Carr, in Out Loud Junction; the Mich International Trio, Marie Lawrence, vocalist; Wesson, Walters and Wesson, in a Trip to Washington; Ellen Richards, wire act; The McCarvers, colored comedians, and the Keith motion pictures.

Empire—Barney Gilmore, in Dublin Dan, the Irish Detective, is playing to appreciative audiences.

Westminster—Irwin's Majestics holds the boards.

Imperial—Reilly and Woods, with amateur night each Thursday.

Infantry Hall—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Much, conductor. Olga Samaroff, soloist, gave a delightful concert on Tuesday evening.

M. FISHER WINSOR.

From DRAMATIC MIRROR
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date NOV. 23

NEWARK.

The Rogers Brothers in Panama—Joe Santley—Coming Events.

The Rogers Brothers paid their annual visit to the Newark Theatre 11-16 in Panama, and big houses prevailed. The graceful dancing of Flo and May Hengler and the singing of Miss Stanley were pleasing features of the attraction. 'Way Down East 18-23. Blanche Walsh in The Straight Road 25-30.

Joe Santley in Billy the Kid pleased big audiences at the Columbia Theatre 11-16.

The Rocky Mountain Express was presented at Blaney's 11-16. The principals in the cast include Robert E. O'Connor, Lawrence Williams, Earl Sterling, Jack Hyman, William Lewis, John Hartley, Catherine Challoner, Eva Lewis, Martha Shields, and Lydia Hayman.

The announcement that Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist, will appear as one of the soloists at the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium Dec. 9, will please all music lovers here. GEORGE S. APPLEGATE.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 24, 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the sixth Symphony rehearsal and concert was one of unusual interest. It consisted of Lalo's overture to his opera "Le Roid'ys"; Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for piano and orchestra, which was given its first public performance; adagio and scherzo-finale from symphonic suite for orchestra in T minor by Reznicek, also performed for the first time; and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana." Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part of the "Pagan Poem."

Lalo's overture impresses as being music essentially for the theatre. It is scenic, graphic, full of telling contrasts and climaxes, and the scoring is always quickly effective. It is not, perhaps, of the greatest inherent worth, but many passages that in the concert room appear empty and noisy would probably be legitimate and entirely in place before the curtain rises. There are exciting pages and he must be unimaginative indeed who, knowing the legend of the Isle of Ys, is not thrilled by them. The music of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was suggested by Virgil's eighth eclogue. The sorceress is weaving spells to reclaim her absent lover. There is a refrain at the end of each verse, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home." The lover ultimately returns.

A review of such a work should not properly be written until after many repeated hearings. We can only, in justice to the reader and musician, give an account of the general impressions of a first performance.

Those who look to find the poem translated line by line into tones will be disappointed. Mr. Loeffler has steered clear of definite, literal programme music, of justifying the erroneous conception of many as to the true function of that style of composition. A few characteristic themes are used and developed, but they are the threads which bind together a composition in very free form. The only theme that is at all explicit is one that is given to three trumpets, and it is associated with the thought of the refrain. This motif is heard three times in the course of the composition as first played by the trumpets behind the scenes, and, at the climax, fortissimo on the stage. If one's ears may be trusted it is constructed of successive naked triads, and produces a marvellously remote, intangible poetic impression. Other than this, there is no [illegible] the verses of [illegible] portrayal of the moods evoked by the poem.

Mr. Loeffler, possibly on account of growing acquaintance with his works, appears to write in a very lucid style in this his latest orchestral composition. He often compasses the unexpected, but seldom the illogical. One follows with confidence in the path of the composer and rarely loses the thread of the narrative.

It is hardly the human enchantress of Virgil's Pastoral that we here deal with. It is not so much Loeffler imbued with Virgil as it is a mood, latent in the composer, that has been aroused by the eclogue. In the opening pages there is a hint of sensuousness, of passion, but the passion, which waxes hot, is cerebral; and as the piece proceeds, it is as if the composer discarded his first thoughts, yielded himself more and more fully to the impulses of a fitful, tense imagination.

Of the distinction and originality of Mr. Loeffler's style, which, though strongly influenced by his French contemporaries, is essentially and entirely his own; and of his supreme mastery of instrumentation, it is hardly necessary to speak. The new composition fairly bristles with the most remarkable instrumental devices.

The title, "Symphonic," applied to the two movements of Reznicek's suite is not very applicable. The phrases are short and rarely of a truly symphonic character. The movements, especially the adagio, might better supply incidental music to some scene than stand by themselves in the concert room. The music has fresh, lyric warmth and there is often good orchestral color; the scherzo is pleasing and characteristic in its rhythms, but the work is probably not one of the composer's ripest.

How Chabrier, a prince of good fellows, must have rejoiced in his "Espana"! Such riotous color and such exuberant rhythm, orchestration as unique as it is unsurpassable, and the fascinating flavor of the themes themselves—it is a pity that there is not more such music. The performance, wherein Dr. Muck took his tempi somewhat differently than last year, was superb and brought a spirited ending to the concert.

The Globe
AND Commercial Advertiser.
NEW YORK'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER.
Date
Est 84.
NEW YORK
NOV 23

The programmes are announced for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Beethoven's piano concerto in E flat major ("Emperor"), and Brahms's second symphony make the programme; on Saturday, Ernest Boehe's tone poem "Taormina" (new), an adagio and scherzo, finale by Reznicek (new), Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor, and Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody "España." The soloist at both concerts will be Mr. Paderewski.

Heinrich Gebhard, the talented pianist, had the distinction of playing at its first production the piano part of Charles Martin Loeffler's new "Pagan Poem," for piano and orchestra, yesterday and today with the Boston symphony orchestra in Boston. He will play this work in New York.

[62]

EXPRESS
om
dress BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 17 1907
te

Like carrying coals to Newcastle seems any attempt at this late day to pay tribute to the art of Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist whose recital at Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night is one of the chief events in a season rich in musical offerings. But in this, his seventh American tour, Paderewski has eclipsed even his own former records. After his New York recital early this month, H. E. Krehbiel said of him in the New York Tribune:

"He has been heard here again and again, yet there is no loss of interest in his playing, for here it is not the virtuoso, not the instrument, nor alone the composer's music that exerts the charm. It is the marvelous and indescribable blending of all the elements described in the words—the perfection of technical execution which must, nowadays, belong to the virtuoso; the tonal charm which wondrous gifts can evoke out of the jangling wire and vibrating wood of the pianoforte; logicalness and emotionality, and sensuous beauty in the music itself. Admiration has been expressed in these columns for his splendid variations—kaleidoscopic in color and outlines, rich in display of tonal devices, but loveliest in their sweet and strong artistic sanity."

Since Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, Mr. Paderewski's local manager, first announced that she would fill mail orders for the Paderewski recital, they have been pouring in. She will continue to honor such orders until the opening of the public sale, on Monday, November 25th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store. The first four rows of Convention Hall for this recital will be $2, the next 33 rows, $1.50, the rest of the house, including the balcony, $1.

Mrs. Smith is also receiving mail orders for the two splendid orchestra concerts to be given here in January under her management, Walter Damrosch with the New York Symphony on Friday evening, January 3d; Dr. Karl Muck, with the Boston Symphony, on Monday evening, January 27th.

The prices of seats for these orchestra concerts are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those buying for both orchestras at the same time will get the $2 seats for the two at $3 and the $1.50 seats for $2.50. There will be no reductions on the $1 and 75 cent seats.

Mail orders for any or all of these concerts, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place.

NEW YORK
First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
COURIER
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 17 1907

One of the few great artists of his time is Ignace Jan Paderewski, the world-famous pianist, whose coming to Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night is the leading musical event of the season. A recent writer has well said of him: "It is difficult to know whether to put first the art of the personality of Paderewski, but happily, one need not consider them apart. It is scarcely possible to be conscious of the one without the other, for Paderewski is one of Nature's harmonies."

His is a magnetism which compels all the veriest cynic cannot resist him as an artist and the announcement of his coming evokes a witchery of echoes and impressions in the minds of all who have been his listeners, while those who have never hear him are awainting his coming to hail him master, for master he is, the king of the keyboard, the pianist without a peer.

From the day that she made known she would receive mail orders, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, Mr. Paderewski's local manager, has been getting letters by the score, reserving seats for the great Polish artist's one appearance in Buffalo this season. She will continue to fill such orders until the opening of the general sale, on Monday, November 25th, at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels music store.

For Paderewski the first four rows of Convention Hall will be sold for $2, the next 33 rows for $1.50, the rest of the hall, including the balcony, for $1.

Mrs. Smith is also receivnig mail orders for the two January concerts by the New York and the Boston Symphony Orchestras. The New York men, under the magnetic baton of Walter Damrosch, will play at Convention Hall on Friday evening, January 3d; the Boston organization, headed by its celebrated conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, giving a concert here on Monday evening, January 27th.

Singly, the prices of these concerts will be $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those subscribing for both concerts at once, secure a reduction, getting both $2 seats for $3 and both $1.50 seats for $2.50, with no reduction on the $1 and 75 cent seats.

Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
dress BUFFALO, N. Y.
NOV 17 1907
te

As great as Paderewski is the highest claim made for the modern pianist but to Buffalo on Thanksgiving night comes Paderewski himself, the king of the keyboard, the man by whom all other artists are measured and judged. This is Paderewski's seventh tour of America and so far he has broken his own records in the matter of receipts, and enthusiasm, an indication that when he comes to Convention Hall on Thanksgiving night he wil play to a capacity house. There is something compelling about the man. He is a wizard, swaying all who meet him to his mood, making even the unmusical respond to the magic of his art. He is the artist of the people, for he reaches them all. Ever since Mr. Paderewski's local manager, Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, announced that she would fill mail orders for seats in advance of the general sale, the orders have been coming in. She will continue to fill them until Monday, November 25th, when the public sale begis at the Denton, Cottier & Daniels' music store. For Paderewski the prices at Convention Hall will be $2 for the first four rows, $1.50 for the next 33 rows and the rest of the hall at $1, including the balcony. Mrs. Smith is also receiving many mail orders for the concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conductor, on Friday evening, January 3d, and for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, on Monday evening, January 27th. The prices for either orchestra alone are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those subscribing for the two get both $2 seats for $3, the $1.50 seats for $2.50, no reduction on either the $1 or the 75 cent seats. Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

110-112 West 26th St. N. Y. City.
CABLE ADDRESS, OMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World.
om
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
ddress
ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its first concert of the season here next Tuesday evening at 8:15 under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck.

Madame Olga Samaroff is the soloist, and undoubtedly will be warmly welcomed, having made many friends here during her former appearances.

The chief feature of the program will be D'Indy's symphonic trilogy entitled "Wallenstein." The composer has drawn his inspiration from Schiller's trilogy of dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," the "Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The work is in three movements, and the first and last bear the same titles as the corresponding dramas. The second movement, which was originally entitled "I Piccolomini," is now called "Max and Thekla." It was written in 1873-74.

The other work on the program will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
om
dress PHILADELPHIA, PA
ddress
ate NOV 19 1907

NEW YORK SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Damrosch Opens Series of Concerts at Academy of Music.

Last night Mr. Walter Damrosch gave the first of his course of concerts at the Academy of Music, for which his afternoon lecture had prepared the way. Regarding the achievements of the New York Symphony Orchestra, it would be quite in keeping with the example set by certain of the New York papers in their treatment of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra to be captious and carping or sarcastic and scornful, or else to ignore it altogether. But Philadelphia is not vindictive, and while New York delights in calling her provincial, that particular phase of provincialism that affects to despise the efforts of her neighbors is more characteristic of Gotham herself, and can well be left to the great and glorious journals of the great and glorious metropolis, while our columns can show courtesy and justice to guests from out of town.

Courtesy requires the recognition of a very fine body of stringed instruments which does splendid work in the New York Symphony Orchestra, also a strong choir of wood wind, well controlled. Justice compels the statement that the brasses are uneven and at times rough and ragged. The orchestra as a whole has nowhere nearly the unity of our organization, while as to the Bostonians, it is not a circumstance to them, as far as finish goes. Either our musical standards have been raised till we are much more keenly sensitive than of yore, or else the Damrosch Orchestra, as it is familiarly called, has fallen off, a result possibly due to playing summer parks, where a strong effect pleasing to the masses is more to be sought than artistic perfection of detail. Last night's programme was more of the popular than strictly classical order, and while well enough inj itself just as an al fresco overture, was hardly dignified or impressive enough for a true symphony concert. The opening number was the Lohengrin overture, and, of course, it goes without saying that when Walter Damrosch led that was sure to be well played. Following that came Dvorak's New World symphony, which, while always interesting, has been much better given here both by the Boston Orchestra and by our own men. The Misses Sassard then sang a series of five duets by Dvorak—"Echoes from Moravia"—charming little morceaux, and very charmingly sung. The sisters make an attractive pair, one one fair and one dark, and their voices blend delightfully. Indeed, so much alike are they in quality and register it is difficult to tell which is which, save that Miss Virginia is billed as a soprano and Miss Eugenie as a contralto. They are both sweet, fresh and pleasant, but not strong, which is partly constitutional and partly lack of proper training. They could hardly become great, but they could acquire more power if they knew how. In chamber concerts they would be quite delightful, but they need more force for large auditoriums. The accompaniments to the five quaint, little Moravian folk-lore songs wer played on the piano by Mr. Damrosch himself.

Mr. Edward German then appeared, receiving an enthusiastic welcome, to conduct the playing of his "Welsh Rhapsody," a composition of Welsh country airs arranged in sequence and held together by martial interludes, keeping up a kind of quick step between the melodies of folk songs and pleasant dances. It is interesting at times, but rather too long, and comes sadly near being commonplace in spots. After that the Sisters Sassard returned to sing a duet from Delibe's "Lakme," which they gave very successfully, with evn better effect than their first performance. The concert closed with an ordinary seashore band concert kind of a composition by Chabrier, called "Spanish Rhapsody," but too much rhapsody at once is never very satisfactory, and that was an overdose.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
ress
e

James O'Neill Offers Virginius in Providence—A Good Vaudeville Bill at Keith's—Barney Gilmore at the Empire.

(Special to The Dramatic News.)

PROVIDENCE, Nov. 18.—Jas. O'Neill appeared at the Providence Opera House for three nights and a Wednesday matinee in a repertoire of Virginius, Monte Cristo and Julius Cæsar. Much attention has been paid to the staging of the popular classics by the manager, Edgar Forrest, and seldom has ever a star been surrounded with better exponents of the classic drama.

On Friday, November 17, at the Providence Opera House, was given for the first time on any stage Augustus Thomas' new play, The Witching Hour, John Mason in the leading role. A large audience greeted the actor and manifested to the fullest extent its appreciation at the close of each act.

Heading the bill at Keith's this week will be the Six English Rockers, with Nellie Floride. The act is proving itself to be one of the best singing and dancing acts of the season thus far. Lamberti, the celebrated violinist, in his impersonation of famous composers, is winning the admiration of music lovers. Byron and Langdon are surely mirth-provokers in their laughable absurdity, The Dude Detective. The Swor Brothers are excellent in their black face act. Bobby North, in a Hebrew act, is one of the best funmakers on the bill. Holden's manikins are greatly pleasing the children, and Wotpert Trio European acrobats are certainly wonderful in their stunts. Others on the bill are Fentell and Carr, in Out Loud Junction; the Mich International Trio, Marie Lawrence, vocalist; Wesson, Walters and Wesson, in a Trip to Washington; Ellen Richards, wire act; The McCarvers, colored comedians, and the Keith motion pictures.

Empire—Barney Gilmore, in Dublin Dan, the Irish Detective, is playing to appreciative audiences.

Westminster—Irwin's Majestics holds the boards.

Imperial—Reilly and Woods, with amateur night each Thursday.

Infantry Hall—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Much, conductor. Olga Samaroff, soloist, gave a delightful concert on Tuesday evening.

M. FISHER WINSOR.

From
Address
Date

NEWARK.

The Rogers Brothers in Panama—Joe Santley—Coming Events.

The Rogers Brothers paid their annual visit to the Newark Theatre 11-16 in Panama, and big houses prevailed. The graceful dancing of Flo and May Hengler and the singing of Miss Stanley were pleasing features of the attraction. 'Way Down East 18-23. Blanche Walsh in The Straight Road 25-30.

Joe Santley in Billy the Kid pleased big audiences at the Columbia Theatre 11-16.

The Rocky Mountain Express was presented at Blaney's 11-16. The principals in the cast include Robert E. O'Connor, Lawrence Williams, Earl Sterling, Jack Hyman, William Lewis, John Hartley, Catherine Challoner, Eva Lewis, Martha Shields, and Lydia Hayman.

The announcement that Madame Olga Samaroff, the pianist, will appear as one of the soloists at the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium Dec. 9, will please all music lovers here. GEORGE S. APPLEGATE.

The Globe
AND Commercial Advertiser.
NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER
Date
Est 84.

The programmes are announced for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Beethoven's piano concerto in E flat major ("Emperor"), and Brahms's second symphony make the programme; on Saturday, Ernest Boehe's tone poem "Taormina" (new), an adagio and scherzo finale by Reznicek (new), Rubinstein's piano concerto in D minor, and Chabrier's orchestral rhapsody "España." The soloist at both concerts will be Mr. Paderewski.

NEW YORK
NOV 23 1907

Heinrich Gebhard, the talented pianist, had the distinction of playing at its first production the piano part of Charles Martin Loeffler's new "Pagan Poem," for piano and orchestra, yesterday and today with the Boston symphony orchestra in Boston. He will play this work in New York.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 24, 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the sixth Symphony rehearsal and concert was one of unusual interest. It consisted of Lalo's overture to his opera "Le Roid'ys"; Charles M. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," for piano and orchestra, which was given its first public performance; adagio and scherzo-finale from symphonic suite for orchestra in T minor by Reznicek, also performed for the first time; and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana." Mr. Heinrich Gebhard played the piano part of the "Pagan Poem."

Lalo's overture impresses as being music essentially for the theatre. It is scenic, graphic, full of telling contrasts and climaxes, and the scoring is always quickly effective. It is not, perhaps, of the greatest inherent worth, but many passages that in the concert room appear empty and noisy would probably be legitimate and entirely in place before the curtain rises. There are exciting pages and he must be unimaginative indeed who, knowing the legend of the Isle of Ys, is not thrilled by them. The music of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was suggested by Virgil's eighth eclogue. The sorceress is weaving spells to reclaim her absent lover. There is a refrain at the end of each verse, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home." The lover ultimately returns.

A review of such a work should not properly be written until after many repeated hearings. We can only, in justice to the reader and musician, give an account of the general impressions of a first performance.

Those who look to find the poem translated line by line into tones will be disappointed. Mr. Loeffler has steered clear of definite, literal programme music, of justifying the erroneous conception of many as to the true function of that style of composition. A few characteristic themes are used and developed, but they are the threads which bind together a composition in very free form. The only theme that is at all explicit is one that is given to three trumpets, and it is associated with the thought of the refrain. This motif is heard three times in the course of the composition as first played by the trumpets behind the scenes, and, at the climax, fortissimo on the stage. If one's ears may be trusted it is constructed of successive naked triads, and produces a marvellously remote, intangible poetic impression. Other than this, there is no attempt to closely follow the verses of the poem, but rather a general portrayal of the moods evoked by the poem.

Mr. Loeffler, possibly on account of growing acquaintance with his works, appears to write in a very lucid style in this his latest orchestral composition. He often compasses the unexpected, but seldom the illogical. One follows with confidence in the path of the composer and rarely loses the thread of the narrative.

It is hardly the human enchantress of Virgil's Pastoral that we here deal with. It is not so much Loeffler imbued with Virgil as it is a mood, latent in the composer, that has been aroused by the eclogue. In the opening pages there is a hint of sensuousness, of passion, but the passion, which waxes hot, is cerebral; and as the piece proceeds, it is as if the composer discarded his first thoughts, yielded himself more and more fully to the impulses of a fitful, tense imagination.

Of the distinction and originality of Mr. Loeffler's style, which, though strongly influenced by his French contemporaries, is essentially and entirely his own; and of his supreme mastery of instrumentation, it is hardly necessary to speak. The new composition fairly bristles with the most remarkable instrumental devices.

The title, "Symphonic," applied to the two movements of Reznicek's suite is not very applicable. The phrases are short and rarely of a truly symphonic character. The movements, especially the adagio, might better supply incidental music to some scene than stand by themselves in the concert room. The music has fresh, lyric warmth and there is often good orchestral color; the scherzo is pleasing and characteristic in its rhythms, but the work is probably not one of the composer's ripest.

How Chabrier, a prince of good fellows, must have rejoiced in his "Espana"! Such riotous color and such exuberant rhythm, orchestration as unique as it is unsurpassable, and the fascinating flavor of the themes themselves—it is a pity that there is not more such music. The performance, wherein Dr. Muck took his tempi somewhat differently than last year, was superb and brought a spirited ending to the concert.

[62]

HARPER'S
NEW YORK CITY

MUSIC AND THE OPERA

AN EXTRAORDINARY SYMPHONY

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IT is a rather singular fact, the explanation of which need not now be pondered, that New York concert audiences of the best class are astonishingly unresponsive to music which deviates in a marked degree from familiar and well-explored paths. To call this tendency "conservatism" would be to dignify it quite beyond its deserts. A judicial and meditative attitude toward novel manifestations of any creative art is no doubt an excellent thing; but it is admirable only when it goes hand in hand with a quick and sensitive perception of excellence, even when that excellence discloses itself through new forms and according to strange and unwonted patterns. I have before permitted myself the satisfaction of quoting upon this page a memorable passage from one of Mr. Henry James's earlier essays, in which, while ostensibly addressing those who are concerned in the practice of criticism, he condenses in a paragraph all that the finest wisdom can teach a public regarding its attitude toward creative art. The ideal spectator, no less than the critic, says Mr. James, must unwearyingly seek "to lend himself, to project and steep himself, to feel and feel till he understands; . . . to have perception at the pitch of passion . . . to be infinitely curious and incorrigibly patient, and yet plastic and inflammable and determinable. . . . He knows that the whole honor of the matter, for him, besides the success in his own eyes, depends upon his being indefatigably supple, and that is a formidable order." Formidable indeed! It is an admonition which one would have printed in all concert programmes, quoted as a preface to all books of new and curious trend, displayed at the entrances to all art galleries. One will be reminded, perhaps, that Mr. James was addressing the ideal critic and spectator. Quite true; but surely we can all aspire, even endeavor, to attain to such a condition. One's quarrel with the representative audiences of a city which hears virtually everything in music that is worth hearing is that they do not, apparently, seek to achieve any lovelier attitude toward unfamiliar artistic manifestations than one which, either expressly or in spirit, is steadfastly and incurably hostile. It is difficult to recall, for example, a single important orchestral score of new and adventurous character which has been set before the musical public of New York within recent years (to confine ourself to the more or less immediate present) without evoking antagonism, derision, or contempt. Doubtless there have been cases that would seem to disprove my contention: but the attitude which we are considering is unmistakably characteristic and typical. It was only last spring that we were exercising our wit and our fancy upon that superbly imaginative piece of tone-painting, Debussy's La Mer, while a year before we had similarly honored an eminent visitor, M. Vincent d'Indy, who chose to give us an opportunity of hearing certain of his extremely original and impressive works. Now it is Anton Bruckner who has been distinguished by the sort of reception which we reserve for bestowal upon music-makers who are audacious enough to surprise us. Bruckner, to be sure, has been dead for more than a decade: he is by no means a new figure in the world of music; but he is an importunate and a perturbing figure, concerning whom there is no definitely formulated consensus of opinion; therefore we do not welcome his presence in our concert-rooms. We are not willing even to bear with him a second time, that we may verify our impressions.

Mme. Bressler-Gianoli as "Carmen"

THIS REMARKABLE IMPERSONATION IS AGAIN A STRIKING FEATURE OF OPERATIC ACTIVITIES AT THE MANHATTAN

Dr. Karl Muck placed Bruckner's ninth symphony, in D-minor, upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its opening concert of the local season, at Carnegie Hall, on November 7, and it was then heard by an immense and representative audience for the first time in New York. The manner of its reception was such that it would be entirely reasonable for Dr. Muck to confine all his New York programmes in future to works which have already been heard at least half a dozen times—to such predigested musical fare as may be accepted with that unquestioning acquiescence which, it would seem, is the preferred attitude of our audiences. Indeed, one vivacious commentator expresses the pious hope "that Dr. Muck will spare this public further hearings of Bruckner's demonstrations of thematic theorems with corollaries of harmonic coefficients. There is enough beautiful music to provide New York with entertainment less narcotic. Let these learned proclamations," he urges, "be reserved for the academic consideration of the Bostonians."

Senora Maria Gay

THIS SPANISH SINGER, WHOSE "CARMEN" HAS MADE A SENSATION IN EUROPE, IS UNKNOWN TO AMERICA

But these, after all, are secondary matters; let us consider, perforce briefly, the extraordinary work of which Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra gave so splendidly eloquent an account. Bruckner began his ninth symphony in April, 1891; he finished the third movement in October, 1894. Bruckner died October 11, 1896, leaving the symphony incomplete—incomplete, that is, according to the classic standards which require that a symphony shall end with a fourth movement.

This is not the place to write in adequate detail of the career and personality of Anton Bruckner—Bruckner, the most deeply pathetic figure in the history of musical art; the uncouth, unlovely, essentially inarticulate genius, who, like the poet Gray, never, in his human intercourse, "spoke out," yet who saw visions and dreamed dreams as colossal, as grandiose, as unregulated and chaotic, as sublime, as those of William Blake.

It is not unlikely that in his ninth symphony we have this astonishing music-maker at his best—certainly at his most characteristic. Bruckner, always an impassioned propagandist for the genius of Wagner, could not always escape the tornadic influence of the incomparable tone-poet whom he acknowledged as his master; and in the D-minor symphony, as in most of Bruckner's writing, there is page upon page that comes straight from the scores of the author of "Tristan und Isolde." We are reminded of "Die Walküre," the "Faust Overture," "Parsifal," "Tristan": the voice is unmistakably the voice of Wagner. Yet over and above these things, quite in despite of them, one is aware always of another and dominating personality, the personality of Bruckner. His music, at its best, is absolutely his own.

And what music, then, it is! We are reminded of Blake (I have already named him), of Whitman in his supreme moments; of those seers and visionaries who have stood appalled before supernal visions, visions so wonderful, of so overwhelming and awful a beauty, that their beholders can tell of them only in hushed and broken whisperings, yet, as it were by the Infinite Grace, with a solemn and haunted eloquence that conveys something of the marvels that have been perceived. It is this quality in the music of Bruckner—this manifested sense of great and hidden mysteries, of transcendent wonders more than half unveiled—which must eventually, one is convinced, make any criticism of its very obvious faults a duty to be undertaken with reluctance and accomplished with much care and circumspection. These faults are, it has been said, sufficiently apparent. The genius of Bruckner was erratic, spasmodic, uncontrolled; there are arid wastes in his music: he is not always the apocalyptic seer, the inspired prophet. But when he is most absolutely and sincerely himself, he is securely among the mighty ones of art; he seems, then, to have been gifted with the faculty of inner sight, with the exalted emotion of those who, spellbound, are aware of divine and unutterable things; with the isolation of those lonely spirits who discern that which is forever denied to the arrogant, the contemptuous, and the over-wise.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
NOVEMBER 24, 1907

Sixth Symphony Program.

Two novelties were on last week's Symphony program, Charles Martin Loeffler's newly orchestrated "Pagan Poem" and an excerpt from Emil von Reznicek's D minor symphonic suite. The opening number was Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Is," and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody completing the list. Mr Loeffler's work is based upon some verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil and was originally arranged for piano and small orchestra. Subsequently it was rearranged and still later Mr Loeffler elaborated his first scheme, and in its larger form it was given its first performance under Dr Muck's direction at the sixth Symphony rehearsal. Mr Loeffler's musicianly skill has been shown so frequently in such a wide range of compositions that he is always sure of an audience friendly as well as critical.

Although there may be some difference of opinion about his musical treatment of his various ideas there is no question about his great skill in orchestration, originality in material and its development and in imparting his message in an effective manner. Perhaps not readily understood by the majority; but to the expert and serious student Mr Loeffler's latest work must make a strong appeal. In weaving the musical love spell of Virgil's heroine Mr Loeffler offers a fantasy and not a literal illustration of the verses. The appeal of Simaetha to regain the love of Delphis is made the chief theme, and this, with the lesser motifs, intermittent, is manipulated in the instrumentation in many and strange forms and modulations.

A skilful use is made of the invisible trumpets in giving out the music of the sorceress, and through all the piece the piano is used as a portion of the orchestra and not as a solo instrument. Mr Heinrich Gebhard, who played the long piano part without using a score, is to be commended for an admirable performance, and notably so because of having memorized the composition. The form of the work is so irregular that it is difficult to describe, except in a general way. It is a striking example of utilizing the modern orchestra for suggesting tone pictures at once mystical and passionate, and in these respects Mr Loeffler has again displayed his fine abilities as one of the foremost of our young composers who disdains the trivial in music. A sympathetic interpretation was in order by Mr Loeffler's old associates, and at the close of the poem Mr Gebhard and Mr Loeffler were vehemently applauded and the author bowed his acknowledments from his seat in the hall.

The adagio and scherzo by Reznicek contains some delightful contrasted motifs in the first part for the cellos, soft and flowing, followed by the violins and woodwinds in strenuous unity. The elaboration of material is in excellent style and in the scherzo there is considerable ingenuity shown in some rhythms which have a peculiar swing. The excerpts are pleasing and they were played smoothly, although the weather conditions bothered the lighter string choirs frequently during the whole program.

Lalo's overture was given with all needed vigor and solemnity, and as this and the two following numbers were in the vein that supplies musical food for thought the merry rhapsody, "Espana," with its brilliant, jingling and vivacious dance measures, seemed to go with unusual dash and verve. 'Twas played charmingly and came as a pleasing contrast to the more decorous and substantial compositions.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist this week, will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espanole," for violin. Ernest Boehe's tone poem, "Taormina," will be given for the first time here, and the program will close with Beethoven's second symphony.

Nov. 16, Newark News

The Boston Symphony.

To lovers of orchestral music the most important and interesting event marking the local musical season this year will be the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9. Even in New York, where all forms of the best musical entertainment crowd the season, the concerts by the great orchestra from the Hub rank among the most delectable of artistic offerings and attract audiences limited only by the size of the big Carnegie Hall. In Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the few other cities included in the orchestra's annual tours, its appearances are greeted by such gatherings of music lovers as assemble when a star of the first magnitude in the musical firmament invites attention. The coming concert will be the occasion of the orchestra's first visit to Newark, and if the attendance is such as it should be this community is likely again to hear it.

No orchestra comparable in size and quality to the Boston organization ever has appeared here. The ninety-seven musicians comprising it, each one of whom is an artist, will assist in the concert, which will be on the same scale of magnitude and worth as are those given by them in New York and Boston. Its superiority to all other orchestras in the country is due to the fact that it is not a co-operative institution and that its members are obliged by the terms of their contracts with the organizer to devote all their time during the regular season to rehearsals and public performances. Since it was founded by Colonel Higginson, of Boston, whose wealth enabled him to command the services of the best orchestral players and conductors in the world and to maintain it until its exceptional worth was recognized and it became a profitable investment, the independent policy that enabled it to attain a foremost position among orchestral bodies in America has been adhered to. Up to a year ago it had such conductors as William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Georg Henschel and Emil Paur. A twelvemonth ago Dr. Karl Muck, one of the great living conductors, was imported from Berlin to succeed Mr. Gericke and has proven to be a worthy successor.

In order to make the concert here as interesting as possible, the management has engaged Mme. Olga Samaroff, an admirable pianist, as one of the two soloists, the other being the first violinist in the band. Mme. Samaroff has played frequently with the more prominent orchestras in the country, and with them and in the many recitals she has given since her American debut, about [illegible] given herself to

NEW YORK MAIL
NOV 23 1907
[illegible] will be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, December 5 and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat [illegible] "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms' second in D major, op 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva."
On Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will present two novelties, the first a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by Ernest [illegible], whose "Ulysses's Departure and [illegible]" was played in Boston in M[illegible] last year with great success [illegible]

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 17 1907
Paderewski With Orchestra.
Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor." In accordance with the announcements made [illegible] beginning of the season the prices [illegible] for this concert will [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
New York Times
NOV 23 1907
Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, Dec. 5, he will play Beethoven's E flat major concerto, and on Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, he will play Rubinstein's [illegible]
63

NEW YORK CITY
NOV 24 1907

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
NOVEMBER 24, 1907.

MUSIC AND THE OPERA

AN EXTRAORDINARY SYMPHONY

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

IT is a rather singular fact, the explanation of which need not now be pondered, that New York concert audiences of the best class are astonishingly unresponsive to music which deviates in a marked degree from familiar and well-explored paths. To call this tendency "conservatism" would be to dignify it quite beyond its deserts. A judicial and meditative attitude toward novel manifestations of any creative art is no doubt an excellent thing; but it is admirable only when it goes hand in hand with a quick and sensitive perception of excellence, even when that excellence discloses itself through new forms and according to strange and unwonted patterns. I have before permitted myself the satisfaction of quoting upon this page a memorable passage from one of Mr. Henry James's earlier essays, in which, while ostensibly addressing those who are concerned in the practice of criticism, he condenses in a paragraph all that the finest wisdom can teach a public regarding its attitude toward creative art. The ideal spectator, no less than the critic, says Mr. James, must unwearyingly seek "to lend himself, to project and steep himself, to feel and feel till he understands; . . . to have perception at the pitch of passion . . . to be infinitely curious and incorrigibly patient, and yet plastic and inflammable and determinable. . . . He knows that the whole honor of the matter, for him, besides the success in his own eyes, depends upon his being indefatigably supple, and that is a formidable order." Formidable indeed! It is an admonition which one would have printed in all concert programmes, quoted as a preface to all books of new and curious trend, displayed at the entrances to all art galleries. One will be reminded, perhaps, that Mr. James was addressing the ideal critic and spectator. Quite true; but surely we can all aspire, even endeavor, to attain to such a condition. One's quarrel with the representative audiences of a city which hears virtually everything in music that is worth hearing is that they do not, apparently, seek to achieve any lovelier attitude toward unfamiliar artistic manifestations than one which, either expressly or in spirit, is steadfastly and incurably hostile. It is difficult to recall, for example, a single important orchestral score of new and adventurous character which has been set before the musical public of New York within recent years (to confine ourself to the more or less immediate present) without evoking antagonism, derision, or contempt. Doubtless there have been cases that would seem to disprove my contention; but the attitude which we are considering is unmistakably characteristic and typical. It was only last spring that we were exercising our wit and our fancy upon that superbly imaginative piece of tone-painting, Debussy's La Mer, while a year before we had similarly honored an eminent visitor, M. Vincent d'Indy, who chose to give us an opportunity of hearing certain of his extremely original and impressive works. Now it is Anton Bruckner who has been distinguished by the sort of reception which we reserve for bestowal upon music-makers who are audacious enough to surprise us. Bruckner, to be sure, has been dead for more than a decade; he is by no means a new figure in the world of music; but he is an importunate and a perturbing figure, concerning whom there is no definitely formulated consensus of opinion; therefore we do not welcome his presence in our concert-rooms. We are not willing even to bear with him a second time, that we may verify our impressions.

Mme. Bressler-Gianoli as "Carmen"

THIS REMARKABLE IMPERSONATION IS AGAIN A STRIKING FEATURE OF OPERATIC ACTIVITIES AT THE MANHATTAN

Dr. Karl Muck placed Bruckner's ninth symphony, in D-minor, upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its opening concert of the local season, at Carnegie Hall, on November 7, and it was then heard by an immense and representative audience for the first time in New York. The manner of its reception was such that it would be entirely reasonable for Dr. Muck to confine all his New York programmes in future to works which have already been heard at least half a dozen times—to such predigested musical fare as may be accepted with that unquestioning acquiescence which, it would seem, is the preferred attitude of our audiences.

Indeed, one vivacious commentator expresses the pious hope "that Dr. Muck will spare this public further hearings of Bruckner's demonstrations of thematic theorems with corollaries of harmonic coefficients. There is enough beautiful music to provide New York with entertainment less narcotic. Let these learned proclamations," he urges, "be reserved for the academic consideration of the Bostonians."

Senora Maria Gay

THIS SPANISH SINGER, WHOSE "CARMEN" HAS MADE A SENSATION IN EUROPE, IS UNKNOWN TO AMERICA

But these, after all, are secondary matters; let us consider, perforce briefly, the extraordinary work of which Dr. Muck and the Boston orchestra gave so splendidly eloquent an account. Bruckner began his ninth symphony in April, 1891; he finished the third movement in October, 1894. Bruckner died October 11, 1896, leaving the symphony incomplete—incomplete, that is, according to the classic standards which require that a symphony shall end with a fourth movement.

This is not the place to write in adequate detail of the career and personality of Anton Bruckner—Bruckner, the most deeply pathetic figure in the history of musical art; the uncouth, unlovely, essentially inarticulate genius, who, like the poet Gray, never, in his human intercourse, "spoke out," yet who saw visions and dreamed dreams as colossal, as grandiose, as unregulated and chaotic, as sublime, as those of William Blake.

It is not unlikely that in his ninth symphony we have this astonishing music-maker at his best—certainly at his most characteristic. Bruckner, always an impassioned propagandist for the genius of Wagner, could not always escape the tornadic influence of the incomparable tone-poet whom he acknowledged as his master; and in the D-minor symphony, as in most of Bruckner's writing, there is page upon page that comes straight from the scores of the author of "Tristan und Isolde." We are reminded of "Die Walküre," the "Faust Overture," "Parsifal," "Tristan": the voice is unmistakably the voice of Wagner. Yet over and above these things, quite in despite of them, one is aware always of another and dominating personality, the personality of Bruckner. His music, at its best, is absolutely his own.

And what music, then, it is! We are reminded of Blake (I have already named him), of Whitman in his supreme moments; of those seers and visionaries who have stood appalled before supernal visions, visions so wonderful, of so overwhelming and awful a beauty, that their beholders can tell of them only in hushed and broken whisperings, yet, as it were by the Infinite Grace, with a solemn and haunted eloquence that conveys something of the marvels that have been perceived. It is this quality in the music of Bruckner—this manifested sense of great and hidden mysteries, of transcendent wonders more than half unveiled—which must eventually, one is convinced, make any criticism of its very obvious faults a duty to be undertaken with reluctance and accomplished with much care and circumspection. These faults are, it has been said, sufficiently apparent. The genius of Bruckner was erratic, spasmodic, uncontrolled; there are arid wastes in his music; he is not always the apocalyptic seer, the inspired prophet. But when he is most absolutely and sincerely himself, he is securely among the mighty ones of art; he seems, then, to have been gifted with the faculty of inner sight, with the exalted emotion of those who, spellbound, are aware of divine and unutterable things; with the isolation of those lonely spirits who discern that which is forever denied to the arrogant, the contemptuous, and the over-wise.

Sixth Symphony Program.

Two novelties were on last week's Symphony program, Charles Martin Loeffler's newly orchestrated "Pagan Poem" and an excerpt from Emil von Reznicek's E minor symphonic suite. The opening number was Lalo's overture to his opera, "The King of Is," and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody completing the list. Mr Loeffler's work is based upon some verses in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil and was originally arranged for piano and small orchestra. Subsequently it was rearranged and still later Mr Loeffler elaborated his first scheme, and in its larger form it was given its first performance under Dr Muck's direction at the sixth Symphony rehearsal. Mr Loeffler's musicianly skill has been shown so frequently in such a wide range of compositions that he is always sure of an audience friendly as well as critical.

Although there may be some difference of opinion about his musical treatment of his various ideas there is no question about his great skill in orchestration, originality in material and its development and in imparting his message in an effective manner. Perhaps not readily understood by the majority; but to the expert and serious student Mr Loeffler's latest work must make a strong appeal. In weaving the musical love spell of Virgil's heroine Mr Loeffler offers a fantasy and not a literal illustration of the verses. The appeal of Simaetha to regain the love of Delphis is made the chief theme, and this, with the lesser motifs, intermittent, is manipulated in the instrumentation in many and strange forms and modulations.

A skilful use is made of the invisible trumpets in giving out the music of the sorceress, and through all the piece the piano is used as a portion of the orchestra and not as a solo instrument. Mr Heinrich Gebhard, who played the long piano part without using a score, is to be commended for an admirable performance, and notably so because of having memorized the composition. The form of the work is so irregular that it is difficult to describe, except in a general way. It is a striking example of utilizing the modern orchestra for suggesting tone pictures at once mystical and passionate, and in these respects Mr Loeffler has again displayed his fine abilities as one of the foremost of our young composers who disdains the trivial in music. A sympathetic interpretation was in order by Mr Loeffler's old associates, and at the close of the poem Mr Gebhard and Mr Loeffler were vehemently applauded and the author bowed his acknowledments from his seat in the hall.

The adagio and scherzo by Reznicek contains some delightful contrasted motifs in the first part for the cellos, soft and flowing, followed by the violins and woodwinds in strenuous unity. The elaboration of material is in excellent style and in the scherzo there is considerable ingenuity shown in some rhythms which have a peculiar swing. The excerpts are pleasing and they were played smoothly, although the weather conditions bothered the lighter string choirs frequently during the whole program.

Lalo's overture was given with all needed vigor and solemnity, and as this and the two following numbers were in the vein that supplies musical food for thought the merry rhapsody, "Espana," with its brilliant, jingling and vivacious dance measures, seemed to go with unusual dash and verve. 'Twas played charmingly and came as a pleasing contrast to the more decorous and substantial compositions.

Fritz Kreisler, the soloist this week, will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espanole," for violin. Ernest Boehe's tone poem, "Taormina," will be given for the first time here, and the program will close with Beethoven's second symphony.

NOV 23 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, December 5 and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms' second in D major, op 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva."

On Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will present two novelties, the first a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best [illegible] of the Opera Co[illegible]

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 17 1907

Paderewski With Orchestra.

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second Philadelphia concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance in Philadelphia with an orchestra, and he plans now to play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor." In accordance with the announcements made at the beginning of the season the prices of single tickets for this concert will be [illegible]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
New York Times
NOV 23 1907

son's company.

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall. On Thursday evening, Dec. 5, he will play Beethoven's E flat major concerto, and on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 7, he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor.

63

Nov. 16, Newark

The Boston Symphony.

To lovers of orchestral music, the most important and interesting event marking the local musical season this year will be the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium, Monday night, December 9. Even in New York, where all forms of the best musical entertainment crowd the season, the concerts by the great orchestra from the Hub rank among the most delectable of artistic offerings' and attract audiences limited only by the size of the big Carnegie Hall. In Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and the few other cities included in the orchestra's annual tours, its appearances are greeted by such gatherings of music lovers as assemble when a star of the first magnitude in the musical firmament invites attention. The coming concert will be the occasion of the orchestra's first visit to Newark, and if the attendance is such as it should be this community is likely again to hear it.

No orchestra comparable in size and quality to the Boston organization ever has appeared here. The ninety-seven musicians comprising it, each one of whom is an artist, will assist in the concert, which will be on the same scale of magnitude and worth as are those given by them in New York and Boston. Its superiority to all other orchestras in the country is due to the fact that it is not a co-operative institution and that its members are obliged by the terms of their contracts with the organizer to devote all their time during the regular season to rehearsals and public performances. Since it was founded by Colonel Higginson, of Boston, whose wealth enabled him to command the services of the best orchestral players and conductors in the world and to maintain it until its exceptional worth was recognized and it became a profitable investment, the independent policy that enabled it to attain a foremost position among orchestral bodies in America has been adhered to. Up to a year ago it had such conductors as William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Georg Henschel and Emil Paur. A twelvemonth ago Dr. Karl Muck, one of the great living conductors, was imported from Berlin to succeed Mr. Gericke and has proven to be a worthy successor.

In order to make the concert here as interesting as possible, the management has engaged Mme. Olga Samaroff, an admirable pianist, as one of the two soloists, the other being the first violinist in the band. Mme. Samaroff has played frequently with the more prominent orchestras in the country, and with them and in the many recitals she has given since she made her American debut, about thirteen years ago, has proven herself to

"A PAGAN POEM"

MR. LOEFFLER'S NEW ORCHESTRAL FANTASY

A First Performance at the Symphony Concert Yesterday—Music of a Fuller Intensity and of More Human Quality Than the Composer Has Hitherto Written—Its Symphonic Substance and Large Sonority—The Suggestion from Virgil

In itself and to the audience Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" excelled in interest all the rest of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. It was the first new composition for orchestra to come in some years from his endlessly revising and endlessly unsatisfied hands. It seemed the most significant of all the new pieces that Dr. Muck has announced thus far for the current season. The various transformations that it had undergone in the six years through which the composer had worked upon it and in the private performances it had received, had given it an appreciable air of mystery that piqued expectation, while gossip drifting from rehearsals had further heightened curiosity. Music of a larger sonority, ampler design and broader expressiveness ran this gossip—music that "sounded" with a clearer and fuller voice than any that Mr. Loeffler had written hitherto, that was different from all the rest of his pieces for orchestra. Anticipation was proportionately keen, and, for once, in almost every respect it was gratified. A "Pagan Poem" fills twenty-five minutes in performance, and from beginning to end it held the eager interest of the house. With Mr. Heinrich Gebhard taking the piano that Mr. Loeffler has added to the orchestra, with Mr. Longy playing the significant and considerable part for the English Horn, and with conductor and men on their mettle, it was performed (though it spares neither intricacies nor difficulties) with what seemed it full, eloquent and characteristic voice. At the end the applause was spontaneous, general and insistent. First Dr. Muck and then Mr. Gebhard acknowledged it; but it persisted until the composer had risen in his place to receive a just honor. It is the custom to assume the indifference of the audience of Friday afternoon. As the event yesterday proved, it can be alert when a significant piece by one of the most imaginative composers of our time comes to first performance in the city in which he has made his career. Except for momentary record, the other music on the programme may be left for comment at another time. It was in detail:

Lalo: Overture to the opera, "The King of Is".
Loeffler: "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), Op. 14, for orchestra, pianoforte, English Horn,, and three Trumpets obbligati. First performance.
Reznicek: Adagio and Scherzo–finale from Symphonic Suite in E minor for full orchestra. First time in Boston.
Chabrier: España, rhapsody for orchestra.

Oftenest in recent years Mr. Loeffler has written with a preceding and stimulating literary suggestion, and for a "Pagan Poem" he found it in the second part of Virgil's eighth Eclogue—in the verses in which the forsaken and longing Thessalian girl plies song and spell to recall to her door the Daphnis who has strayed away and who comes at the last—a lover again. It is a part only of the Eclogue, the second of the two contrasting love songs sung by the rival shepherds, while the very beasts of the field raised their heads to hear, elate. In no respect, however, has Mr. Loeffler followed the form, the manner or the details of Virgil. The song of the shepherds and of the Latin poet has sketched for him an imaginative episode, the suggestions of which in underlying moods, immediate and changeful feeling and pervasive atmosphere he has cast, as his own fancy responded to them, in the form and the voice of the "tone-poem" of ultra-modern music. The Eclogues of Virgil are highly artificial, delicately polished, subtly mannered poetical miniatures. They affect a simplicity of feeling that is really the sum and the fruit of a super-refined artistry, masking itself in its perfections. They are the verse of the world which was a pure and living thing to Puvis de Chavannes in some of his decorations, but that to Virgil and Theocritus was only the beautifully artificial setting of a beautifully artificial poetic exercise.

Now it is easy to fancy a tone-poem that might seek in form, matter and manner the miniature and polished perfections, the grace of artifice, the naiveté of mood of the classic eclogue. It is a plausible suspicion that Mr. Loeffler had such a poem in mind when he first designed his piece as chamber music for a little band of a dozen instruments. Gradually, it is as plausible to infer, his imagination transformed the suggestions of Virgil's verse into the larger inspiration of a poem in tones unfettered by any thought of the form and manner of the classical eclogue. The recalling spells of Virgil's verse, the grave enchantments, the passion of longing that sped them, the passion of elation that fulfilment brought, had swelled in Mr. Loeffler's imagination seemingly beyond any attempt to write in turn an eclogue in tones. Perforce he must seek the freedom and vividness of the full-throated tone-poem. Virgilian in its piteousness is the song of the English Horn in a "Pagan Poem." The tears of things are as truly and searchingly in it as they are in the Latin verse. In all else, as it seemed at a single hearing, the emotional, pictorial and poetic qualities of the piece are as truly Mr. Loeffler's own as the purely musical traits. He has made but little use of the haunting refrain of the shepherd's song; he has in no wise imitated its formal divisions; and the detail of the dog barking to welcome the returning lover is the only direct translation to which Mr. Loeffler owns or that the music at once suggests.

The polished artifice of the classical eclogue, tempting as it seems as a musical feat, was then impossible to the intensity of imagination and expression that fifty lines of Virgil's verse had stirred in Mr. Loeffler. No more perhaps, were some of his old methods and characteristics possible in [illegible] Much of his music hitherto has lacked body. It has been of an exceeding fineness, subtlety, and poignancy. It has been sublimated music, taking shape and spirit from a world of its own and luring the hearer into it. Large emotional quality has been wanting. It has had a certain un-human quality. Mr. Loeffler has cultivated the creeping felicities of the remote and the uncanny for their own sake. As it seems to us, though perhaps mistakenly, it is the larger voice, the fuller intensity, the warmer human quality that distinguishes a "Pagan Poem" from all of Mr. Loeffler's music that has preceded it and that may make it highly significant in his career. There was dramatic quality indeed in his "Death of Tintagiles," but it was the dramatic potency of the weird, remote, disembodied Maeterlinckian world of phamtoms.

The dramatic quality of a "Pagan Poem," on the other hand, seems intensely human. A passion of longing cries in the music; the enchantments shall work their spell by the passion of desire that is kindling them more than by the sorceress's fires; a passion of exultant possession crowns them at the end. The yearning and the joy have a vital quality that is new to Mr. Loeffler's shadowy music of vision. He touches actual homeliness in the barking dog. Even the sluggishly imaginative listener may hear the music of the spells in a "Pagan Poem." It does not spare Mr. Loeffler's familiar command of uncanny suggestion in tones. The voice of magic is in it, but the voice wails and wails with the intensity of the human desire that in the Thessalian girl was feeding the sorceress's enchantments. The magic is human, vital, not macabre fancy. More: in the very summoning of atmosphere with which a "Pagan Poem" begins, Mr. Loeffler leads his hearers into no world of mist, shadows and phantoms. Sunless it is and gray and cold, for Daphnis, the lover, is gone out of it. Sick of desire is she that dwells in it, for Daphnis comes not. Grave are the spells that shall bring him again. Anxious is the foreboding. But it is still a human world that presently shall stir with the joy of his step. For this new passion, and new humanity, Mr. Loeffler seeks again, as it seemed to us, a larger, intenser and vivider utterance than he has ever sought before. His melodies have a substance that heightens their intensity; fuller-voiced but no less significant is the development of them; his rhythms have a new propulsive power; richer and warmer, but no less felicitous and imaginative, is the instrumental coloring. Hitherto Mr. Loeffler's music has had the voice of a kind of poetic magic. There was a subtle spell in it. The music is poetic still, but now the voice is human and of clear passion.

These new qualities open wide the future of Mr. Loeffler. They are the broadening, the ripening toward the opera that he is eager to undertake. They are the audible and assuring token that he may now achieve it. He has spoken at last with the deep and full note of human passion, with the clear voice of dramatic intensity. That voice is the more potent, that future seems the more believable, because in him is a quality that is rare among the tone-poets of our time and that some of the younger and more restless of them are prone to neglect. The listener may hear a "Pagan Poem," if he will, as so much "absolute" music. He may know nothing of Virgil's verse. He may be perversely deaf to all the passionate or magical suggestion of the piece, to all the dramatic illusion of it. He may test it by no more than symphonic tests, and he will find it no music of fragmentary and comparatively unrelated phrases, insignificant without the detailed suggestion of a programme, no music of ragged and straying polyphony, or of surface without frame and flesh. He will find it, rather, as closely knit, in all its transformations, as ordered in its structure and progress, as truly symphonic in every respect as though Mr. Loeffler had called it no more than a "Fantasia" and set no verses from Virgil on the fly-leaf of his score. Yet this music, answering all these symphonic tests, has in equal degree every expressive, poetic, delineative and dramatic quality that Mr. Loeffler seemingly would impart to it. It has them the more because by this very symphonic quality he is respectful of form and structure, of orderly progress, of the inherent nature of music and of its limitations on its expressive side. Mr. Loeffler does not wrench or shatter music to his purposes. He moulds it and persuades it to them with a patience and a pains and an ultimate achievement that have the quality of genius in them.

H. T. P.

Nov. 16 - Eve. Star - Washington D.C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Karl Muck as conductor, at its concert at the Krueger Auditorium, Monday evening, December 9, will have as assisting solo artist Olga Samaroff, a brilliant pianist. This concert will be, without a doubt, a great musical treat. The auditorium should be crowded to the doors, and probably will be, as the famous orchestra has never before played here.

One of the most interesting criticisms of Mme. Samaroff's playing comes from the pen of Philip Hale, of the Boston Herald, who is one of the leading critics of the country. It was published on November 24, 1905, after Mme. Samaroff's first Boston recital. He said of her:

"Mme. Samaroff has the elemental qualities of a distinguished pianist. She has unusual strength, and this she at times abuses, although in stormy passages the chords are, as a rule, both massive and sonorous, and there is little suggestion of crashing metal. She has a fine sense of rhythm. She sings a melody, and does not poke it and thump it. Her melody has a charming background, and it is enwrapped in appropriate atmosphere. She has a continuous legato in song passages. Her bravura is clean and crisp, and it has a peculiar elegance; it is warm; it does not remind one of hard polish on parlor furniture, bought merely for display and not for use. This elegance seems inherent and not laboriously acquired. Furthermore, the best of all, there is a pronounced individuality in her interpretation, which is now serene and noble, now dreamy or sensuous or passionate, according to the mood of the composer."

Mail orders are now being received by [illegible] N. Sommer, 394 Broad street.

[64]

SYMPHONY GIVES SIXTH CONCERT

First Performance of Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" by Boston Orchestra.

WORK MASTERPIECE OF SONORITY AND FANCY

Illustration of Virgil's Eighth Eclogue—Remarkable Composition.

BY PHILIP HALE

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The King of Ys".....Lalo
"Pagan Poem" (after Virgil).....Loeffler
Adagio and scherzo finale from suite in E minor.....Reznicek
"Espana".....Chabrier

The concert was one of unusual interest. The passionate and brilliant overture and the dazzling and enchanting rhapsody by Chabrier are well known here, but they are always heard with delight. Both Lalo and Chabrier were composers of striking originality and indisputable talent. The former in face of all sorts of disappointments clung to his ideals. Although Berlioz and Liszt and Wagner had gone before him, he imagined new schemes of orchestration and the gorgeous raiment covered a firm, glowing, palpitating body. It has been said of Chabrier that his "bad taste was exquisite," and this is a clumsy translation of a fine and searching criticism in the original French.

Chabrier was by nature a Pantagruelian. At times in his music he was positively Rabelaisian, as in his "Marche Joyeuse"—Would that Dr. Muck would see fit to perform it here! But in "Gwendoline" he sounded the true note of passion, and in the unfinished "Briseis" he showed again both passionate eloquence and the imagination that reproduces scene and atmosphere with the characters themselves. Some one in New York recently alluded to Chabrier's "Espana" as an elaboration of a waltz by Waldteufel. The remark was absurd. There were the Spanish dance themes, and Chabrier and the waltz-maker used them, each in his own way. The "Espana" of Chabrier is a miracle of color, languor, sensuousness, verve. The workmanship alone shows incredible dexterity.

Although Reznicek's suite was published nearly 25 years ago, the excerpts were played here for the first time. Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" was performed for the first time.

The Herald described at length last Sunday the nature of Mr. Loeffler's latest work. It was suggested by the verses in Virgil's eighth eclogue, the verses in which a woman by magic spells and incantations wins back to her arms her lover. An eclogue moved the Frenchman Rabaud to an orchestral work, but it was the first, and the music is appropriately pastoral.

They that are acquainted with Mr. Loeffler's preceding compositions and know the man himself will readily see how the mystery of the incantation, the twining of triple hued threads, the melting of the wax image, the thought of the moon brought down from heaven, and the cold snake burst asunder by witch-singing, of Moeris, the were-wolf, of the ashes thrown into the brook—how these things would appeal to him irresistibly; how the refrain of the amorous sorceress would tempt him to strains that, once heard, would haunt the hearer forever.

In Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" there is, however, no minutiae of macabre. There is no laborious and futile endeavor to suggest by tones and their combinations each strange act and stranger speech of the enchantress. That there should be a refrain was poetically necessary. This of itself might give unity and cohesion and furnish a dramatic climax. The composer himself has said modestly that in one passage the hearer might be reminded of the chase after Moeris who had turned wolf and plunged into the forest, and he might also in another passage remember the barking of Hylax as Daphnis neared the threshold. But with the exception of one chief theme, that of invocation, and of the refrain, there are no typical motives; the themes have only musical significance and the hearer acquainted with Virgil's verses is left to his own interpretation.

Now is there need of "interpretation." This music does not depend at all on literary contents. It is music that of itself is nobly sensuous, keenly emotional, now dolorous in grief, now irresistible in exultation.

Remarkable Work.

In general conception, in breadth and stability of structure, in the inherent beauty and poignancy of the melodic thought, in harmonic and contrapuntal euphony, in sonorous symphonic treatment of the theme, in original and highly poetic orchestral expression, in an imaginative flight that rises far above fantasticality, in the fundamental and abiding qualities that turn what would otherwise be temporarily engrossing into that which survives the passing years, the "Pagan Poem" is not only Mr. Loeffler's masterpiece, it is a work that is remarkable without the limiting thought of period or country.

In no one of his preceding works has Mr. Loeffler shown such mastery of sonorous and expressive counterpoint. Fantastic, beautiful, thrilling, as they were and now are, they fall below the "Pagan Poem" in human appeal and in splendor of sonority. There need be no curious prying into the "meaning" of this or that page. There is the compelling song of an amorous woman, a song of love, lamentation, entreaty, a song of despair and frenzied rejoicing.

Never before has Mr. Loeffler found such broad and flowing melodies to voice the emotions of a [illegible] melodies that ravish the ear and touch the heart. These melodies or sections of them are combined with the utmost skill, with a finesse that removes all thought of deliberate contrivance and gives the impression of inevitableness. It would be a grateful task to particularize some of the enchanting combinations of timbres, but this task must be deferred. The effect of the composition on an audience might be increased if at the very end the few final and orthodox measures were to be cut out and the close made with the furious fanfares of delirious joy.

Dr. Muck, who had given sympathetic and untiring attention to the rehearsal of the work, conducted with even more than his customary fire and poetic feeling, as though inspired with personal devotion to the composer, and the performance of the orchestra, as in the other pieces, was one of uncommon brilliance. Mr. Gebhard played the difficult piano part in a masterly manner, masterly in all respects. His tone was of beautiful quality, his bravura was clear and polished, his grasp of his duties in ensemble was firm, and his musical conception was one of true imagination. Nor should the wondrous playing of the English horn by Mr. Longy, nor the deeds of the three trumpeters be forgotten. The "Pagan Poem" made a deep impression; there was hearty applause for Dr. Muck and the orchestra; Mr. Loeffler was called on more than once to bow in acknowledgment.

There was also warm applause after Lalo's overture, in which Mr. Warnke played fervently the 'cello solo. The movements by Reznicek suffered by being placed between the music of Loeffler and that of Chabrier. The Adagio is commonplace in sentiment. The Scherzo finale is ingeniously made, and it shows the hand of a practised musician, but, coming after the "Pagan Poem," it recalled the speech of Armado: "The words of Mercury are harsh after the songs of Apollo."

Symphony Plays a Boston Work

"A Pagan Poem," by Charles M. Loeffler, Is Received With Marked Favor.

Interest in Saturday's night's Symphony concert centered in the new work of Boston's most famous composer, Charles Martin Loeffler, whose offering, a composition for orchestra and piano, proved to be dazzlingly brilliant. Of its brilliancy there can be no question. Its mere conception was a brilliant feat of imagination. So, too, was the development of the composer's fantastic ideas. Not less brilliant than the piece itself was the performance by Heinrich Gebbard, the pianist, and the orchestra.

But the result of all this carnival of brilliance was that half the people in the hall were dazzled. They saw and heard—and the blare and glare were too much for them.

The piece, which is called "A Pagan Poem," is a fantasy suggested or inspired by some lines in the eighth Eclogue of Virgil—the lines telling about the sorceress who by magical rites draws back to her from the city an errant lover. The verses bestirred Mr. Loeffler to execute a remarkable flight of fancy. It might be called a polyphonal nightmare but for the dramatic moments in which the invisible trumpets take up the refrain, "Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home," ending at last in the fanfare performed by the trumpets on the stage—the sorceress' outburst of exultation, "Forbear: from the city—forbear now, my songs—Daphnis comes." Dr. Muck and Mr. Gebhard threw all their spirit and energy into the performance, and, so to speak, burnished the brilliancy. Mr. Gebhard was recalled several times, and finally Mr. Loeffler had to rise twice from his seat in the middle of the floor. Mr. Longy might well have risen also, for his playing of the theme given the English horn was beautiful.

Another work performed for the first time was Reznicek's Adagio and Scherzo-Finale from his symphonic suite in E minor. This novelty seemed trite and conventional alongside the Loeffler piece, yet if it lacked luster to make the majority blink, it offered songs that charmed the ear. The other numbers were Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody. In the former Mr. Warnke gave exquisite pleasure by his performance of the 'cello theme.

Novelties are common this season. Another, Boehe's tone poem "Taormina," leads this week's program. The Symphony will be Beethoven's second. Mr. Kreisler, the admirable violinist, will be the soloist, and he has chosen to play Lalo's "S[illegible]

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A SECOND HEARING OF "A PAGAN POEM"

Mr. Loeffler's New Piece at the Symphony Concert of Saturday—The Rest of the Programme—A Conversation Overheard—Paderewski Play His New Sonata—The Full Discourse of Miss Farrar—Hats, the Woman and the Parisian Manager—Wisdom as It Flies—December at the Hollis Street—Barker's "Forbidden Play" Acted in London

Mr. Loeffler's new tone-poem, though the performance of it had not quite the insistent passion of that of Friday, was as warmly received at the Symphony Concert of Saturday night. The audience listened with the alert and rapt stillness that is the finest proof of response, and at the end the applause—even to cries for the composer—was the heartiest a new piece has won here in many a day. At a first hearing the commanding and poignant intensity, the ardent musical and dramatic progress of the whole and the irresistible emotional response to both swept all other impressions before them. They were as puissant at a second hearing, but through them the listener caught in glimpses, as it were, some of the minuter qualities of "A Pagan Poem." Then, for example, it was possible to catch the adroit and imaginative adjustment of the piano part to the whole orchestral fabric, and the more close and suggestive for the new variety of touch and fluidity of tone that Mr. Gebhard brought to the playing of it. Akin were the variety, subtlety, individuality and imaginative significance of the harmonic and the instrumental coloring. Yet these were never finical or labored, forced or obtrusive. They were a part of the large intensity and sonority of the whole—the means to them. More than was possible at the first hearing, the ardor, each in its kind, of the melodies and the controlled passion of invention and of feeling in the play of them thrilled the ear and the fancy. In them, and in the theme of invocation in particular, spoke a new poignancy. More clearly, too, the listeners heard the music of the spells—music of incantation, indeed, but of incantation vital with the passion of the longing enchantress, while the hidden trumpets were verily the voice of the refrain in the heart as well as in the song of the sorceress. And was it mere vagrant fancy to catch in them the Virgilian fall and pathos of "Ducite ab urbe domum, mea carmina, ducite Daphnim" even though the final trumpet cry of elation for

"Parcite, ab urbe venit, jam parcite, carmina, Daphnis" spells the intensity of the Latin verse a hundred fold. Best of all, the noting of these and many another detail lessened not a whit the large and deep impressions of whole. In "A Pagan Poem" Mr. Loeffler has emerged from the writing of macabre miniatures. He is now a tone-poet of passion and of power, full-voiced at last. The promise and the achievement of "The Death of Tintagiles are fulfilled." The future opens for him—and for us who listen and answer—thrillingly.

Lalo's overture to "The King of Ys"—the overture that bids fair to survive long the opera that it introduces—began the concert. It was played with the clear sense of dramatic significance in its several episodes, with the practised instinct for musical contrast, with the whetting of mind and feeling for the drama that is to come that Dr. Muck—operatic conductor again and perhaps a litle longingly—brings to such pieces. In the tone of the orchestra were the sombre coloring and the grim voice of the music, and in the brooding song of the 'cello was a poignancy of expression new in Mr. Warnke's playing. At the end of the concert came the repetition, asked time and again since its success of surprise last April, of Chabrier's blazing, beating frenzy of Spanish dancetunes, drunk with themselves, "Espana," and audience and players shared the intoxication. Between—the one bare place in the concert—stood the adagio and scherzo-finale of a suite twenty years old by Reznicek, the Germanized Pole. It is the sort of music that is made in the piece in Germany nowadays by any composer who happens to have had training and who cultivate diligence, and then cut into assorted lengths for performance. Dr. Much cut off two of them and left the listener to wonder whether tthe tihrd in this particular suite was still more commonplace—the undistinguished prose of music. Reznicek has bidden his orchestra play with "great fire and energy," and it did, but out of the fire came only smoke. Dr. Muck, except with "A Pagan Poem," has not been fortunate with his new pieces this year. The harvest is small, apparently, though the laborers are many.

H. T. P.

At the Symphony Rehearsal

The "rush" audience had settled into the chairs in the second balcony. In the calm that ensued a voice behind me exclaimed:

"My! but I was afraid you could never get here in time, George. You told me I must give the man down at the door a quarter. I did n't have a quarter, and had to go to the store to buy something to get one. This was the cheapest thing I could find. Cute, ain't it?"

"Yes, Minnie, I did n't leave the factory till quarter-past one. We have good seats, though."

"Yes, George. Why, is n't it funny no one's gone in down-stairs?"

"Oh, those are the reserved seats—season tickets you know."

"Oh! Do they come any cheaper by getting a season ticket?"

"No, Minnie; those are the tickets they sell season, you know, early in the fall for so much."

"George, are these statues all 'round here to represent old musicians?"

"No, Minnie, they are mostly Greek—that one is Apollo. You 've heard of Apollo?"

"Ye-es!"

"You see the piano, Minnie? Well, when they play a concerto they push the piano into the middle of the stage. Mr. Gebhard plays the piano part today, but it is n't a solo part. Kreisler, the violinist, plays next week."

"George, how can the audience hear him? I should think the orchestra would drown him."

"Why, no! He plays a solo part—different from the rest."

"Oh! there they come, George! Is that big thing a 'shell-o?' "

"Oh, no! That is a double-bass."

"My! but that must be tiresome business—standing up to play that thing! What 's the difference between a first and a second violin?"

"No difference in the instrument; only in the part each plays."

At the end of "A Pagan Poem" Minnie burst forth again.

"That feller can play the piano by himself best, I guess. Why! What 's everybody getting up and clapping for?"

A kind young woman turned around and told George that the audience had discovered Mr. Loeffler in the middle aisle.

"Look, Minnie, there he is!"

"Who? What 's the fuss anyway?"

"Why, Minnie, it 's Mr. 'Loffler,' the man who wrote the piece they just played."

"My sakes, George! I did n't know anyone here wrote music like that piece."

"Where is your programme?"

"That book? Why, that 's the programme for the whole season, ain't it? I thought you said there were only three or four numbers. I 've been through the book from beginning to end and I can't find a thing about today."

When the concert came to an end with Chabrier's gorgeous "España," Minnie commented, "That was real lively. Say, George, when will you come home?"

"Don't wait supper for me, Minnie, I 've got to go back to the factory and stay till 7.30."

"Oh, I could n't wait till then; I 'm awful hungry. I have n't had a thing since breakfast George, but a piece of pie!"

Newark Evening Paper Nov. 26.

BIG SALE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The demands for seats for the Boston Symphony concert, which will be given at the Krueger Auditorium Monday evening, December 9, is very large. A full house is already assured.

Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist, who will be the soloist, with the orchestra, is an American girl, having been born in San Antonio, Tex., where her father, an officer in the army, was stationed. She is of German and Russian stock, and most of her life has been spent abroad. As a child she was given to the care of her maternal grandmother, one of the most distinguished pianists of Germany, and from her she took her first lessons. Her girlhood she spent in a convent in Paris, where she studied with the elder Marmontel and Widor.

In 1895, with 176 others, she went before the jury of the Paris Conservatoire to be examined for admission to that institution. She was one of the twelve successful candidates, and she was put into Delaborde's classes, with whom she worked for five years. Then she went to Berlin, where she stayed for four years, studying with the famous Russian teacher, Jodlicska, who died in the summer of 1904. It was he who told her that she was ready for a public career.

The concert will begin precisely at 8:15 o'clock. The sale of seats opens at Lauter's on Wednesday, December 4.

PADEREWSKI RECITAL.

Ignace Jan Paderewski, who will give a recital at the Krueger Auditorium Tuesday evening, December 17, will again appear before an immense audience. That this great artist is more popular than ever was again demonstrated last Saturday at Carnegie Hall, New York. Every seat in the big auditorium was occupied, and for his third recital in New York, which takes place December 14, the entire house is sold out. Many orders received for his recital in Newark, come from New York. Those desiring to secure seats before the regular sale opens at Lauter's on December 12, can do so by sending in their applications to F. N. Sommer, 794 Broad street.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert to be given by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium Monday night, December 9, will begin promptly at 8:15 o'clock, and late arrivals will not be admitted to the hall during the performance of the opening number. Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager of this concert, as well as of the recital to be given by Paderewski in the same place Tuesday night, December 17, has received at his office, 794 Broad street, many orders for reserved seats from residents of Newark's suburbs and from New York. For both events several boxes have been sold to New York parties.

Zeitung - Nov. 24

Wie bereits angekündigt, ist es Herrn Fred. N. Somer gelungen, den hiesigen Musikfreunden mit dem Engagement des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters einen ganz besonderen Kunstgenuß zu gewähren. Dasselbe wird hier am Montag Abend, 9. December, ein Concert geben. Es ist dies das erste Mal, daß sich diese „Künstler-Vereinigung", denn eine solche ist dies Orchester — nach Newark verirrt, sodaß dessen Erscheinen nicht allein ein Ereigniß in der Musikgeschichte Newark's, sondern auch des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters sein dürfte. Das Orchester setzt sich aus 97 Musikern zusammen, von denen ein jeder in des Wortes vollster Bedeutung ein Meister auf seinem Instrument ist. Dirigent ist Dr. Karl Muck, der Kapellmeister der Berliner Hofoper und anerkannt einer der bedeutendsten musikalischen Interpreten der Jetztzeit. Die Leistungen dieser musikalischen Künstler sind vollendete und — mag man auch bezüglich der Interpretation einer Composition vielleicht andere Ansichten haben oder fühlen als der Dirigent — stets mustergültige.

So weit bis jetzt bekannt, wird das Programm als erste Nummer Vincent d'Indy's symphonische Trilogie „Wallenstein" bringen. Dieses Werk des modernen französischen Componisten hat in Boston, und wo es sonst zu Gehör gebracht wurde, eine sehr beifällige Aufnahme gefunden. Das andere Orchester-Werk wird Robert Schumann's fesselnde „Genovefa" Ouvertüre sein. Die Solistin ist Olga Samaroff, eine amerikanische Pianistin trotz ihres russischen Namens, welche Edward Grieg's A-Moll Concert spielen wird.

Der reguläre Ticket-Verkauf beginnt am 4. December in Lauter's Piano-Laden, 659 Broad Str. Die Preise der Plätze sind $2, $1.50 und $1. Wer sich vorher Sitze sichern will, möge das Geld mittels Checks oder Postanweisung ausgestellt für F. N. Somer, 794 Broad Str., senden.

Ignaz Jan Paderewski, der in Amerika zu großer Berühmtheit und Beliebtheit gelangte polnische Piano-Virtuose, wird unter dem Management des Herrn Sommer am Dienstag Abend, 17. December, ebenfalls im Krueger Auditorium concertiren. Der Künstler, welcher auch hier in Newark stets ein volles Haus gezogen, hat, seitdem er hier zum letzten Male gespielt, sein Programm um eine Anzahl höchst interessanter Compositionen erneuert, von denen er einige hier zu Gehör bringen wird.

Der reguläre Ticketverkauf für dies Concert beginnt am 12. December in Lauter's Laden und kosten die Plätze $2.50, $2, $1.50 und $1. Postbestellungen können schon jetzt mittels Check oder Postanweisung für F. N. Sommer 794 Broad Str., gemacht werden.

STAR, Newark

NOV 23

Boston Symphony Program.

An interesting program has been prepared by Dr. Karl Muck for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Krueger Auditorium Monday evening, December 9. The first number will be a symphonic trilogy by the great French composer, Vincent d'Indy, entitled "Wallenstein," a work which has been played with great success in Boston and elsewhere. The other purely orchestral piece will be Schumann's beautiful overture "Genoveva."

The soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, the brilliant woman pianist. She has won much success in America in the last three years, which is all the more notable because she started in America and has yet to play in Europe. Her first appearance in Europe will be next October with the famous Colonne orchestra in Paris. Madame Samaroff will play Grieg's concerto in A minor.

Those desiring to secure their seats before the sale opens at Lauter's on December 4 can do so by sending check to F. N. Sommer, 794 Broad street.

NEWS

NOV 23 1907

The Boston Symphony.

The position occupied in its home city by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in the Krueger Auditorium Monday night, December 9, when Mme. Olga Samaroff, the noted pianist, will appear as one of the soloists, is a unique one. It has become a matter for common complaint with managers that except for a Melba or a Sembrich, a Paderewski, a de Pachmann or some other virtuoso of sensational gifts, Boston is one of the poorest cities for concerts, in proportion to its size, in this country. With all the managers the explanation of this rather curious phenomenon is the same, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts practically absorbs all the musical energy of a city which is without doubt one of the most truly musical in America.

The seating capacity of Symphony Hall is 2,569, and, as every seat in the house is sold for every performance, the total number of persons who hear the orchestra in Boston every year is 123,312. To this total must be added those that go to the two pension fund concerts, which are given by the orchestra, and the occasional special concerts, such as that given this year in honor of Saint-Saens, and last year for the benefit of the San Francisco sufferers.

Orders for reserved seats for the concert are being received by Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager, at his office, No. 794 Broad street, and all that are accompanied by money orders and checks will be filled in the order received on the day before the regular sale opens.

...Established and Most Complete ...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Bro... N. Y.

NOV 24 1

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert to be given here on the evening of Dec. 6. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other number on the programme will be Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana."

Daily Citizen, Brooklyn, N.Y.

NOV 23 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert on Friday evening, Dec. 6. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other number on the programme will be Chasbrier's Rhapsody "Espana."

[65]

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 24 1907

DAMROSCH SYMPHONY TREAT.

A Fine Programme Eagerly Received by a Large Audience at the Baptist Temple.

"The morning light is breaking" for music in Brooklyn. It is not so many years ago that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had to abandon its matinee concerts at the old Academy because Brooklyn would not support two orchestral concerts in the same week. Then a heroic effort was made, through the organization of committees and the exercise of social pressure, to establish one paying audience for that orchestra on its five monthly visits.

Such an audience was created, happily, and its influence has been such that Walter Damrosch, when he opened the first of his series of matinee concerts here with the New York Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple yesterday, found a large and brilliant audience waiting to welcome him. There were fewer vacant seats than when Sembrich sang in the same place a week earlier, and the demeanor of the auditors plainly showed that they had come because they loved music. Mr. Damrosch, who is wise in his generation, had made an almost ideally popularly orchestral programme, and then he had engaged one of the most popular pianists now playing here, Josef Hofmann. The combination not only drew a crowd, but it pleased the crowd and started the series of Saturday matinees so well toward success that when we get our new Academy we may reasonably look forward to one orchestral concert a week through the height of the season, instead of the one a month, which was our limit some years ago. Speed the day when that happy consummation shall arrive.

There was nothing novel about Mr. Damrosch's part of the programme. He selected compositions which are favorites, because they are intimately known and intimately loved and which will bear almost illimitable repetition in the ears of people who love orchestral music at a... The opening selection, the "Lohengrin" prelude, served to show in its very first bars that the tone of the violins of the New York Symphony Orchestra has improved by the recent reorganization and that good impression of fine tone quality and precision in obeying the conductor's baton was increased as the programme unrolled. Mr. Damrosch now controls all the time of his men, he can rehearse them as much as he pleases, and they do not play apart from the orchestra, a condition which makes a beautiful performance possible and is redounding to the credit of the New York Symphony Orchestra wherever it is heard.

The chief number in which its good quality was shown yesterday was the "New World" symphony, by Dvorak, of which it is impossible to get too much. The idea that this music was not based on negro melodies because particular tunes could not be identified in the score, seems to have gone down stream with much other unprofitable discussion. The richness, beauty and power of Dvorak's use of the negro rhythms and negro intervals is now everywhere recognized. The vitality of this music, the broad sweep and the red blooded warmth of it have commended it to popular enjoyment everywhere that great orchestras exist. These qualities were finely brought out by Mr. Damrosch's performance yesterday, and the purity of tone his players lent added beauty to the noblex andante.

Mr. Hofmann contributed the only novelty, a piano concerto by Liapanouw. The pianist, no doubt, regards it as a pious duty to make known the music of his fellow Russians. This particular concerto will be popular, probably so long as Mr. Hofmann chooses to play it, for it gives great scope to the remarkable technich which is the basis of his playing. Other pianists will fight shy of it, because few of them can play its tremendous passages without quitting the keyboard limp and perspiring and leaving the music, as well as themselves, much the worse for wear. To Hofmann the difficulties seemed easy, but, after he had surmounted them, one wondered if it was worth while. The orchestra has a free and rather spirited air at the opening, and there is a good deal of the melancholy, which marks so much of Russian music for its own in the quieter passages, but the parts which redound most to Mr. Hofmann's glory as a pianist suggest that unkind line of the poet's about "sound and fury."

The pianist also played, without orchestra, Liszt's "Funerailles" and "Campanella." He orchestrated the former with the pedals, after the manner which Paderewski popularized here, and he gave the utmost range of his dynamics to creating striking contrasts. "The Campanella" was a "stunt," pure and simple, and, as a "stunt," it was very beautifully done, with marvelous speed and accuracy and great delicacy of tone. Perhaps the day will come when a conductor will no more think of putting the piece into a serious programme than he would of engaging a trapeze "artist" to divert the audience with the wonderful accuracy of his swings and catches. But that day has not yet come. People who love music still take delight in the technic of a pianist, and Mr. Hofmann's technic is dazzling in its ease, its taste, its perfection.

Mr. Damrosch closed the attractive programme with Charbrier's sparkling "Espana," which, with its dance rhythms and its tinkling castanets, suggests a dozen Carmencitas waving gleaming arms alluringly above their heads and putting the Spanish spirit into their native dances.

N. Y. TRIBUNE
NOV 24 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, Op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva." On the Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties, the first a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played with success in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year. The other novelty will be an adagio and a scherzo-finale by Von Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "España."

Paderewski will also be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening, December 6. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other number on the programme will be Chabrier's "España."

NEW YORK SUN
NOV 24 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concert in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the Opéra Comique "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra entitled "España."

N. Y. AMERICAN
NOV 24 1907

MUSICAL NOTES.

PADEREWSKI will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in the Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D-major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem, entitled "Taormina" by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an Adagio and Scherzo-Finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "Espana."

The New York Press
NEW YORK NOV 24 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at both Boston Symphony concerts next week. Thursday evening, December 5, he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon, December 7, he will give Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, opus 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year. The other is an adagio and scherzo finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "Espana."

Coming Events in Music World
Musical Notes and Comment

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony.

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique, "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "España."

From TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Address
Date NOV 19 1907

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor, will hold forth in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15 o'clock. Solos will also be rendered by Olga Samaroff. A delightful programme has been arranged and a large gathering is expected to be on hand to hear it.

...ork, 18

...om TRIBUNE
...dres PROVIDENCE, R. I.
...te NOV 20 1907

Society.

A brilliant audience assembled in Infantry Hall last night for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the audience were noted President Faunce of Brown University, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. William Binney, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Mrs. Helen Campbell, Miss Helen Campbell, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Miss Marion Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Sweetland, Miss Louise Sweetland, Miss Louise Hoppin, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. Merwin White, Col. and Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mrs. George Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Johns H. Congdon, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Hodgman, Mrs. George L. Shepley, Miss Shepley, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnell, Mrs. Charles G. King, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Edith Kimball, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. Walter A. Peck, Miss Carolyn Peck, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee.

BULLETIN
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NOV 23 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, December 2, when he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor." The other numbers on the program will be Brahms's Second Symphony, in D major, and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

TELEGRAPH
PHILADELPHIA, PA
NOV 23 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia, and he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor." The second will be Brahms' second in D major and the other item on the programme will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

RETO
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 24 1907

The Music Lovers Calendar for ... Illustrated and published annually ... & Härtel, 24 West 20. Str., New York. Der dritte Band des prächtigen, jeden ... liebhaber wärmstens zu empfehlenden ... bers ist nun erschienen und präsentiert ... seine Vorgänger, in einem durchaus ... Gewand. Auch der Inhalt ist wieder ... Sorgfalt ausgewählt und bietet ... Unter den Aufsätzen sind Artikel von ... und Foerster über das Boston Symphony Orchester, ebenso wie ein Aufsatz von ... Reichenberger über „Salome" sehr ... wertvoll. Nicht weniger interessant ist ein ... Brief von A. ... Bertha über ... Musik", und Artikel von Edmund C. ... Präsident der Universität von Illinois, Ed... Burlingame Hill, Edward Dickinson, Glen... Dillard Gunn etc. Hervorzuheben sind ... 16 künstlerischen Illustrationen, welche ... Werk zieren.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK
NEW
The First Established and Most Comple... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor...
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 20

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA GAVE FINE CONCERT

The always popular Boston Symphony orchestra opened its 27th Providence season with its 106th appearance last evening in Infantry hall before a large audience which was delighted with the brilliantly executed program given in the following order:

"Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, op 12....D'Indy
1. Wallenstein's Camp.
2. Max and Thekla (The Pissolomini)
3. The Death of Wallenstein.

Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54.....Schumann
1. Allegro affettuoso.
2. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
3. Allegro vivace.

Overture to "Genoveva," op. 81.....Schumann

The "Wallenstein" trilogy was presented here for the first time and it received a most hearty reception from a notably critical audience.

The triology while new here is not new music. It was finished more than a quarter of a century ago at a time when M. D'Indy had not assumed the peculiarly advanced position toward the art of music which he holds today. It is fresh, rich, vital and full of individuality.

The orchestra, which is exceptionally well balanced and contains 98 pieces, played with splendid sonority and precision, and Dr. Muck, who bears at a distance a resemblance to Gov. Higgins, conducted most gracefully and sympathetically.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the soloist of the evening, chose the A-minor concerto of Schumann, which is so familiar here that the applause which followed her work was the best possible evidence of her artistic ability. She has a most pleasing stage presence, a delightfully clean-cut "touch," most admirable expression and seemed to put her soul into the music that leaped from the magnificent joyously Steinway pianoforte. She was twice recalled, but did not render additional selections, contenting herself with her sweetest bow.

The closing number was the popular overture to Schumann's opera "Genoveva," in which the orchestra displayed remarkable skill and unity.

There are two more performances in the series of symphony concerts for this season on the evening of Tuesday, Dec. ... and Feb. 18.

m ..... NOV 9 ...

ress ... E.100. ... N. Y.

... NOV 24 1907

DAMROSCH SYMPHONY TREAT.

A Fine Programme Eagerly Received by a Large Audience at the Baptist Temple.

"The morning light is breaking" for music in Brooklyn. It is not so many years ago that the Boston Symphony Orchestra had to abandon its matinee concerts at the old Academy because Brooklyn would not support two orchestral concerts in the same week. Then a heroic effort was made, through the organization of committees and the exercise of social pressure, to establish one paying audience for that orchestra on its five monthly visits.

Such an audience was created, happily, and its influence has been such that Walter Damrosch, when he opened the first of his series of matinee concerts here with the New York Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple yesterday, found a large and brilliant audience waiting to welcome him. There were fewer vacant seats than when Sembrich sang in the same place a week earlier, and the demeanor of the auditors plainly showed that they had come because they loved music. Mr. Damrosch, who is wise in his generation, had made an almost ideally popularly orchestral programme, and then he had engaged one of the most popular pianists now playing here, Josef Hofmann. The combination not only drew a crowd, but it pleased the crowd and started the series of Saturday matinees so well toward success that when we get our new Academy we may reasonably look forward to one orchestral concert a week through the height of the season, instead of the one a month, which was our limit some years ago. Speed the day when that happy consummation shall arrive.

There was nothing novel about Mr. Damrosch's part of the programme. He selected compositions which are favorites, because they are intimately known and intimately loved and which will bear almost illimitable repetition in the ears of people who love orchestral music at a... The opening selection, the "Lohengrin" prelude, served to show in its very first bars that the tone of the violins of the New York Symphony Orchestra has improved by the recent reorganization and that good impression of fine tone quality and precision in obeying the conductor's baton was increased as the programme unrolled. Mr. Damrosch now controls all the time of his men, he can rehearse them as much as he pleases, and they do not play apart from the orchestra, a condition which makes a beautiful performance possible and is redounding to the credit of the New York Symphony Orchestra wherever it is heard.

The chief number in which its good quality was shown yesterday was the "New World" symphony, by Dvorak, of which it is impossible to get too much. The idea that this music was not based on negro melodies, because particular tunes could not be identified in the score, seems to have gone down stream with much other unprofitable discussion. The richness, beauty and power of Dvorak's use of the negro rhythms and negro intervals is now everywhere recognized. The vitality of this music, the broad sweep and the red blooded warmth of it have commended it to popular enjoyment everywhere that great orchestras exist. These qualities were finely brought out by Mr. Damrosch's performance yesterday, and the purity of tone his players lent added beauty to the noblex andante.

Mr. Hofmann contributed the only novelty, a piano concerto by Liapanouw. The pianist, no doubt, regards it as a pious duty to make known the music of his fellow Russians. This particular concerto will be popular, probably so long as Mr. Hofmann chooses to play it, for it gives great scope to the remarkable technich which is the basis of his playing. Other pianists will fght shy of it, because few of them can play its tremendous passages without quitting the keyboard limp and perspiring and leaving the music, as well as themselves, much the worse for wear. To Hofmann the difficulties seemed easy, but, after he had surmounted them, one wondered if it was worth while. The orchestra has a free and rather spirited air at the opening, and there is a good deal of the melancholy, which marks so much of Russian music for its own in the quieter passages, but the parts which redound most to Mr. Hofmann's glory as a pianist suggest that unkind line of the poet's about "sound and fury."

The pianist also played, without orchestra, Liszt's "Funerailles" and "Campanella." He orchestrated the former with the pedals, after the manner which Paderewski popularized here, and he gave the utmost range of his dynamics to creating striking contrasts. "The Campanella" was a "stunt," pure and simple, and, as a "stunt," it was very beautifully done, with marvelous speed and accuracy and great delicacy of tone. Perhaps the day will come when a conductor will no more think of putting the piece into a serious programme than he would of engaging a trapeze "artist" to divert the audience with the wonderful accuracy of his swings and catches. But that day has not yet come. People who love music still take delight in the technic of a pianist, and Mr. Hofmann's technic is dazzling in its ease, its taste, its perfection.

Mr. Damrosch closed the attractive programme with Charbrier's sparkling "Espana," which, with its dance rhythms and its tinkling castanets, suggests a dozen Carmencitas waving gleaming arms alluringly above their heads and putting the Spanish spirit into their native dances.

N. Y. TRIBUNE

88 .....

NOV 24 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he willl play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, Op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva." On the Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties, the first a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played with success in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year. The other novelty will be an adagio and a scherzo-finale by Von Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "España."

Paderewski will also be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn on Friday evening, December 6. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other number on the programme will be Chabrier's "España."

...RK SUN

NOV 24 1907

...English Violinist.

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concert in E flat major "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the Opéra Comique "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra entitled "España."

...88 .....

MUSICAL NOTES.

PADEREWSKI will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in the Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D-major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem, entitled "Taormina" by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an Adagio and Scherzo-Finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "Espana."

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY. NOV 24 1907

Date .....

Paderewski will be the soloist at both Boston Symphony concerts next week. Thursday evening, December 5, he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon, December 7, he will give Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, opus 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year. The other is an adagio and scherzo finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "Espana."

NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 24 1907

Coming Events in Music World Musical Notes and Comment.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony.

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique, "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "Espana."

REVUE

NEW YORK CITY

NOV 24 1907

The Music Lovers Calendar for 1908. Illustrated and published annually, Breitkopf & Härtel, 24 West 20. Str., New York City. Der dritte Band des prächtigen, jedem Musikliebhaber wärmstens zu empfehlenden Kalenders ist nun erschienen und präsentirt sich, wie seine Vorgänger, in einem durchaus würdigen Gewand. Auch der Inhalt ist wieder mit Sorgfalt ausgewählt und höchst gediegen. Unter den Aufsätzen sind Artikel von Spalding und Foerster über das Boston Symphonie-Orchester, ebenso wie ein Aufsatz von Hugo Reichenberger über „Salome" sehr bemerkenswerth. Nicht weniger interessant ist ein Artikel von A. de Bertha über „ungarische Musik", und Artikel von Edmund K. Kames, Präsident der Universität von Illinois, Edward Burlingame Hill, Edward Dickinson, Glenn Dillard Gunn etc. Hervorzuheben sind die 16 künstlerischen Illustrationen, welche das Werk zieren.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ..... TRIBUNE PROVIDENCE R I

Address .....

Date .....

Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor, will hold forth in Infantry Hall this evening at 8:15 o'clock. Solos will also be rendered by Olga Samaroff. A delightful programme has been arranged and a large gathering is expected to be on hand to hear it.

...ork, 18

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...om ..... TRIBUNE

...dres PROVIDENCE, R. I

...te ..... NOV 20 1907

Society.

A brilliant audience assembled in Infantry Hall last night for the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the audience were noted President Faunce of Brown University, Mrs. Robert Ives Gammell, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. William Binney, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Mrs. Helen Campbell, Miss Helen Campbell, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Miss Marion Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Sweetland, Miss Louise Sweetland, Miss Louise Hoppin, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. Merwin White, Col. and Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mrs. George Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Johns H. Congdon, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Mr. and Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Hodgman, Mrs. George L. Shepley, Miss Shepley, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnell, Mrs. Charles G. King, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Edith Kimball, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mrs. Walter A. Peck, Miss Carolyn Peck, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee.

BULLETIN

...ess PHILADELPHIA, PA.

NOV 23 190...

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, December 2, when he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor." The other numbers on the program will be Brahms's Second Symphony, in D major, and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia, and he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor." The second will be Brahms' second in D major, and the other item on the programme will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW ...

The First Established and Most Comple... Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor...

From .....

Address .....

Date ..... NOV 20 ...

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA GAVE FINE CONCERT

...k, 1...

The always popular Boston Symphony orchestra opened its 27th Providence season with its 106th appearance last evening in Infantry hall before a large audience, which was delighted with the brilliantly executed program given in the following order:

"Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, op 12....D'Indy
1. Wallenstein's Camp.
2. Max and Thekla (The Pissolomini).
3. The Death of Wallenstein.

Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54.....Schumann
1. Allegro affettuoso.
2. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
3. Allegro vivace.

Overture to "Genoveva," op. 81.....Schumann

The "Wallenstein" trilogy was presented here for the first time and it received a most hearty reception from a notably critical audience.

The triology while new here is not new music. It was finished more than a quarter of a century ago at a time when M. D'Indy had not assumed the peculiarly advanced position toward the art of music which he holds today. It is fresh, rich, vital and full of individuality.

The orchestra, which is exceptionally well balanced and contains 98 pieces, played with splendid sonority and precision, and Dr. Muck, who bears at a distance a resemblance to Gov. Higgins, conducted most gracefully and sympathetically.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the soloist of the evening, chose the A-minor concerto of Schumann, which is so familiar here that the applause which followed her work was the best possible evidence of her artistic ability. She has a most pleasing stage presence, a delightfully clean-cut "touch," most admirable expression and seemed to put her soul into the music that leaped from the magnificent joyously Steinway pianoforte. She was twice recalled, but did not render additional selections, contenting herself with her sweetest bow.

The closing number was the popular overture to Schumann's opera "Genoveva," in which the orchestra displayed remarkable skill and unity.

There are two more performances in the series of symphony concerts for this season on the evening of Tuesday, Dec. ... and Feb. 12.

[66]

Newspaper NEW YORK WORLD
From
Address
Date NOV 24 1907

WOULD YOU GO TO THIS CONCERT? - IF NEW YORK'S MUSICAL MILLIONAIRES "GOT TOGETHER"?

Engagement Extraordinary

MILLIONAIRES' ORCHESTRA

THE ONLY ONE IN THE WORLD

CARNEGIE HALL

ONE NIGHT ONLY

Conductor: Mr. Andrew Carnegie.
Violinists: Mr. John D. Rockefeller.
Mr. John D. Rockefeller Jr.
Mr. O. H. Havemeyer.
Dr. Seward Webb.
Mr. Harry Payne Whitney.
Cellist: Mr. A. L. Seligman.
Pianists: Mr. Chas. M. Schwab.
Mr. George Vanderbilt.
Mr. Peter Cooper Hewitt.
Soloist: Mr. Frederick G. Bourne.

ANDREW CARNEGIE'S PIPER FROM SKIBO CASTLE

COM. FREDERICK G. BOURNE

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER JR.

O.H. HAVEMEYER

A.L. SELIGMAN

PETER COOPER HEWITT

GEORGE VANDERBILT

Dr. SEWARD WEBB

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER

HARRY PAYNE WHITNEY

"My Violin" Is a Rockefeller Hobby; "The Piano's the Thing," Says Charles M. Schwab, and There Are New Evidences That Music as Well as Millions May Hold the Power to Soothe the Restless New Yorker.

By Margaret Rohe.

WHEN John D. Rockefeller left Wall street after his historic entrance during the crisis of the recent panic in the street, carrying with him, it may be believed, a lively realization of the momentous situation, the average person would have pictured the money king as retiring to his fireside and pacing the floor, if not in personal anxiety, at least in perturbation over the troublous scenes he had just left behind him.

But Mr. Rockefeller did nothing of the sort. Instead, he motored to his country home crowning the Pocantico Hills, slipped on his housecoat, drew his favorite violin from its case and fiddled away dull care and all memories of Wall street with its struggling depositors and trust company problems.

Mr. Rockefeller's most absorbing indoor recreation is violin playing, and it is a question which lies closer to his heart, his bow or his golf stick.

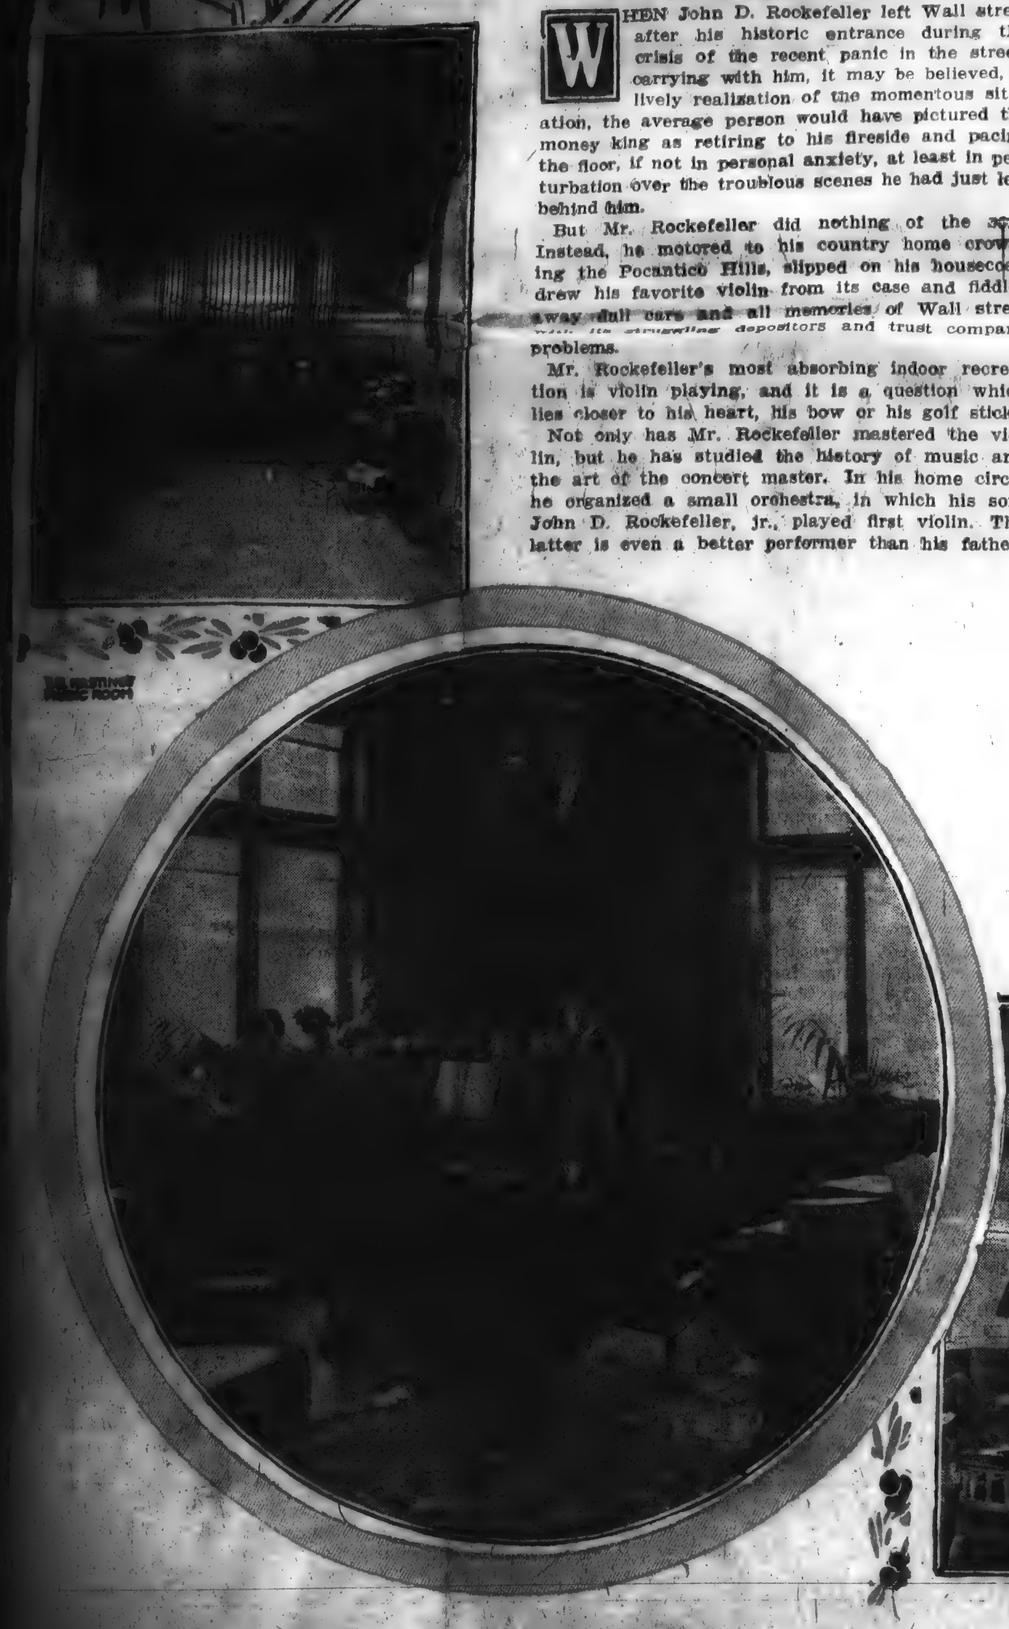
Not only has Mr. Rockefeller mastered the violin, but he has studied the history of music and the art of the concert master. In his home circle he organized a small orchestra, in which his son, John D. Rockefeller, jr., played first violin. The latter is even a better performer than his father, and in his college days was the star member of the Brown College Glee Club. Both father and son are severe musical critics.

The Rockefellers are only two of the growing multi-millionaire class who give the lie to the old belief that the clink of gold alone is music to the money-maker's ear.

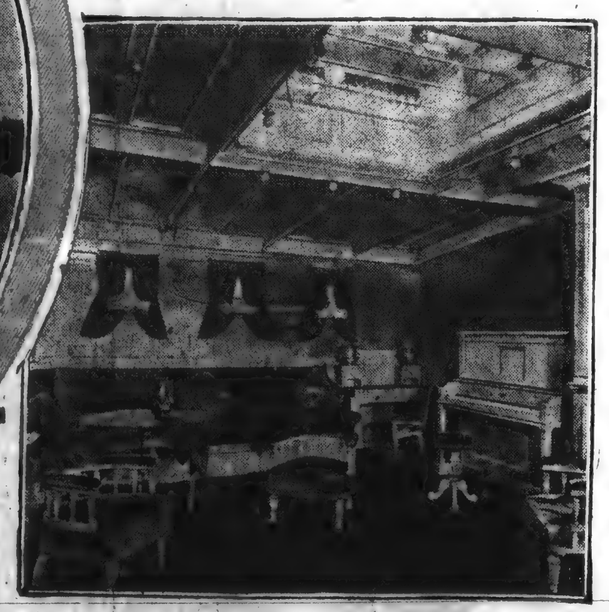
Of all the modern millionaire musicians, Charles M. Schwab, the steel magnate, is, perhaps, most fittingly the leader of a lengthy list. With an ear finely tuned to the rhythmic measure of the hammer on the ringing steel within the forge, Mr. Schwab can wring the very soul from the organ and the piano.

In the gorgeous music-room of Mr. Schwab's palace on Riverside Drive, like a rare jewel in a costly setting stands his wonderful pipe organ, the cost of which would settle the national debt of some countries. Here, when the day's work is done—for Mr. Schwab, though many times a millionaire, works as hard as any struggling manual laborer in his employ—he shuts himself up to woo the gracious muse of music, and as his fingers stray over the keys the sordid cares of money-getting and the greed for gold are all forgotten in delicate and subtly beautiful improvisations. As an improvisor, Mr. Schwab shows the innate skill of a true musical genius, and as an organist and pianist his work is consistently brilliant.

One of the greatest pleasures which President Roosevelt permitted himself last winter was to shake off the cares of state and spend a quiet evening at the home of his daughter, Alice, while his son-in-law, Representative Nicholas Longworth, discoursed sweet strains upon the violin. The reputation of being the best amateur violinist in Washington belongs to Mr. Longworth, and, in addition to this, his musical versatility further extends to the clever rendition of dialect songs, which are greatly in demand at the social functions of the season at the capital. Mr. Longworth comes by his musical ability as a matter of inheritance, since his father was ever a devoted worshipper at its shrine and practically established the College of Music in Cincinnati.



Isaac Rice and His Children in the Music Room of "Villa Julia."



Music Salon on F. G. Bourne's Yacht "Delaware."

Giving away libraries is by no means Andrew Carnegie's favorite pastime. The gift of pipe organs to country towns and churches is with him quite as important a role in his scheme of generosity, and scarcely a week passes that Mr. Carnegie does not gladden two or three communities with a gift designed to further the love of music. Passionately fond of all harmony, the instrument upon which this canny Scotch millionaire himself plays is a curious Japanese affair called "musical tubes." It consists of eight graduated metal tubes, suggesting the pipes of a miniature organ. It is played with a mallet and is the only instrument of its kind in this country. Scotch airs and national hymns are Mr. Carnegie's favorites on this queer but effective instrument. When working hard he invariably finds relaxation by shutting himself in his library with his "musical tubes" and making melody. Mr. Carnegie also is a skilled music critic and knows by heart the works of all the leading composers.

In a home orchestra similar to that of the Rockefellers, the late Cornelius Vanderbilt led his little family, all accomplished musicians, while his eldest son, the Cornelius of the present day, played first violin. Cornelius Vanderbilt the elder was a passionate lover of good music, and at one time he spent $30,000 for a piano, which was the finest in this country, all its panels having been exquisitely painted by famous French artists. Raised in such a musical home atmosphere, it is not surprising that the Cornelius Vanderbilt of the present generation should be not only an accomplished violinist, but also a creditable performer on the mandolin.

As a musical scion of another branch of the Vanderbilt family, George, the youngest son of the late William H. Vanderbilt, stands triumphant. This versatile young millionaire adds to his achievements as a scholar and prize farmer on his ideal North Carolina estate, near Biltmore, the musical gift of being a brilliant pianist.

Henry O. Havemeyer, the sugar king, is a violinist whose skill surpasses that of many professionals. He is the proud possessor of a Stradivarius and one or two other famous violins, and in his hours of recreation is first and foremost a musician. Theodore Havemeyer, his brother, has a tenor voice of remarkable quality and beauty, and the two spend many an evening, the one accompanying the other, in mutual musical enjoyment far sweeter than their famous sugar.

As the fine arts so often seem mysteriously akin and prone to join one another hand in hand in many an artistic temperament, it is not strange that the late Peter Marie, famed for his complete miniature collection of types of fair women, should have also been a musician and a performer of no mean skill on the banjo. He raised that often despised instrument into popular favor with the smart set by the marvellously beautiful strains that his true musical genius evoked from its strings. S. Livingston Peil to-day is a clever performer and a devoted disciple of the banjo, and he is only one of many millionaires who have taken up this particular medium of melody.

Dr. W. Seward Webb, first a physician, then the president of the Wagner Car Company, and incidentally an accomplished farmer at his perfectly equipped and delightfully situated country place, Shelbourne Farms, in Vermont, yet has found time to become a good musician, and his skill on the violin is by no means slight. Creighton Webb, a brother, also finds himself holding up the musical reputation of the family by his thoroughly artistic understanding and handling of the piano.

Peter Cooper Hewitt, grandson of Peter Cooper, and the millionaire inventor of the hydroplane which he expects to produce a marine speed of one hundred miles an hour, is no less brilliant a pianist than his latest contribution to science and commerce. Mr. Hewitt is also the proud possessor of the largest and most interesting collection of musical instruments in New York City.

Commodore F. G. Bourne, of the New York Yacht Club, and one time president of the Singer Sewing Machine Company, is a true artist on both the piano and the organ. Commodore Bourne is blessed with a beautiful baritone voice, and to this he is said to owe his real success in life. The sound of this glorious voice in the rendition of a solo at some social entertainment is said to have made such a deep impression upon one of the prominent members of the Singer firm that he took an immediate interest in Mr. Bourne and welcomed him into the company, where business ability finished the good work started by his voice and soon placed him in the presidency of the company.

Isaac L. Rice, millionaire president of the Holland Submarine Shipbuilding Company and an inventor, adds to his incomparable knowledge of marine engineering an equal knowledge of the pianoforte. Mr. Rice is never happier than when coaxing haunting melodies from the ivory keys in the music-room of his beautiful Riverside Drive mansion, with his six remarkable children and his handsome wife, who is herself a pianist of greatest brilliance surrounding him. Mr. Rice has also written a book on the subject called "What Is Music?"

Another example of the harmony existing between art and music is furnished in the home life of Harry Payne Whitney, the millionaire sportsman. While Mrs. Whitney, who was Gertrude Vanderbilt, devotes herself to painting and sculpture, Harry Payne Whitney finds an outlet for his artistic temperament in the violin, yet each is profoundly interested in the art of the other.

Singer and George Pullman, the twin sons of the late railroad magnate, are really virtuosos in their musical line, since they are not alone masters of the one instrument, but have under control no fewer than three—the violin, piano and 'cello—to perform upon these with great natural ability in addition to a finished technique.

Frank Seymour Hastings, millionaire club man, architect and dilettante, is, above all else, a musician and has not only a complete mastery of the piano and pipe organ, but also is a composer of some note. He is always in great demand at all the amateur private musicales in the homes of the "Four Hundred," and some of his compositions show remarkable musical ability and have already brought him much fame.

The late George W. Childs was a harpist of unusual ability, and was the proud owner of the original harp which the people of Limerick presented to Tom Moore. This harp still is a cherished possession of the Childs family.

A. L. Seligman, the multi-millionaire, is an accomplished painter and sculptor and plays the 'cello with much skill.

This brief list of wealthy musicians who personally perform upon some instrument by no means excludes others in the millionaire class who are music lovers. Many there are who, although unable to express their innate gift on any musical instrument, still are true musicians in every sense of the word. Major Higginson, of Boston, who founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra and financed it personally through all of its struggles until it became one of the best orchestras both artistically and financially in all the world, is one of these. George J. Gould and J. Pierpont Morgan, who rarely miss a first night at the opera, are others.

Music Room in Home of C. B. Alexander.

NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 24 1907

PERSONALISM IN ART; OPERA HITCHED TO STARS; BUT THE PLAY'S THE THING.

By Reginald De Koven.

A WEEK containing the initial production in America of two new operas and the first appearances of two notable stars, besides Paderewski, De Pachmann, Gerardy, various familiar stars like Sembrich and Caruso and a transferred star like Bonci, in various familiar operas, with concerts, orchestral and otherwise, and recitals galore, should be enough to satisfy the appetite of the most insatiate musical glutton.

It would be curious to know which of his attendant counsellors, sapient and wise, advised Mr. Conried to open his season of grand opera with a work like "Adriana Lecouvreur." A more injudicious choice could hardly be imagined, for this opera, pretty and charming as it is musically, well cast, well sung and well staged as it was, is a miniature, a genre picture, quite out of place in the heroic frame of the Metropolitan. At the Manhattan its beauties would have come out; in the Metropolitan they were lost. Not that I think Cilea's opera is great music by any means, but it is pretty music, well made and exceptionally well scored, and certainly deserved a better reception than the listless and chilly indifference which greeted it on Monday night. Mme. Cavalieri, much improved in voice, certainly played the part of the heroine well, also, but she has neither the volume of voice nor the personality requisite to dominate in so large a salle as the Metropolitan.

And this suggests the question indicated by the heading of this article. How far is personality desirable in art; how far is it necessary, to what extent may it be useful, and to what extent baleful and detrimental?

Upon the possible answers to these questions practically depends the whole future of opera in New York. There can be no question that the American musical public has gone mad over personality in art. No play can be successful without at least one star, real or manufactured for the occasion. Apparently no opera of any school possesses any inherent interest for the public unless its presentation is pointed or emphasized by the presence of c[illegible] familiar and attractive to the public. In other words, the American public who to-day are paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars to hear in two first-class opera houses what are probably the best performances of opera ever heard in New York or anywhere else, care nothing about the operas themselves and are only interested in the singers. It cannot be denied that the average opera performance as seen in the great capitals of Europe is, in almost every respect, far below the excellence and average merit of the performances which the American public demand as their right, before they are even content, much less enthusiastic.

The all-star casts inaugurated many years ago by Messrs. Abbey and Grau are undoubtedly responsible for this attitude on the part of the public toward opera, and the ball, once started rolling, is difficult to stop. In such an opera-house as the Metropolitan dominant personalities seem a positive necessity to impress upon an audience the idea that they are getting their money's worth. As an evidence of this one may adduce the positive sensation made by M. Chaliapine as Mefistofele on Wednesday night. Here was an artist who dominated his audience to an extent seldom witnessed by the sheer force of a magnificent personality, which was physically magnetic as well as vocally and dramatically intense. Probably for the first time a New York operatic audience realized just what Boito's "Mefistofele" meant, and it can hardly be gainsaid that in this instance a personality was not only essential but beneficial. At Carnegie Hall last Sunday the house, which a week previous had been half empty for an excellent musical programme, was filled to overflowing because of the personal note swept by the presence of Mr. Edward German conducting a composition of his own. In some way or another, at almost every musical event given at this time in New York, an effort is made on the part of the management to attract the public by some personality, and the stronger the personality the greater the attraction. The Philharmonic Society star their conductor, Mr. Safonoff. The Boston Symphony, not content with their quarter of a century's reputation, are putting forward their present conductor, Dr. Muck, in the same way. We hear of Herr Pohlig, who is being featured rather than the orchestra he conducts, and so on through the entire series of musical events of whatever kind. We are not informed of the first presentation of Gounod's "Faust" this season, but we are requested to herald the advent of the new Marguerite. In whatever they do it is the personality that attracts the public; the opera or concert in which they appear is attractive, otherwise not.

Now artistically this is all wrong, and it can be confidently stated that opera of the excellence to which we have become accustomed can never be maintained in New York or become a permanent feature as it should in the life of the great public except by permanent endowment, unless we can do away with this running after personalities as such to the exclusion of any real interest in the operatic works themselves.

The operatic battle now waging between rival impresario, in plain English, is narrowed down to the question which involves success or failure, as to which impresario can obtain and retain for and in his organization the greatest personalities; and even more important than this, which has the longest purse with which to pay them. And if opera-going is to be simply a question of personalities there are not enough to go around. New productions of celebrated works seem to attract the public not a jot, and while it is an undoubted fact artistically that plays and operas make artists rather than the reverse, with the public it is the artist or artists alone which make the opera. Abroad it is different. There the public are attracted by their favorite opera which, when given with a more or less competent ensemble, not necessarily studded with great names, satisfies and pleases them. In this country our requirements are getting so exalted and unbounded in the matter of cast and scenic display that it will be impossible shortly for any manager to satisfy the public and exist financially.

The first performance of "Les Contes d'Hoffmann" at the Manhattan Opera-House was probably as good a performance of a most delightful work as could be given, and yet the second performance, even artistically better, did not attract the public as it should. The future success, too, of Massenet's "Thais," one of the most delightful of operatic works, will depend not on its beautiful score or on the excellent manner of its presentation, but simply and solely on the fact as to how far Miss Mary Garden, who comes to us with a personality ready-made, as so many great artists do not, will take with the American public.

Following the same line of argument, it was Paderewski's individuality and personality which at first impressed the public far more than his consummate art. And as instances of this kind can be multiplied, I can but repeat, and as strongly and emphatically as possible, that the present mad craze for personality in art is on the whole detrimental and injurious to a degree to the best interests of art. It is after all the work itself, not the interpreter, which really counts, for to endure, the work must have inherent, lasting qualities, while the interpreter, however great, must inevitably pass away, and their musical message is always as one written on the sand.

The present financial condition must inevitably affect the operatic situation largely this year, as opera given under such extravagant circumstances as it is now in New York must be more or less a luxury, and luxuries are the first things that people whose pocketbooks have been affected are likely to do without. It is both unnecessary and invidious to draw comparisons between the operatic performances of the week as given in our two great opera houses; both from an artistic standpoint are above the average that even we have been accustomed to. Perhaps the scenic display at the Metropolitan is more sumptuous than at the other house, but then the Manhattan has its acoustic advantages, very important in summing up the situation. Should Mr. Hammerstein find that the novelties he intends to present this season which, be it noted, are all in the line of showing the advantages his house possesses, prove attractive to the public as such, the idea suggests itself that owing to its individual characteristics the Manhattan might well become the Opera Comique of New York without in any way interfering with Mr. Hammerstein's managerial ambition, lessening the incalculable good which he alone and unaided is doing to opera in New York, or decreasing the respect and gratitude due him from the New York public for his liberality, energy and enterprise.

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEW
UTICA, N. Y
NOV 24 1907

Mail orders are coming in to Mrs. Smith in gratifying numbers for the two orchestra concerts to be given at Convention Hall in January under her management, the New York Symphony, Walter Damrosch, conductor, on Friday, Jan. 3, the Boston Symphony, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, on Monday, Jan. 27. As was the case with Paderewski, such reservations will be cared for in advance of the public sale. The prices for the orchestras are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents, but those buying for both concerts at the same time secure the $2 seats for both at $3 and the $1.50 seats at $2.50, no reductions on either the $1 or the 75-cent seats. Those wishing to reserve in advance of the general sale are asked to send their mail orders, accompanied by check, payable to Mai Davis Smith, to Mrs. Smith at 26 Irving place.

NEWS
ALTIMORE, MD
NOV

Paderewski will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 4 at the Lyric.

[69]

JOURNAL
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I
NOV 20 1907
Date

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Performance Marks Season's Opening by Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Providence season last evening in Infantry Hall. There was a good attendance and a very interesting programme, in which brilliancy stood for the keynote. As for the performance, it was what we have come to expect and accept at the hands of the Boston orchestra as a matter of course—spirited, sympathetic and technically remarkable for its brilliancy, power and precision. The order of the programme was as follows:

"Wallenstein." Trilogy, after the Dramatic Poem of Schiller, op. 12.....D'Indy
1. Wallenstein's Camp.
2. Max and Thekla (The Piccolomini).
3. The Death of Wallenstein.

Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54.....Schumann
1. Allegro affettuoso.
2. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso.
3. Allegro vivace.

Overture to "Genoveva," op. 81.....Schumann

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, played here for the first time last night, proved a most welcome novelty. Patrons of the symphony concerts have been heard to complain in the past because so little of new music appears on the programmes for Providence. It may be no better than the old, but it has been felt that an occasional introduction to the music of the moderns, the music that is being talked about and made a bone of critical contention, would be most welcome. Perhaps Dr. Muck will prove to be more generous in this regard than his predecessors. At all events this brilliant and picturesque music of D'Indy's was received with the greatest cordiality and was distinctly the feature of the programme.

New though it was to the audience of last night, this trilogy is by no means new music. Several years in the process of construction, it was finished more than a quarter of a century ago. At that time M. D'Indy had not assumed the "advanced" position toward the art of music which he is understood to hold today. One could wish that he might have remained untroubled by fads and theories, for this music is fresh, rich and vital. Nor does it lack the note of individuality. It sins against the "modern" canons, it is true, by recognizing the existence of form and in mixing the colors of the orchestral palette with concords rather than discords. Still, that is not an unforgivable offence. It must be remembered that those whose names are by common consent written highest on music's roll of fame made the same mistake.

It seems a pity, therefore, that M. D'Indy should not have chosen to follow the paths on which he had entered brilliantly when this music was written. It is not given to whoever chooses to change the course of an art. In music there have been in three centuries but two men who can be called epoch-makers. Nor, indeed, did they achieve their influence by flying directly in the face of tradition. Instead of wrenching away the cornerstone, they added to the structure. Had M. D'Indy's ambition not outrun his judgment he would have utilized the conspicuous talent, the ready invention, the firm grasp of the orchestra displayed in this "Wallenstein" trilogy, to have given the world splendid music, music that would live. The orchestra played this number with splendid sonority and precision, and Dr. Muck conducted most sympathetically.

Mme. Olga Samaroff was the soloist of the evening. As might have been predicted with a fair degree of certainty, she chose the A-minor concerto of Schumann. One wonders what there is about this particular concerto that every pianist should have it in his or her repertory and produce it on every possible occasion. Are there no other works of this class worth playing? There is legitimate cause for complaint here. Once a year, not oftener, we hear one of the great concertos for piano and orchestra. About three times out of four it is Schumann's A-minor. It is not that the work is not a fine one, well enough worth the hearing. But any fare palls upon the palate with constant repetition. The mystery deepens when one reflects that this particular piece offers no great opportunity for the soloist. It is not a case of the piano first and the orchestra nowhere. If it were, the persistent choice might be understood. The problem is too deep for the reviewer, and must be passed up to the soloist and the programme maker.

As for Mme. Samaroff's playing, it was enjoyable and artistic, as usual. This young pianist has many admirable points, a clean cut touch, the ability to round out a phrase or to sing a melody convincingly, no lack of temperament, musical feeling, poise—in short, all necessary qualifications. She was warmly applauded, and recalled several times.

The concert closed with a fine rendering of the overture to Schumann's well-nigh forgotten opera "Genoveva," in which the orchestra again displayed its remarkable skill and unity of effort. The series of symphony concerts for this season consists of three performances, as has been the custom for several years past. The next will occur on the evening of Tuesday, Dec. 31.

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 24 1907

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 3, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will be marked by the presence of Paderewski as soloist, his only appearance with the orchestra in Washington this year. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The other works on the programme will be d'Indy's symphonic trilogy, "Wallenstein," and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I
NOV 20 1907

OPENED ITS SEASON AT INFANTRY HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MADE FIRST APPEARANCE

A Very Large Audience Greets the Well-Known Musicians. Olga Samaroff the Soloist. Programme Interesting, but Not Exciting.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 27th season in Providence last evening, the famous organization being welcomed at Infantry Hall by a large audience. The programme which Dr. Muck, the conductor, now in his second season as leader of the Symphony, chose for the first of the three concerts was as follows:

"Wallenstein," trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, op. 12, D'Indy; Concerto in A-minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54, Schumann; overture to "Genoveva," op. 81, Schumann; soloist, Olga Samaroff.

It need scarcely be said that such a preponderance of Schumann music had its effect in making the concert more substantial than inspiring. There was never yet an audience which roused itself to such enthusiasm over Schumann as for the more dramatic, if less romantic and elusive, masters. The programme was, indeed, more for those whose opportunity to acquaint themselves with the orchestral concert is more frequent. The D'Indy offering, one of the Symphony's novelties this year, could have been replaced by a Beethoven or a Mozart symphony to advantage, as in the miniature season of three concerts in Providence the public gets little enough of the classic. There was entertainment in plenty in the grotesquely beautiful music of the Frenchman, and yet it was not too heartily received.

Just why also, in view of the many concertos for piano and orchestra still unheard here, Schumann's opus 54 in A-minor should be selected twice within the same year is not quite explicable save on the ground that it is always a pleasure. Mme. Samaroff, who played it last evening, offered in her reading of it a contrast to the rendering given by Germaine Schnitzer at the concert of Jan. 3 (second concert or last season) and in that there was material for discussion among the music students. In all it was not a concert the most brilliant of those which the orchestra has given here and, compared to the ovation aroused by the opening event last season, a certain chill seemed to fall upo the large audience which was, however, very cordial to the soloist.

The "Wallenstein Trilogy of D'Indy, something between a symphony and a tone-poem, is an interesting but not the most startling example of the new school of composers being, indeed, one of his early compositions not exactly typical of the newest departures in daring orchestral writing. Still it is well colored with peculiar and original combinations, most of them more grotesque than lovely, others full of genuine beauty. Intended to embody the spirit of Schiller's "Wallenstein" it portrays three scenes, "the Camp of Wallenstein," the "Piccolomini" (called "Max and Thekla" by the composer) and Wallenstein's death. The first movement will be recalled for its wild grotesquerie, reflecting the carousing soldiers, and the dominant, or interrupting theme, martial and emphatic, which characterises the general. There is a certain fluency, but not enough, in the movement; its motives are not closely knit, and yet its progress is very energetic. The second part, depicting a romance closing in desolation, has a charm entirely different from the other parts of the Trilogy. Melody, brief, but real, lies well upon the surface, and as an "andante" it marks D'Indy's best achievement in the work. The introduction to the "death of Wallenstein" suggests Grieg's "Asa's Tod" in the "Peer Gynt" Suite by its rhythmic imitation of the labored respiration, and is extremely clever. A melee of troubles that exert the entire orchestra give "Wallenstein" a soldier's death, and bold, contrasting moods, with opportunities for the harps as well as the brass and strings, produce a new astonishment even if the movement falls to make a definite appeal. On the whole it is music more worth while for the curiosity seeker, more strangely than really beautiful.

The overture to Schumann's "Genoveva," one of the most undramatic and intensely involved of overtures, as it was part of his dismal failure at opera writing, is nevertheless full of romantic, graceful music and was gratefully heard, though it is distinctly different from the overtures to which the concert goer is accustomed. Its finale is not half so exciting as Schumann obviously intended it to be when he wrested it from the contemplative passage that it so abruptly closes.

Olga Samaroff, a pianist familiar to Providence, won deservedly the encores that followed her well proportioned, clear and inspiring rendering of the concerts. Apparently her technique is as flawless as heretofore, and her tone production as mellow. At times she reduced it somewhat below the power necessary for the exact contrast with the orchestral body of sound, but such delicacy of touch was never heard to better effect than in the Andante Grazioso, and in the Cadenza as through the mazes of the Allegro vivace she played with just the requisite bravura.

Dr. Muck, who conducted with his usual deep insight and sympathy, was heartily welcomed last evening, and the audience noted with interest the presence of the new concert-meister, Mr. Wendling, and his colleague at the first desk, Mr. Czerwonky. The orchestra gave a performance typical of its distinguishing excellence, save for occasional sputterings in the brass, which should not go unheeded, some uncertainty in that quarter which is all the more noticeable in such an orchestra, having been remarked in the previous year.

The next concert in the series will be

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I
NOV 24 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first of the series of concerts by the Boston Sympony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, on Tuesday evening, called out a very large and brilliant assemblage of society and musical people.

In the audience were noted President Faunce of Brown University, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. William Binney, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Campbell, Miss Helen Campbell, Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Miss Marion Brown, Col. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur L. Kelly, Mrs. Louis E. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Sweetland, Miss Louise Sweetland, Miss Louise Hoppin, Mr. George A. Freeman, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. William Harkness Arnold, Mrs. James H. Coggeshall, Mrs. George H. Corliss, Miss Maria Corliss, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Mrs. Howard O. Sturges, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Hodgman, Mrs. George L. Shepley, Miss Shepley, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnell, Mrs. Charles G. King, Rev. and Mrs. Augustus M. Lord, Miss Edith Kimball, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. Albert Steinert, Mrs. Samuel Slater Durfee, Mrs. E. D. Pearce, Miss North, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Miss Helen Metcalf, Mrs. Gustav Radeke, Miss Harriett Hazard, Mrs. Alfred M. Coats, Hon. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith, Mr. Harold Waterman, Miss Louise Lippitt, Mr. Howard K. Hoppin, Mr. Henry D. Sharpe, Mrs. Charles Matteson, Mr. Edward I. Nickerson, Mrs. Lyra Nickerson, Mrs. William H. Thurber, Miss Clementine Butler, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Miss Caroline Kelly, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mr. and Mrs. George Hail, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss A. Lorraine Johnson, Mr. Courtlandt Dorrance, Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Miss Harriott E. Barrows, Mr. Robert P. Walger, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Fenner, Mr. and Mrs. Dexter B. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert E. Maine, Miss Helen Chase, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Mrs. Frank D. Simmons, Mrs. C. Moulton Stone, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Parks, Col. A. K. Goodwin, Miss Margaret Kent Goodwin, Pawtucket; Mrs. George M. Smith, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Mr. Hans Schneider, Mr. Joseph Bowen, Miss Dorothy Bowen, Mr. and Mrs. Lowell Emerson, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bubier, Mrs. Annie Gilbreth Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mrs. Walter H. Durfee, Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Mrs. E. B. Smith, Mrs. Robert F. Noyes, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sisson, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Ostby, Mrs. E. B. Knight, Miss Amelia Knight, Mrs. Morton Otis, Chicago.

STAR.
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 24 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, December 3, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will be marked by the presence of Paderewski as soloist, his only appearance with the orchestra in Washington this year. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The other works on the program will be d'Indy's symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein," and Lalo's overture "Le Roi d'Ys."

STAR.
NOV 24 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, December 3, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will be marked by the presence of Paderewski as soloist, his only appearance with the orchestra in Washington this year. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The other works on the program will be d'Indy's symphonic trilogy "Wallenstein," and Lalo's overture "Le Roi d'Ys."

TIMES
WASHINGTON D. C
NOV 24 190

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 3, at 4:30 o'clock. This concert will be marked by the presence of Paderewski as soloist, his only appearance with the orchestra in Washington this year. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The other works on the program will be d'Indy's Symphonic Trilogy, "Wallenstein," and Lalo's overture, "Le Roid' Ys."

STAR.
WASHINGTON, D. C
NOV 24 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, December 3, for its second concert of the present season. The Philadelphia Orchestra follows Tuesday afternoon, Decembe

...OMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
Address
Date NOV 24

PADEREWSKI

The programme for the next Boston Symphony concert, December 2, will be largely dominated by the personality of the soloist, Paderewski, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto in E flat major. His lyric exposition of a Beethoven sonata a few weeks ago in the Academy will prepare us for an equally temperamental and modern rendering of this famous work. For the symphony Doctor Muck has chosen Brahms's second in D major, a work in which the modern apostle of the profound expressed that grace of melodic line and that quiet gaiety of mood with which grave, deep-souled people sometimes surprise us.

This symphony, composed, it is thought, at Lichtenthal in the summer of 1877, was first given a hearing as a pianoforte duet before an audience invited by the composer. The following December saw it performed, under Richter's conductorship, by the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin. The Schumann "Genoveva" overture completes the programme.

...ress
...te NOV 24

...orchestra.

—Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening of next week. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia, and he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor." The symphony will be Brahms' second in D major, and the other item on the program will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

...Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
...n
...ress
...e

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, December 2. This will be his only appearance with orchestra in Philadelphia and he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor." The symphony will be Brahms' second in D major, and the other item on the program will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

AMERICAN
...ALTIMORE, MD
NOV 24 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Paderewski will make his only appearance in Baltimore with an orchestra at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, December 4. He will play Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte in E flat, "The Emperor." Dr. Muck has placed no symphony on this program, but will introduce two novelties, of which much is expected. One is a tone poem by Ernst Boehe entitled "Taormina" and the other is an Adagio and Scherzo-Finale by Reznicek, composer of the opera comique, "Donna Diana." The other item on the program is Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

NEWS
...TIMORE, MD

Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer, whose violin concerto made such a sensation last season when played by Maud Powell with the New York Philharmonic, and whose second symphony made such a favorable impression when presented by Dr. Muck, has finished a third symphony (in C major). Sibelius has something to say, and, his ideas and methods being sane, his doings will be watched with keen interest.

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
BALTIMORE, MD
NOV 24 1907

Paderewski will make his only appearance in Baltimore with orchestra at the next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at the Lyric on Wednesday, December 4. He will play Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte in E flat, "The Emperor." Dr. Muck has placed no symphony on this program, but will introduce two novelties of which music is expected. One is a tone poem by Ernst Boehe, entitled "Taormina," and the other is an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, composer of the opera comique, "Donna Diana." The other number on the program is Schumann's

Newark News
Nov. 30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The personality and the achievement of any musical director, who conducts the performances of such a great orchestra as the Boston Symphony, which will give its first concert in Newark in the Krueger Auditorium Monday night, December 9, have an interest for all who delight in the interpretations of the finest compositions by creative genius in musical expression. Therefore a few words about Dr. Karl Muck, who is the guiding and animating spirit in the Boston Symphony and will occupy the post of conductor at the coming concert, should be welcomed by those unacquainted with his notable career.

Dr. Muck is enjoying his second year's leave of absence from his duties as conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. With much difficulty the Boston Symphony Orchestra succeeded in the spring of 1906 in securing Emperor William's consent to his absence from the German capital for a year. His success in this country last season has become a part of our musical history, and great was the rejoicing when last spring it was announced that the Emperor had extended his leave for another year, which, unfortunately, is most likely to be his last in America.

Dr. Muck was born in Wuerzburg, Bavaria, on October 22, 1859. His father, a government official, was a talented amateur musician and gave the future conductor his first lessons, teaching him violin, piano and counterpoint. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later was a violinist in the local symphony orchestra. He became a resident at the University of Heidelberg in 1876, where he remained one year. Thence he went to Leipsic, where he matriculated in the university and at the same time entered the Conservatory of Music. In the university he worked for his degree of "doctor juris" in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, while in the conservatory his teachers were Karl Reinecke and Ernst Friedrich Richter. He made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in 1880, the same year in which he received his university degree.

Following his original plan to become a conductor, he took as his first engagement the post of chorus master in the opera at Zurich, where he stayed during the season of 1880-1881. Thence he went to Salzburg, where he was the conductor of the opera from 1881 to 1884. His first post of real importance was the conductorship at Graz, in Austria, which he occupied for two years following his engagement at Brunn. There he gave the first uncut performance of "Die Meistersinger" in Austria. During his stay in Graz he was the conductor of the important Styrian Musical Society, and in February, 1886, gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's seventh symphony, his performance of which work was one of the sensations of the past musical season in Boston and New York.

His success in Graz was so great that in 1886 he was called to Prague to be conductor of the German opera and the Philharmonic Orchestra in that city. This post he held until 1892, and while in Prague he was the conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to give in that country the first performances of Wagner's "Ring." In 1891 Neumann took an opera company to the Lessing Theatre in Berlin, giving the first performances in that city of "Cavalleria Rusticana," "The Barber of Bagdad" and Mahler's revised version of "The Three Pintos." So profound was the impression he made that he was immediately offered the post of principal conductor of the Berlin opera, his associate being Felix Weingartner. This post he still holds. His progress in public esteem has been very rapid since he went to Berlin. In the festivals of 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906, he was the conductor of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. In 1904-5 and 1905-6 he shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the celebrated Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and this year, had he not returned to America, he was to have conducted all of them. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Schleswig music festival. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow, in Madrid and Barcelona, in Paris and London, in Brussels and Amsterdam, in Hamburg, Bremen and Budapest. For one season he was the conductor of the German opera at Covent Garden, London. He has never composed.

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here will not be one by a section of the band, but will employ its full strength of ninety-seven musicians, every one of whom ranks among the best of his kind in this world. The audience also will have the pleasure of hearing Mme. Olga Samaroff, the talented pianist, who will appear as one of the soloists. Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager of the concert, is receiving orders for reserved seats at his office, 794 Broad street. There requests, when accompanied by checks or money orders, are placed on file and will be filled the day before the general sale opens at the Lauter company's music warerooms next Wednesday morning. Orders are also being received by him for the recital to be given by Paderewski, the great pianist, in the Krueger Auditorium, Tuesday night, December 17.

Newark Evn. Star. Nov. 30

Boston Symphony Seat Sale.

The public sale of seats for the first appearance in Newark of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will open at Lauter's, 657-659 Broad street, next Wednesday morning. The concert, as has been already announced, will be given in the Krueger Auditorium on Monday night, December 9, and will begin at 8 o'clock precisely. The orchestra will stay in New York after its matinee on Saturday afternoon, December 7, purposely for this concert, and those who have not been able to attend its concerts in Carnegie Hall will have the opportunity of listening to its playing here under the same conditions which prevailed there.

The soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff, is also a newcomer in Newark, and much is promised of her. Mme. Samaroff, despite her Russian name, is a native-born American; in fact, she is very native born, as she was born at the government army post in San Antonio, Tex., where her father was an officer. Of course, a great deal of her life has been spent abroad, but she is thoroughly American, and she did what few dare to do—she began her career in this country before she had ever played in public abroad. Her career of the last three years is a standing refutation of the hackneyed charge that no musician can succeed in America without a European cachet. In three years from an absolutely unknown girl, without "pull" or influence of any kind, she has become one of the foremost and popular pianists in this country. She has been soloist with all the great orchestras of America, and has played at least a dozen times with the Boston Symphony.

To play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra means more for an artist than to play with any other orchestra in this country, for not only is it the leading organization of its kind, but it has very few soloists, and its choice is restricted to the very best. Mme. Samaroff, having had three more successful seasons in America, is going to spend next year abroad, and she will make her European debut with the famous Colonne orchestra at the Chatelet, in Paris, on the third Sunday of next October. She is to play with the leading orchestras of London, Berlin, Vienna and other musical centres.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is of more than ordinary interest. It comprises a characteristic work by the great living French composer, Vincent d'Indy; pianoforte concerto by Edward Grieg, the noted Norwegian, who died a few months ago, and a characteristic work by the great Schumann. D'Indy's work will be the Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," based upon Schiller's trilogy of dramas. The Schumann work will be the overture to the opera "Genoveva."

Paderewski Here December 17.

Ignace Jan Paderewski, the world-famous pianist, who will appear at the Krueger Auditorium Tuesday evening, December 17, seems to be more popular than ever. Since his arrival in this country, he has played to the capacity of the larger halls and theatres wherever he has appeared. In fact the crowds that flock to hear him are larger than at any time during the pianist's career. A mere announcement that he is to give a recital is sufficient to fill almost any hall. One reason why Paderewski draws so well, outside of the fact that he is a great pianist, is because he works so hard to please his audience. He is always very liberal with encores. Those desiring to secure seats for his Newark recital before the opening of the regular sale, at Lauter's piano warerooms, December 12, can send their order, accompanied by check or money order, to Frederick N. Sommer, 794 Broad street, this city.

STAR,
NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 26 1907

BIG SALE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

The demands for seats for the Boston Symphony concert, which will be given at the Krueger Auditorium Monday evening, December 9, is very large. A full house is already assured.

Olga Samaroff, the distinguished pianist who will be the soloist, with the orchestra is an American girl, having been born in San Antonio, Tex., where her father, an officer in the army, was stationed. She is of German and Russian stock, and most of her life has been spent abroad. As a child she was given to the care of her maternal grandmother, one of the most distinguished pianists of Germany, and from her she took her first lessons. Her girlhood she spent in a convent in Paris, where she studied with the elder Marmontel and Widor.

In 1895, with 176 others, she went before the jury of the Paris Conservatoire to be examined for admission to that institution. She was one of the twelve successful candidates, and she was put into Delaborde's classes, with whom she worked for five years. Then she went to Berlin, where she stayed for four years, studying with the famous Russian teacher, Jodlicska, who died in the summer of 1904. It was he who told her that she was ready for a public career.

The concert will begin precisely at 8:15 o'clock. The sale of seats opens at Lauter's on Wednesday, December 4.

NEWS
NOV 26 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert to be given by the great Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium Monday night, December 9, will begin promptly at 8:15 o'clock, and late arrivals will not be admitted to the hall during the performance of the opening number. Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager of this concert, as well as of the recital to be given by Paderewski in the same place Tuesday night, December 17, has received at his office, 794 Broad street, many orders for reserved seats from residents of Newark's suburbs and New York. For both events these have been sold to New

CALL
NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 24 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A Fine Program Will Be Rendered at the Newark Concert Monday Evening, December 9.

A most interesting program has been prepared by Dr. Muck for the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in the Krueger Auditorium in Newark on Monday evening, December 9. The first number will be a symphonic trilogy by the great French composer, Vincent d'Indy, entitled "Wallenstein,"

DR. KARL MUCK,
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

a work which has been played with great success in Boston and elsewhere. The other purely orchestral piece will be Schumann's beautiful overture, "Genoveva."

The soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, than whom there is no more brilliant woman pianist now playing in public. She has won great success in America in the last three years, which is all the more notable because she started in America and has yet to play in Europe. Her first appearance in Europe will be next October, with the famous Colonne Orchestra, in Paris. Madame Samaroff will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. Sale of tickets opens at Lauter's on December 4. Mail orders are now being received by F. N. Sommer, 794 Broad street.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—DECEMBER 1, 1907.

Seventh Symphony Program.

Boehe's tone poem, "Taormina," began the seventh Symphony program, Kreisler, the distinguished violinist, followed as soloist in Lalo's charming "Spanish" symphony and Beethoven's noble second symphony was the final number. Kreisler is one of the few great violinists of the present day, and although a specialist in compositions of the 17th and 18th centuries this does not distract his interest from works of more modern writers. In Lalo's symphony there is such a riot of harmonies for the solo instrument, which is almost constantly in evidence, that it requires unusual physical power as well as artistic skill to cope with the long and intricate score. And to every demand Kreisler is able to respond. But four of the five parts were played, the third movement being omitted.

Kreisler's recent appearances here in recitals have shown his complete mastery of the violin. He is equally "at home" with moderns as with the antiques and in his performance of Lalo's work he gave anew a vivid illustration of his wonderful virtuosity. In the higher realms of his art as in the more showy movements he has shown himself to be one of the foremost exemplars of the possibilities of the violin and extended praise now would be but reiteration of an oft told tale.

In the first movement there was dignity and authority shown in the broad and vital tones of the earlier part. Very beautiful were the singing phrases and caprices of the second part and the andante was played with splendid effect, the florid passages showing up brilliantly by reason of Kreisler's dazzling technique. The finale was even more satisfying than the previous movement, for it showed a sustained power and surety in chord fingering and runs that few violinists are able to maintain. The whole performance was one of great beauty in expression, shading, vigor and delicacy. Hearty applause and many recalls to the platform were given him at the close of his work.

The orchestra association in the Lalo symphony was enough to inspire the soloists, for it was ensemble playing of a high and thoroughly sympathetic nature. Boehe's tone poem is a complicated instrumental affair, the work of a composer who evidently strove for odd combinations, dissonants and queer modulations to make up a musical picture which to him, and probably to some other musical experts, has form and lucidity. So far as the performance went, the orchestra did its part skilfully under Dr Muck's guiding hand. A spirited performance of the Beethoven symphony closed the program.

The orchestra will be away this week on its second tour. The program for Dec. 13 and 14 will comprise Bizet's overture, "Patrie"; MacDowell's suite, op. 42, and the F major symphony by Hermann Goetz.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BOEHE'S RESOUNDING AND EMPTY "TAORMINA"

A New Tone-Poem by the Young German Composer That Proves Only One More Exercise—His Ample and Accomplished Orchestral Technique—And Why "Taormina"?—The Contrasting Early Beethoven—Kreisler, Lalo and the Voice of the Violin

Ernst Boehe is a young German composer, who has not quite rounded his twenty-seventh year. He dwells at Munich; early he chose the composing of music as a career and already he has written four "Episodes" for orchestra, "From the Voyages of Ulysses," a few songs and sundry other pieces. Two years and a half ago Mr. Gericke put one of the "Episodes"—"Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck"—on the programme of a Symphony Concert. So far as the music left any abiding impression, it was that of fluent progressions, large sonorities, and the play of an ample orchestral technique. It was rhetorical music; steadily it "sounded," but unfortunately it was little else than excited sound. However eloquent his voice, Boehe had not much to say with it. All the suggestions of expository "programmists" could not make his tone-poem delineative. The ear heard; but answering imagination was still. Nor was the music interesting in itself, except as an example of an advanced exercise in ultra-modern orchestral technique by an accomplished and promising student. It was comforting to know that when Boehe found something to say, he had the resources with which he might say it, but there seemed to be no obvious reason why twenty audiences from Dresden as far as Boston should be convoked as witnesses to what a sportsman might call his "preliminary trials."

"Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" went the way of the forgotten, and when Ernst Boehe's name stood again on the programme of the Symphony concert, yesterday afternoon, it was practically new. Apparently he has paid a visit to Taormina, the agreeable winter residence on the eastern shore of Sicily, sought by British matrons of fixed income and habits and by conscientious German tourists. Taormina is a pleasant place; there indeed the idler may idle and invite his soul in the warm Sicilian sun and the soft Sicilian wind, look up at the cone of Etna, snowy without in spite of the smouldering heats within, and laugh with the smiling ripples of the distant sea. There are the grays of the gnarled olives; there the brown and green of Sicilian rocks and hills. Around in endlessly changing eddies flows the placid Sicilian life, or if weariness come of our own time and folk stand for musing, a few spared pillars and a semi-circle of dismantled seats that once were a Roman theatre. The photograph that summarizes all these things is familiar. Every Mediterranean tourist brings it home. It is even on the cover of Boehe's new tone-poem that Dr. Muck and the orchestra played yesterday for a first hearing, probably, on this side of the sea. For life at Taormina or haunting memories of it seemingly stirred Boehe to the writing of music. Of course he wrote a tone-poem, a longish one, "for grand orchestra" even to bells. On the cover he put the title "Taormina," the picture, and the dedication to his "dear wife." If he had a programme, he gives his hearers no hint of it, and they, as Mr. Newman long since said, have the same right to know it as he to imagine it. If it was essential to him, it is also essential to them. Was he setting down in tones the thoughts, feelings, persistent memories or vagrant impressions that the charm and the associations of Taormina stirred in him? Liszt and d'Indy and twenty other composers have made little musical memoranda of their journeyings, and Elgar wrote a whole overture, "In the South," out of a few weeks in an Italian village. Except for title and picture, again Boehe is mute.

Certainly the music itself in a single hearing gives little clew. It contains Gregorian chants that smack more of Ratisbon and German musical scholarship than of Taormina and pagan and unlettered Sicily. There is long-drawn, expressive, songful melody, a little Italian in its cut and pungency. There are pompous climaxes, grave and darkly colored passages, moments of melodic and instrumental agitation and bells echoing against the Gregorian tunes. What does it all signify? Not much more apparently than did "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" of the much enduring Odysseus. Once more does Boehe demonstrate his command of a sure and sumptuous orchestral technique; once more his music mounts in large progressions to sounding climaxes. The climax dissolves into its thematic and instrumental elements and the process begins again. The whole is ultra modern orchestral pomp and fluency of the sort in which youngsters are becoming as practised nowadays as their composing grandfathers were in counterpoint for counterpoint's sake. With the best will in the world, we could hear nothing in the music but an exercise in orchestral rhetoric upon Gregorian and other melodies. The mood, the imaginings, were orchestral and nothing else. The tone-poem suggested no individual. Boehe recorded no discernible impressions or emotions, bade the listener to no response and had no keen interest as so much music. As for Taormina, Boehe might seemingly have called his tone-poem "Sudbury" or "North Weymouth," had he happened to know those places. But when with the ripening of time, he has something to say how eloquently he can say it!

The contrast of the rest of the programme was two-fold; first, in Beethoven's symphony in D major—the symphony of high spirits, as Berlioz or someone else has called it—and, second, in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, with Mr.

[71]

BOSTON HERALD—DECEMBER 1, 1907

...Brahms's solo part. Beethoven had something to say in his symphony, though it was only his second, and the matter of his musical speech was so interesting that the listener almost forgot the perfect fitness of its manner. Once more Dr. Muck did his familiar work with a classic. He found the underlying melodies; caught their individual and expressive quality, and set his orchestra to the singing of them in its own warmth of tone, roundness of phrase and euphony of balanced voice. Pace, rhythm, shadings, all gave the symphony a new vitality, a new brightness. It wrought its spell of mood, as movement succeeded movement, because the conductor had caught its large and clear significance and spirit and was imposing them through his men upon his hearers. The voice was the full voice of the music. The conductor was content to find it, set it free, give it life. Dr. Muck has done these things many times with other classic symphonies, but it is good to recall them anew. Perhaps in the sum of his work they make a finer achievement than all his dramatizing of operatic overtures and all the passion and power, suggestion and subtlety that he can give to ultra-modern music. And when Beethoven thus finds his true voice in this second symphony the listener hears with the pure joy, now of spirited, now of musing, now of capricious song, with a whole orchestra, as orchestras went in the those days, for the singer. Alas for young Boehe in such richness, energy, gayety or tenderness! Beethoven had something to say, something that spoke in its own clear beauty of matter and of manner, of substance and form, and that commanded response by its own joyous intensity. Nobody groped for clews. Everything spoke for itself.

Of another sort of contrast was Lalo's "symphony" for violin and orchestra as Mr. Kreisler in particular played his part in it. In a sense Lalo had none too much to say in his piece. His melodies are not intrinsically interesting; his handling of them is not remarkable for fine felicity of invention; his Spanish coloring of the music is no more than a deft and sparkling piquancy. But Lalo knew and loved the violin. He had something of the virtuoso's understanding of it and feeling for it. Thus, he could write music to which the voice of his chosen instrument could give an unforeseen beauty and vitality. The "Spanish Symphony" is one thing as it stands on the printed page; another thing as an ordinary violinist plays it; and yet a third as such a violinist as Mr. Kreisler gives it voice and life. Lalo destined it for Sarasate and often has he played it. Yet it seemed no less destined for Mr. Kreisler. In him, as in Lalo, are deep and fine understanding of the violin, intimate sympathy with it, warm passion for it. Like Lalo, Mr. Kreisler would give it perfect and compelling voice. Thus in the performance of yesterday composer and performer, music and instrument seemed blended in a jointless fusion. Steadily the orchestral background and the orchestral decoration enhanced the beauty, poignancy or vivacity of the violin. In that was the reason for their being. Steadily the melodies bade the violin to varied song and that again was now their clear purpose. No less than the voice is the violin capable of the brilliant ornaments of song, and Mr. Kreisler's playing touched those that Lalo had designed for it with a new sparkle. With an exceeding fineness or an exceeding brightness may the tone of the violin undulate or vibrate to subtle or sharp rhythms. Lalo knew the aptitude of the violin for them; they are in his music; and Mr. Kreisler bade them pulse in his tone. Throughout the "Spanish Symphony" awaits the perfect voice, the changeful intensities, the endless suggestion of the violin, and Mr. Kreisler called them forth. The beloved, the idealized instrument had something to say. H. T. P.

DECEMBER 2, 1907.
BOSTON HERALD—MONDAY

BISPHAM PLEASES IN LONG SONG LIST

Heartily Applauded at Recital for Benefit of Roxbury Aid Society.

David Bispham, baritone, gave a recital yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. His programme included Handel's "O Ruddier Than the Cherry," Beethoven's "Adelaide," Schubert's "The Wanderer," five songs from Schumann's "Dichterliebe," Strauss' "Caecille," Cornelius' "Monotone," six songs by Grieg (sung in memory of the composer), Chadwick's "O Let Night Speak of Me" and "Sweetheart, Thy Lips Are Touched with Flame," Liza Lehmann's "The Mad Dog" from "The Vicar of Wakefield," songs by Brahms, Max Heinrich, H. F. Gilbert, and an old Irish song, "The Stuttering Lovers." Harold O. Smith played the accompaniments. The concert was given for the benefit of the Roxbury Aid Society.

The programme announced "classical and popular songs," and the grouping was conventional, the early songs being placed first, so that the hearer, just arrived, would be the more likely to keep a stiff upper lip. To accept the classification of the programme there is little doubt that the "popular" songs gave the most general pleasure, and it was evident that to many in the audience the final group was the most grateful because it was sung in English.

Mr. Bispham is so well known here that the greeting given him was as that given to an old friend. He and Mr. Smith were handicapped by the necessary substitution of a piano, but this did not dampen the spirits or mar the enthusiasm of the audience, and it is only fair to add that the programme was carried through with admirable smoothness and gusto.

The audience was small, but it was well pleased and enthusiastic, and Mr. Bispham was obliged to lengthen the programme. It is announced that Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall will be continued.

NEW TONE POEM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boehe's "Taormina" Proves to Be Swollen Composition Without Significance.

BRILLIANT PERFORMANCE BY FRITZ KREISLER

Plays Lalo's Spanish Symphony, Displaying Fine Qualities of Artistry.

By PHILIP HALE.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Tone poem, "Taormina".....Boehe
"Spanish" symphony, for violin and orchestra.....Lalo
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

Boehe's "Taormina" was played in Boston for the first time. The composer was already known to us by his symphonic poem, "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," which was brought out here by Mr. Gericke March 3, 1906. When Boehe composed the latter piece he was about 22 years old, and the sumptuous instrumentation excited the admiration of some, who overlooked the thin, anaemic body thus richly dressed and forgot that Frenchmen of the younger generation learn instrumentation in the nursery.

"Taormina" was composed in 1905-06, and it was produced at Essen in the late fall of last year. The score has no printed programme, not even a motto, but there is a picture of the Sicilian town famous for the view. Did Boehe purpose to put into music his thoughts and feelings excited by the view, or had he in mind the past glory of the town when it was possessed successively by Dionysius, Carthaginians, Saracens, Normans and still later French invaders, as Elgar, in his overture, "In the South," expressed both the joy of life under an Italian sky and remembered the pompous splendor of the ancient Roman rule?

Boehe, as other young German composers, needs a monstrous orchestra. Not content with an enlarged wind choir, he calls for all sorts of pulsatile instruments, from tamtam to tambourine, and there must be bells behind the scenes. Much of the tone-poem is an elaboration of Gregorian songs. That which is ecclesiastical is contrasted with worldly emotion. Is the music supposed to portray in tones a day in Taormina, with religious services and processions, with the outdoor life, with gayety and passion? When the composer announces his title, the hearer has a right to expect music that shall suggest to him Sicilian scenes and life.

A tambourine in the orchestra is not enough in answer to this reasonable expectation. It is not necessary for the composer to take his themes from Sicilian folk tunes, to preserve constantly the rhythms of Sicilian dances. The hearer asks, however, that the music be suggestive of Sicily, or at least Italy. He has a right to expect that Boehe should attempt to do what Berlioz, Charpentier, Tchaikowsky, Richard Strauss have done, sojourning and loving Italy, or what Auber, who would not leave the boulevards of Paris, did in his "Muette de Portici," imagining the Neapolitan sun, street life and reckless gayety.

Is there anything of Sicily in Boehe's "Taormina"? Is there anything in it suggestive of southern life and sentiment? As far as suggestion by melody, rhythm, color is concerned, the tone-poem might as well be entitled Dortmund or Schenectady.

This music is neither pictorial nor decorative. It is certainly not emotional. Take the first long section built chiefly on Gregorian song, and what have we. An opening page of music that has an unusual and agreeable sound. The end has also a pleasant sound, and occasionally between the beginning and the end there are passages that are sonorous, but not so much by reason of skilful polyphony and a fine sense in the blend of timbres as by sheer orchestral weight. The motives that are designed to be emotional have little character or individuality. The treatment of them has seldom true effect. When the composer is terribly in earnest, as in the funeral march section, he is least successful. Notes, notes, notes.

Coleridge has said: "There is a nimiety—a too-muchness—in all Germans. It is the national fault." How well this remark applies to Boehe, who spins out his thin thoughts and will not dismiss a mood! A swollen piece, this "Taormina," with its huge orchestra which is never eloquent, never impressive, save by mere force of bulk.

Dr. Muck brought out all that there is in it and by his masterly reading exposed the inherent emptiness. The audience applauded warmly.

Mr. Kreisler gave a very brilliant and also sensuous performance of Lalo's delightful "Spanish" symphony. It was a pleasure to hear him again in a work of long and sustained beauty, in the performance of which he was able to show the many admirable qualities of his rare and indisputable artistry. And what a composition it is for the display of the virtuoso and for the interest, the ravishment of the hearer!

The symphony of Beethoven is an answer to those who insist that the inner emotions of a composer must find a vent in the music composed at the time. Never was Beethoven more wretched physically and mentally than when he wrote this symphony, music that breathes forth serenity, beauty, gayety and courage. It is a good thing to hear even the second symphony of Beethoven after a "Taormina." Like the work of Lalo, it reassures the hearer in the belief that music after all is an art, and that a composer may be inspired.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST. DECEMBER 1, 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT

At the seventh symphony rehearsal and concert Ernst Boehe's tone poem for orchestra, "Taormina," op. 9, was performed for the first time in this country; Fritz Kreisler played the Lalo "Spanish Symphony," and Beethoven's Second Symphony brought the concert to an end.

Boehe is known in this city by his "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," one of a cycle of four orchestral pieces, "The Voyages of Ulysses," which was given last season. The work did not make a profound impression at the time. It was found to be constructed of thin material and to savor not a little of the external characteristic of Richard Strauss and his ilk. But in spite of certain remarks by the gentlemen of the press, Boehe still lives and labors, and he has made, in our opinion, a very decided advance in the later work just performed. Evidently the tone poem is a form that especially appeals to him, a young composer with the blood of the rising generation in his veins. He has prefixed this score, not with a poem or an argument, but with a picture of the town of Taormina in Sicily, "the town," says the programme book, "known to the ancients as Tauromenium; the town on the eastern shore and with the superg view of hills and sea and Etna; the town that knew in turn the rule of Dionysius, Carthaginians, Saracens led by Ibrahmim-Ibu-Ahmed, Normans, and still later French invaders." Other inscription is there none, and Boehe thus fulfills the true mission of the tone poem and "programme music"—to communicate to the hearer, who may interpret as he will the general, basic impressions and emotions awakened by the contemplation of a subject, whatever that subject may be.

It is a natural thing that a young composer should look up to and be influenced by his more illustrious contemporaries; it is not strange that he should fall into mannerisms that corrupt, into tricks of speech that hinder vital and original expression. There is still the impression, in listening to this music, of a fondness which is not over-refined for orchestral richness and sonority on its own account; of a love for effects, pure and simple, that has not its origin in any very profound source. But the themes are far more potential. They live and have being. The Gregorian harmonies and the more sensuous song that makes its appearance a little later are strikingly contrasted and developed. The conclusion, with the tolling bells and the ecclesiastical strains merging themselves into the deep vibrations, is a truly suggestive moment.

There are pages of rich promise in this tone poem. The composer seems to be finding his own voice and developing a mastery of large proportions. It is a common fallacy that the tone poem offers an avenue of escape to those whose inspiration and constructive abilities fail them in the more rigid frame of the symphony. As a matter of fact, there is no form in which it is so difficult for the composer to master and weld his imagination, to create a durable masterpiece. Boehe appears to have found a congenial medium of expression and to be happily maturing in his workmanship.

There is little new that can be said about Mr. Kriesler. He is ever the great artist and he interpreted the concerto in a spirit that compassed the supremely complete expression of the French composer's thought. The characteristic qualities of the music were appreciated and revealed with refinement of style and a tone that was often sensuous but never lost its manly quality. The enthusiasm of the audience was apparently boundless—a well-deserved tribute to a superb performance.

The Beethoven symphony exerted its never failing charm. The extraordinary clearness and brilliancy of its instrumentation never fail to strike one afres.., even in these days of orchestral orgies. It was given a fine, brisk reading.

There will be no rehearsal and concert next week.

STAR,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NOV 27 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the directorship of Dr. Karl Muck, will give its second concert of the season at the New National next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. This time the organization has as its soloist Ignace Paderewski, who will play a Chopin concerto.

songs showed Grieg to much better advantage than do many of his other compositions, and we wish that they might figure more frequently on recital programmes. Among so many fine interpretations it is difficult to pick out any for particular mention, but Cornelius' "Ein Ton" was encored, and to the group of Grieg songs Mr. Bispham added "Ich liebe Wich" by the same composer. He also gave the familiar "Drink to me only with thine eyes" at the end of the programme. A most unfortunate but unavoidable difficulty with the pedal of the piano caused Mr. Harold O. Smith who played the accompaniments much trouble and he deserves commendation for the way in which he overcame this difficulty as well as for his remarkably able work throughout the entire afternoon. F. S. M.

[72]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER. MONDAY
DECEMBER 2, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Boehe. Tone-poem. "Taormina."
Lalo. Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra.

Soloist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

Beethoven Symphony in D, No. 2.

As the opening chord of the orchestra came at six minutes past eight, we suppose that "Taormina" began with 100 measures rest which Dr. Muck counted in the green room. After it had begun, however, we wished for more rests. Boehe shows great mastery of the modern orchestra, but that is a "metier" that has been conquered recently by very many composers who have little to say. The city council (or at least the sindace) of Taomina have cause to complain of the composer for raising a prejudice against their city. For ourselves, after hearing this tone-poem, we shall carefully avoid Taormina.

If tone-poems about cities are in order why does not some American tone-master write "Boston, a symphonic photograph"? There are many possibilities in this. He could begin with a figure like that fournoted one in Beethoven's violin concerto, only this "leit-motif" should give "B, B, B, B," to represent a Bigger, Busier and Better Boston. The mayor could be portrayed by honied passages upon the flute. A mournful andante could be made on the subject of finance investigations. After this 185 strokes of the kettle-drum could recall the fact that every man, woman and child owes $185 of the city debt. Mrs. Dall, addressing the school board on reform, would make a good scherzo, while the finale would naturally be bankruptcy, with a tax-collector-motive on the trombones.

To return to our "Taormina"—It has the bold modulations and the rhythmic juggleries which form the hall-mark of present-day music. No plain dominant-tonic cadence was taken if it could by any means be avoided. There was some dignified work for the brasses, near the end, which possibly suggested the ancient glories of the place. There were also bells rung to remind the hearer of how far this work lagged behind Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. There was considerable applause at the end, which the brilliant performance and careful reading certainly deserved.

Then came the "Spanish Symphony" with Kreisler in his finest form. We have had a little too much of Spanish music lately which perhaps took the edge off this work. It has the merit of placing the soloist well in the foreground, and keeping him there, which, however, is not at all symphonic. The Scherzo with its suggestions of Fandangoes and Cachucas and its rhythmic contrasts, was attractive and brilliant. The Carillon effect of the last movement ("Three Blind Mice" translated into Spanish) was also exciting, even if not so well carried out as the Carillon of Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne."

The solo work was of the most brilliant type and was yet so well welded to the orchestral parts as to prove Mr. Kreisler both musician and virtuoso. The broad G. string playing of the finale and the delicate grace of the Scherzo were especially noticeable, but every detail of the solo work was finely rendered and the recalls were very numerous. This season, more than ever before, Mr. Kreisler is proving that he must be counted among the very foremost violinists of the world.

We know that there were no rests to count at the beginning of Beethoven's second symphony, yet there was here also a "lunga pausa" of nearly 10 minutes between the calling back of the audience from the corridors and the commencement of the music.

The performance was not especially striking. We have heard the first two movements better done. It may be very heterodox to state it, but we found the Larghetto rather too long. It is considered by many to be the gem of the symphony, but taken after Boehe's ponderous crashes and Lalo's Spices its tender simplicity could make no headway. It was a clear case of one school neutralizing another.

Apart from the melodic beauty of the Larghetto there are some especial points of interest in this work. The first introduction of the scherzo to take the place of the minuet is here, and is a land-mark in musical history. The finale, too, is the beginning of a new departure. In almost every symphony before this time (1802) the influence of the gigue is felt. The old suite always had ended with a gigue (or "jig") and the symphony being a similar cycle form, was almost always ended gaily by Haydn and Mozart. Beethoven here substituted something broader and more resolute and earnest for this rollicking end. It was the first of the series of Beethoven's experiments with the finale.

Louis C. Elson.

DAVID BISPHAM'S SONG RECITAL.

PROGRAMME.

O Ruddier than the Cherry ("Acis and Galatea") .....Handel
Adelaide .....Beethoven
The Wanderer .....Schubert
Selections from "Dichterliebe"...Robt. Schumann
Erinnerung (Remembrance).....Joh. Brahms
Ein Ton.....Peter Cornelius
Caecilie .....Richard Strauss
Five Songs—In Memoriam.....Edward Grieg
O Let Night Speak to Me, Sweetheart, Thy Lips Are Touched with Flame.
George W. Chadwick
Who Knows?.....Max Heinrich
Pirate's Song.....Hy. F. Gilbert
The Mad Dog (from "The Vicar of Wakefield") .....Liza Lehmann
The Stuttering Lovers.....Old Irish

Sunday afternoon at Symphony hall Mr. David Bispham gave a song recital before a good sized audience, the size of the hall being taken into consideration. The programme covered a wide range of selections, ranging all the way from Handel's "Ruddier than the Cherry," through songs by Schumann, Schubert, Richard Strauss, etc., to Gilbert's Pirates' Song and the "Stuttering Lovers," an old Irish folk song. Throughout this taxing programme Mr. Bispham displayed to especial advantage his always admirable powers as an artist. He was in unusually good voice and sang during the entire afternoon with a degree of warmth and fervor which we have rarely heard equalled by him. Special mention should be accorded the group of Grieg songs (sung in memory of the composer), the first of which, appropriately enough, called "The Poet's Last Lay," was given with an [illegible] of solemnity. All

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

NEW AND BETTER SUNDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS

A Promising Beginning Yesterday at Symphony Hall—Mr. Bispham's Songs and Singing—The Orchestra at the Symphony Concert—A Good Word for One-Act Plays—The Amorous Millionaire on the London Stage—Kreisler's Programme for His Next Recital Here—Mary Shaw to Act in Boston—Mme. Melba Not to Sing in America This Winter

The new series of concerts on Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall began so auspiciously yesterday that they are really to be a series. For a beginning the audience was promisingly numerous, hearty in interest and applause and obviously composed of those whom the concerts would attract. Men seemed actually to predominate—especially the men who hear eminent singers and virtuosi gladly but who cannot leave their offices to hear them on the working afternoons of the week. And music after all was written for men as well as for women, while any performer of spirit likes a masculine audience to win. Numerous, too, were those who from habit or impulse find Sunday afternoon the most congenial of hours for the pleasure of music. The modest scale of prices had also brought those who cannot always afford the concerts that they crave, while scattered about the hall were those who are eager to encourage such entertainments on Sunday afternoon until they become the established thing with the givers of concerts and the habit among the goers to them that they are in other musical capitals. Accordingly the series that Mr. Bispham began with his song recital is to continue. For next Sunday, the arrangements have not been fully made; a fortnight hence Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, will appear; and later Mme. Gadski is to come. Almost always, indeed, the singer or the virtuoso will be of international rank and note. The aim of the concerts is not to give an outlet to resident performers, however promising or capable, but to bring to audiences here at a convenient and pleasureable time and at modest prices, the eminent singers, pianists and violinists who happen at the moment to be in America. The more of them we hear and the oftener we hear them, the better; their coming and usually their performances are stimulating pleasure; they keep our musical outlook broad, our musical standards high and they link Boston to the great musical world around us. It is true that we may have, that we do have, too many concerts; but the superfluous are not such as this new venture for Sunday afternoons contemplates.

Mr. David Bispham, who gave the concert of yesterday, is one of the few singers of his sex who can safely venture a song recital, and, perhaps in reward, his fellow men seem more than the other sex to like to hear him. Mr. Bispham is a shrewd and dexterous maker of programmes. When he chooses he can lead his audience from song to song with a persuasive continuity of mood, and then at the due moment give new zest to interest by sharply contrasting pieces. He has the differentiating sense so that each song, as he sings it, has an individuality of its own. He does all things with intelligence. Distinct dramatizing quality dwells in him. He has a keen feeling for the rhetoric of music and of verse and the communicative force that impels it to his audience. His range of choice is wide, and he is one of the few singers who is willing to cultivate such vigorously virile ditties as the "Pirate's Song" that Mr. Henry Gilbert has set out of "Treasure Island," and that Mr. Bispham sang yesterday. His programme, which bore witness to all these things, ran:

O Ruddier than the Cherry ("Acis and Galatea").....Handel
Adelaide.....Beethoven
The Wanderer.....Schubert
Five songs from "Dichterliebe".Robt. Schumann
Erinnerung.....Joh. Brahms
Ein Ton.....Peter Cornelius
Caecilie.....Richard Strauss
Des Dichter's Letztes Lied.—Mit Einer Primula Veris.—Erstes Begegnen.— Mit Einer Wasserlilie.—Ein Schwan.—Mein Ziel.....Grieg
O Let Night Speak to Me.—Sweetheart, Thy Lips Are Touched With Flame. George W. Chadwick
Who Knows?.....Max Heinrich
Pirate's Song.....Hy. F. Gilbert
The Mad Dog ("The Vicar of Wakefield").....Liza Lehmann
The Stuttering Lovers.....Old Irish

Mr. Bispham has some of the shortcomings of his virtues. His zeal for differentiation, his dramatizing temperament and his keen sense of musical and verbal rhetoric lead him sometimes into exaggerations that do bring "effects," but that also do violence to the song and to the finer intelligence of the singer. When he is in quest of them he does not hesitate to break and wrench the melodic line, the just phrase and the imparting tempo. At his worst he does distort, as at his best he can heighten, both the musical and the poetic content of a song by the dramatizing quality that he is sure to bring to it. Moreover, expressiveness must perforce be the essential quality of Mr. Bispham's singing. His voice lacks sensuous quality; it has no baritone richness of tone; it can be on occasion a very hard and stubborn voice. Happily yesterday it was more suave and supple than it has been on many an occasion when Mr. Bispham has sung here. Seemingly it obeyed his purposes willingly. Nor are the methods of Mr. Bispham's singing exactly those, in some respects, to commend to a young singer. They also do their violences to the pure art of song. They do, however, gain his rhetorically expressive ends, and to design, achieve and impart these is the sum and substance of Mr. Bispham's singing. He had range in variety for them in his list of yesterday, which ran from the commonplace patter of the song of "The Mad Dog" out of Lisa Lehmann's operetta of "The Vicar of Wakefield" to the deep voice of Beethoven's Adelaide, the lyric outburst of the song by Schumann's "Dichterliebe," the organ chant of Brahms's "Rememorance," the rapturous passion of Strauss's "Cäcilie" and the fitful and changeful charm of the group of songs by Grieg. Mr. Bispham's sang six to the memory of the departed composer. At moments they truly honored him when some flash of gentle imagination, some passing and fanciful vision or some breath of his Norwegian rocks and bays animated them. And the next instant they had fallen away in the mediocrity of the Grieg who learned counterpoint, but not sustained expression, at Leipzig.

H. T. P.

The Symphony Concert

Boehe's new tone-poem, "Taormina," when it was repeated at the Symphony concert of Saturday, disclosed one more virtue besides the expert orchestral technique of the young composer. it can glorify the orchestra that plays it. Had it been a newly discovered masterpiece instead of one of the passing "novelties" of a sterile musical year, Dr. Muck and his men could not have lavished more pains upon it. Boehe's music does "sound," and it "sounded" on Saturday with the new, warm and mellow sonority of the brass choir, with the richness of the sustained tone of the strings in the long ascending sweeps in which much of the music moves and with the suave brightnes of the woodwind instruments as Mr. Longy and his companions play them. Perhaps thus "Taormina" justified itself. Tireless and almost endless is Boehe's pursuit of swelling sonorities. The music in itself does not always gain them. The orchestra won them for it and drenched the listeners' ears in the flooding opulence of its tone. To be bathed in it was a new sensation that was almost heady. Boehe suggests very little in his piece of the Taormina with which he has labelled it; but the tone of the orchestra did come like a long day's flood of glowing Sicilian sunshine.

Mr. Kreisler was tonic to the orchestra as well, and when it began Beethoven's symphony in D-major, the string choir in particular seemed still under the spell of his playing. The violinist had played in Lalo's Spanish piece with the exquisite fineness, brightness and undulating quality of tone that he can summon and with as exquisite a sense of rhythm. The string choir of the orchestra had given him the dearest applause an artist may gain—that of his comrades of rank in his own profession. Our violinists indeed had almost escorted him from the stage. When they returned to their places they paid him still finer tribute. Through Beethoven's symphony they seemed, as by spontaneous and common impulse, to seek to play like so many Kreislers. Their tone caught the tingling brightness of his; it reflected like his every fine variation of rhythm; it shared the undulating quality that makes his so sensitive to every slightest curve of the music and so significant to the listener's ear and fancy. The violins, the whole string choir were playing with Kreisler-like passion for the voice of the music and the voice of their instrument. Though Beethoven's full-throated allegro and through the long curves of the soft song of the larghetto, their tone was thrilling to hear.

H. T. P.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
DECEMBER 2, 1907.

Boston is to have its Sunday afternoon high-class musical concerts through the winter after all. That fact was made patent yesterday afternoon by Manager L. H. Mudgett from the stage of Symphony Hall on the occasion of the song recital by David Bispham, which recital opened the series of concerts Mr. Mudgett promises the musical public of Greater Boston. While the artist for next Sunday afternoon has yet to be engaged, that for the third Sunday in the month, Dec. 15, will be the famous violinist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

Sunday's recital was eminently satisfactory. Mr. Bispham has never been heard to better advantage. His glorious baritone voice, clear as a bell and finely resonant was admirably handled in an exceptionally fine repertoire. His singing of songs by George Chadwick, Max Heinrich, H. F. Gilbert and Liza Lehmann gave particular pleasure. Mr. Harold O. Smith, at the piano, proved a most capable accompanist.

BOSTON HERALD-
DECEMBER 4, 1907

NEXT SUNDAY'S CONCERT.

There is evidently a demand for Sunday afternoon music of high quality at popular prices, as was shown by the interest in the Chickering Hall concerts last season, and by the interest in Mr. Bispham's recital in Symphony Hall last Sunday afternoon. A series of concerts will therefore be given in Symphony Hall. Next Sunday afternoon the artists will be Miss Elizabeth Dodge, soprano; Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist, and Mr. Campanari.

Mr. Campanari is one of the most popular baritones, if not the most popular, now singing in public. Miss Sassoli's artistry is well known here. Miss Dodge will sing for the first time in Boston. A New Englander, she has lived in Paris for several years. She has sung there in concert, and at one time she contemplated seriously an operatic career. She has recently studied further with Jean de Reszke, and last spring she sang with success in London.

Tickets for this concert will go on sale Tuesday (tomorrow) morning at [illegible] in Symphony Hall.

DECEMBER 2, 1907

BISPHAM IN SYMPHONY HALL

BY OLIN DOWNES

A concert was given by and for the benefit of the Roxbury Aid Society yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Mr. David Bispham, baritone, gave a programme which included songs by Handel, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Cornelius, a Grieg group in memory of the Norwegian composer, and other lyrics by Chadwick, Max Heinrich, Henry F. Gilbert, Liza Lehmann, and an old Irish song.

Mr. Bispham has rarely appeared here to greater advantage than on this occasion. The intelligence and fine sincerity that have always characterized his singing were doubly convincing yesterday, for their effect was enhanced by a vocal charm, a sensuous beauty and perfection of tone which in spite of the excellence of his mechanism have not always been associated with the singer's achievements. Many of the songs on the programme were numbers familiar to Mr. Bispham's audiences. They were welcome repetitions, for there are very few among the artists of today who can more nobly interpret such songs as "The Wanderer" or Schumann's "Wenn Ich in Deine Augen Seh'" and "Ich Grolle Nicht," the performance of which, by this baritone, one does not readily forget. Cornelius' "Monotone" was made almost bearable by the magic of tonal coloring and concentration of thought that the performer brought to its interpretation.

Mr. Bispham easily responded to the varied demands of the Grieg songs, the last three of which, "Mit Einer Wasserlilie," "Ein Schwan," which wrought a spell, and "Mit Ziel," a song that should be oftener given, should be especially mentioned.

Possibly Max Heinrich's "Who Knows," from his incidental music to the "Spanish Duel," might have had more lightness and swing in its delivery. Henry F. Gilbert's "Pirate's Song" is a strong, grimly humorous and very effective setting of Stevenson's verses, "Fifteen men on a dead man's chest," etc. It is a song requiring strong dramatic impulse and personality on the part of the singer, and Mr. Bispham is not lacking in these qualities. Liza Lehmann's "Mad Dog" might well be spared, but there was a fund of genuine humor in the declamation of the old Irish song, "The Stuttering Lovers." Mr. Bispham had previously repeated the "Monotone;" he added to the programme one of his familiar numbers, "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes."

Sunday Concerts to Continue

It is a pleasure to find that these Sunday afternoon concerts will be continued through the season, and there is a large public in this city who will doubtless welcome such an arrangement. Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will appear on the 15th, and other well known artists will be later announced.

BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY.
DECEMBER 2, 1907.

PEOPLE APPRECIATE IT.

Warmly Applaud First of Sunday Afternoon Concerts in Symphony Hall.

The experiment was yesterday tried in Symphony hall of offering Boston people a Sunday afternoon concert of a genuinely high character and at popular prices.

The management of the symphony concerts has assumed a deep interest in the undertaking, though the program said "this concert given by and for the benefit of the Roxbury aid society." Before yesterday afternoon's recital, given by the famous baritone, David Bispham, had been completed, the announcement was made that the Sunday afternoon concerts would be continued.

Symphony hall was two-thirds filled, the patronage being divided equally between the floor, the first balcony and the second balcony. It was an audience that appreciated good music, as the reception to Mr Bispham conclusively showed.

Mr Bispham had prepared a most attractively arranged program. He was assisted by Harold O. Smith at the piano. The singing of Mr Bispham is so well known that little more need be said than that he was in excellent voice and even more pleasing than ever.

The delight of the audience was demonstrated with such enthusiasm that the artist has every reason to feel flattered and the management assured of the success of the enterprise.

Not only was each number followed by loud applause but the hand-clapping was continued in many instances until Mr Bispham began his next song. When at the conclusion of a group of songs the singer left the stage for a moment's rest, the audience insisted upon recalling him again and again. Mr Bispham acknowledged the reception by bowing, but finally had to add two encores. For these the audience was grateful inasmuch as the program was an extended one.

After the last number on the program had been sung there was so much applause that Mr Bispham sang another encore. For several minutes after he and Mr Smith retired the audience stayed to applaud. The program was as follows:

O Ruddier Than the Cherry ("Acis and Galatea").....Handel
Adelaide.....Beethoven
The Wanderer.....Schubert
Selections from "Dichterliebe"..Robt Schumann
Erinnerung (Remembrance).....Joh Brahms
Ein Ton.....Peter Cornelius
Caecilie.....Richard Strauss
Des Dichter's Letztes Lied
Mit Einer Primula Veris
Erstes Begegnen
Mit Einer Wasserlilie
Ein Schwan
Mein Ziel
In Memoriam Edvard Grieg 1843 1907.
O Let Night Speak to Me
Sweetheart, Thy Lips are Touched With Flame.....George W Chadwick
Who Knows?.....Max Heinrich
Pirate's song.....Hy F Gilbert
The Mad Dog (from "The Vicar of Wakefield").....Liza Lehmann
The Stuttering Lovers.....Old Irish

DECEMBER 2, 1907

BISPHAM OPENS THE SUNDAY CONCERT SERIES

Manager Mudgett's New Departure Meets Cordial Response on the Part of Boston's Music Lovers. Noted Barytone Gives Delightful Program.

Mr. Mudgett began a series of Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall yesterday under very promising circumstances. Judging by the size of the first audience and the genuine enjoyment offered, the series will prove exceedingly attractive. The soloist yesterday was David Bispham, most distinguished of American barytones, and the program was divided into both classical and popular songs. There was also a happy medium in the form of a little cycle of songs in memory of Grieg.

The taste that prompted the singing of Gilbert's setting of the "Pirate Song" of Robert Louis Stevenson at a Sunday concert is questionable. However, there is no accounting for tastes on Sunday or any other day, for in all truth it must be said that the audience heartily enjoyed the song. Mr. Bispham's spirit was irresistible, and particularly when it dwelt on the rollicking refrain, "Yo! ho! ho! and a bottle of rum."

It is only fair to both the singer and the audience to state that the songs which gave the most pleasure were "The Monotone" of Cornelius and Max Heinrich's "Who Knows?" But there were a dozen others scarcely less enjoyable.

The soloist for next Sunday has not been announced, but on the following Sunday Fritz Kreisler, one of the greatest violinists of the day, will appear.

KREISLER WINS OVATION AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fritz Kreisler, the renowned violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday night. He took part in the performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra. He was warmly applauded after each movement and at the end of the number was recalled half a dozen times. He drew an unusually large audience and he created unusually fervent enthusiasm.

But it could hardly be otherwise in view of the powerful magnetism and charming style of the young artist—he is only 32 years of age, though already one of the great musical performers of the day. Lalo's work was first played at the Symphony concerts just twenty years ago by Mr. Loeffler, now no longer one of the musical practitioners, but the most notable example of the new school of composers. It is a work that gives the soloist a rare opportunity to display his taste as well as his skill, and Mr. Kreisler's interpretation was well-nigh perfect in every respect. However, the orchestra itself wove a spell hardly less magical with its superb performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony. The band played like a mighty virtuoso.

The novelty of the evening was Boehe's Tone Poem "Taormina." The name is that of a town in Sicily, and the music embodies memories of a visit. It has sadness and gaiety, but over all is a religious cast suggestive of the vesper hour. The chime of bells at the end introduced a picturesque element. The piece was spiritedly played. In fact, the fine performance, aside from the merits of the composition itself, deserved the applause that followed.

The orchestra will be out of town this week. Next week's program offers Bizet's Overture, "Patrie." MacDowell's Suite, op. 42, and Hermann Goetz's Symphony in F major.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)
Idress.....
ite.....NOV 30 1907

Strings, Wood W

PADEREWSKI will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubenstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4.

The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms' second in D major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chazbrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "Espana."

884

[73]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
MONDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1907

MUSIC AND DRAMA

NEW AND BETTER SUNDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS

A Promising Beginning Yesterday at Symphony Hall—Mr. Bispham's Songs and Singing—The Orchestra at the Symphony Concert—A Good Word for One-Act Plays—The Amorous Millionaire on the London Stage—Kreisler's Programme for His Next Recital Here—Mary Shaw to Act in Boston—Mme. Melba Not to Sing in America This Winter

The new series of concerts on Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall began so auspiciously yesterday that they are really to be a series. For a beginning the audience was promisingly numerous, hearty in interest and applause and obviously composed of those whom the concerts would attract. Men seemed actually to predominate—especially the men who hear eminent singers and virtuosi gladly but who cannot leave their offices to hear them on the working afternoons of the week. And music after all was written for men as well as for women, while any performer of spirit likes a masculine audience to win. Numerous, too, were those who from habit or impulse find Sunday afternoon the most congenial of hours for the pleasure of music. The modest scale of prices had also brought those who cannot always afford the concerts that they crave, while scattered about the hall were those who are eager to encourage such entertainments on Sunday afternoon until they become the established thing with the givers of concerts and the habit among the goers to them that they are in other musical capitals. Accordingly the series that Mr. Bispham began with his song recital is to continue. For next Sunday, the arrangements have not been fully made; a fortnight hence Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, will appear; and later Mme. Gadski is to come. Almost always, indeed, the singer or the virtuoso will be of international rank and note. The aim of the concerts is not to give an outlet to resident performers, however promising or capable, but to bring to audiences here at a convenient and pleasureable time and at modest prices, the eminent singers, pianists and violinists who happen at the moment to be in America. The more of them we hear and the oftener we hear them, the better; their coming and usually their performances are stimulating pleasure; they keep our musical outlook broad, our musical standards high and they link Boston to the great musical world around us. It is true that we may have, that we do have, too many concerts; but the superfluous are not such as this new venture for Sunday afternoons contemplates.

Mr. David Bispham, who gave the concert of yesterday, is one of the few singers of his sex who can safely venture a song recital, and, perhaps in reward, his fellow men seem more than the other sex to like to hear him. Mr. Bispham is a shrewd and dexterous maker of programmes. When he chooses he can lead his audience from song to song with a persuasive continuity of mood, and then at the due moment give new zest to interest by sharply contrasting pieces. He has the differentiating sense so that each song, as he sings it, has an individuality of its own. He does all things with intelligence. Distinct dramatizing quality dwells in him. He has a keen feeling for the rhetoric of music and of verse and the communicative force that impels it to his audience. His range of choice is wide, and he is one of the few singers who is willing to cultivate such vigorously virile ditties as the "Pirate's Song" that Mr. Henry Gilbert has set out of "Treasure Island," and that Mr. Bispham sang yesterday. His programme, which bore witness to all these things, ran:

O Ruddier than the Cherry ("Acis and Galatea").....Handel
Adelaide.....Beethoven
The Wanderer.....Schubert
Five songs from "Dichterliebe".....Robt. Schumann
Erinnerung.....Joh. Brahms
Ein Ton.....Peter Cornelius
Caecilie.....Richard Strauss
Des Dichter's Letztes Lied.—Mit Einer Primula Veris.—Erstes Begegnen.— Mit Einer Wasserlilie.—Ein Schwan.—Mein Ziel.....Grieg
O Let Night Speak to Me.—Sweetheart, Thy Lips Are Touched With Flame. George W. Chadwick
Who Knows?.....Max Heinrich
Pirate's Song.....Hy. F. Gilbert
The Mad Dog ("The Vicar of Wakefield").....Liza Lehmann
The Stuttering Lovers.....Old Irish

Mr. Bispham has some of the shortcomings of his virtues His zeal for differentiation, his dramatizing temperament and his keen sense of musical and verbal rhetoric lead him sometimes into exaggerations that do bring "effects," but that also do violence to the song and to the finer intelligence of the singer. When he is in quest of them he does not hesitate to break and wrench the melodic line, the just phrase and the imparting tempo. At his worst he does distort, as at his best he can heighten, both the musical and the poetic content of a song by the dramatizing quality that he is sure to bring to it. Moreover, expressiveness must perforce be the essential quality of Mr. Bispham's singing. His voice lacks sensuous quality; it has no baritone richness of tone; it can be on occasion a very hard and stubborn voice. Happily yesterday it was more suave and supple than it has been on many an occasion when Mr. Bispham has sung here. Seemingly it obeyed his purposes willingly. Nor are the methods of Mr. Bispham's singing exactly those, in some respects, to commend to a young singer. They also do their violences to the pure art of song. They do, however, gain his rhetorically expressive ends, and to design, achieve and impart these is the sum and substance of Mr. Bispham's singing. He had range in plenty for them in his list of yesterday, which ran from the commonplace patter of the song of "The Mad Dog" out of Lisa Lehmann's operetta of "The Vicar of Wakefield," to the deep voice of Beethoven's "Adelaide," the lyric outbursts of the songs [illegible] "Dichterliebe," the organ chant of Brahms's "Remembrance," the rapturous passion of Strauss's "Cäcilie" and the fitful and changeful charm of the group of songs by Grieg. Mr. Bispham's sang six to the memory of the departed composer. At moments they truly honored him when some flash of gentle imagination, some passing and fanciful vision or some breath of his Norwegian rocks and bays animated them. And the next instant they had fallen away in the mediocrity of the Grieg who learned counterpoint, but not sustained expression, at Leipzig.

H. T. P.

The Symphony Concert

Boehe's new tone-poem, "Taormina," when it was repeated at the Symphony concert of Saturday, disclosed one more virtue besides the expert orchestral technique of the young composer. it can glorify the orchestra that plays it. Had it been a newly discovered masterpiece instead of one of the passing "novelties" of a sterile musical year, Dr. Muck and his men could not have lavished more pains upon it. Boehe's music does "sound," and it "sounded" on Saturday with the new, warm and mellow sonority of the brass choir, with the richness of the sustained tone of the strings in the long ascending sweeps in which much of the music moves and with the suave brightnes of the woodwind instruments as Mr. Longy and his companions play them. Perhaps thus "Taormina" justified itself. Tireless and almost endless is Boehe's pursuit of swelling sonorities. The music in itself does not always gain them. The orchestra won them for it and drenched the listeners' ears in the flooding opulence of its tone. To be bathed in it was a new sensation that was almost heady. Boehe suggests very little in his piece of the Taormina with which he has labelled it; but the tone of the orchestra did come like a long day's flood of glowing Sicilian sunshine.

Mr. Kreisler was tonic to the orchestra as well, and when it began Beethoven's symphony in D-major, the string choir in particular seemed still under the spell of his playing. The violinist had played in Lalo's Spanish piece with the exquisite fineness, brightness and undulating quality of tone that he can summon and with as exquisite a sense of rhythm. The string choir of the orchestra had given him the dearest applause an artist may gain—that of his comrades of rank in his own profession. Our violinists indeed had almost escorted him from the stage. When they returned to their places they paid him still finer tribute. Through Beethoven's symphony they seemed, as by spontaneous and common impulse, to seek to play like so many Kreislers. Their tone caught the tingling brightness of his; it reflected like his every fine variation of rhythm; it shared the undulating quality that makes his so sensitive to every slightest curve of the music and so significant to the listener's ear and fancy. The violins, the whole string choir were playing with Kreisler-like passion for the voice of the music and the voice of their instrument. Though Beethoven's full-throated allegro and through the long curves of the soft song of the larghetto, their tone was thrilling to hear.

H. T. P.

BOSTON TRAVELER.
DECEMBER 2, 1907.

Boston is to have its Sunday afternoon high-class musical concerts through the winter after all. That fact was made patent yesterday afternoon by Manager L. H. Mudgett from the stage of Symphony Hall on the occasion of the song recital by David Bispham, which recital opened the series of concerts Mr. Mudgett promises the musical public of Greater Boston. While the artist for next Sunday afternoon has yet to be engaged, that for the third Sunday in the month, Dec. 15, will be the famous violinist, Mr. Fritz Kreisler.

Sunday's recital was eminently satisfactory. Mr. Bispham has never been heard to better advantage. His glorious baritone voice, clear as a bell and finely resonant was admirably handled in an exceptionally fine repertoire. His singing of songs by George Chadwick, Max Heinrich, H. F. Gilbert and Liza Lehmann gave particular pleasure. Mr. Harold O. Smith, at the piano, proved a most capable accompanist.

BOSTON HERALD-
DECEMBER 4, 1907

NEXT SUNDAY'S CONCERT.

There is evidently a demand for Sunday afternoon music of high quality at popular prices, as was shown by the interest in the Chickering Hall concerts last season, and by the interest in Mr. Bispham's recital in Symphony Hall last Sunday afternoon. A series of concerts will therefore be given in Symphony Hall. Next Sunday afternoon the artists will be Miss Elizabeth Dodge, soprano; Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist, and Mr. Campanari.

Mr. Campanari is one of the most popular baritones, if not the most popular, now singing in public. Miss Sassoli's artistry is well known here. Miss Dodge will sing for the first time in Boston. A New Englander, she has lived in Paris for several years. She has sung there in concert, and at one time she contemplated seriously an operatic career. She has recently studied further with Jean de Reszke, and last spring she sang with success in London.

Tickets for this concert will go on sale [illegible]day (tomorrow) morning at [illegible] in Symphony Hall.

BOSTON POST—MONDAY.
DECEMBER 2, 1907

BISPHAM IN SYMPHONY HALL

BY OLIN DOWNES

A concert was given by and for the benefit of the Roxbury Aid Society yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, when Mr. David Bispham, baritone, gave a programme which included songs by Handel, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Cornelius, a Grieg group in memory of the Norwegian composer, and other lyrics by Chadwick, Max Heinrich, Henry F. Gilbert, Liza Lehmann, and an old Irish song.

Mr. Bispham has rarely appeared here to greater advantage than on this occasion. The intelligence and fine sincerity that have always characterized his singing were doubly convincing yesterday, for their effect was enhanced by a vocal charm, a sensuous beauty and perfection of tone which in spite of the excellence of his mechanism have not always been associated with the singer's achievements. Many of the songs on the programme were numbers familiar to Mr. Bispham's audiences. They were welcome repetitions, for there are very few among the artists of today who can more nobly interpret such songs as "The Wanderer" or Schumann's "Wenn Ich in Deine Augen Seh'" and "Ich Grolle Nicht," the performance of which, by this baritone, one does not readily forget. Cornelius' "Monotone" was made almost bearable by the magic of tonal coloring and concentration of thought that the performer brought to its interpretation.

Mr. Bispham easily responded to the varied demands of the Grieg songs, the last three of which, "Mit Einer Wasserlilie," "Ein Schwan," which wrought a spell, and "Mit Ziel," a song that should be oftener given, should be especially mentioned.

Possibly Max Heinrich's "Who Knows," from his incidental music to the "Spanish Duel," might have had more lightness and swing in its delivery. Henry F. Gilbert's "Pirate's Song" is a strong, grimly humorous and very effective setting of Stevenson's verses, "Fifteen men on a dead man's chest," etc. It is a song requiring strong dramatic impulse and personality on the part of the singer, and Mr. Bispham is not lacking in these qualities. Liza Lehmann's "Mad Dog" might well be spared, but there was a fund of genuine humor in the declamation of the old Irish song, "The Stuttering Lovers." Mr. Bispham had previously repeated the "Monotone;" he added to the programme one of his familiar numbers, "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes."

Sunday Concerts to Continue

It is a pleasure to find that these Sunday afternoon concerts will be continued through the season, and there is a large public in this city who will doubtless welcome such an arrangement. Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will appear on the 15th, and other well known artists will be later announced.

BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY.
DECEMBER 2, 1907.

PEOPLE APPRECIATE IT.

Warmly Applaud First of Sunday Afternoon Concerts in Symphony Hall.

The experiment was yesterday tried in Symphony hall of offering Boston people a Sunday afternoon concert of a genuinely high character and at popular prices.

The management of the symphony concerts has assumed a deep interest in the undertaking, though the program said "this concert given by and for the benefit of the Roxbury aid society." Before yesterday afternoon's recital, given by the famous baritone, David Bispham, had been completed, the announcement was made that the Sunday afternoon concerts would be continued.

Symphony hall was two-thirds filled, the patronage being divided equally between the floor, the first balcony and the second balcony. It was an audience that appreciated good music, as the reception to Mr Bispham conclusively showed.

Mr Bispham had prepared a most attractively arranged program. He was assisted by Harold O. Smith at the piano. The singing of Mr Bispham is so well known that little more need be said than that he was in excellent voice and even more pleasing than ever.

The delight of the audience was demonstrated with such enthusiasm that the artist has every reason to feel flattered and the management assured of the success of the enterprise.

Not only was each number followed by loud applause but the hand-clapping was continued in many instances until Mr Bispham began his next song. When at the conclusion of a group of songs the singer left the stage for a moment's rest, the audience insisted upon recalling him again and again. Mr Bispham acknowledged the reception by bowing, but finally had to add two encores. For these the audience was grateful inasmuch as the program was an extended one.

After the last number on the program had been sung there was so much applause that Mr Bispham sang another encore. For several minutes after he and Mr Smith retired the audience stayed to applaud. The program was as follows:

O Ruddier Than the Cherry ("Acis and Galatea").....Handel
Adelaide.....Beethoven
The Wanderer.....Schubert
Selections from "Dichterliebe".....Robt Schumann
Erinnerung (Remembrance).....Joh Brahms
Ein Ton.....Peter Cornelius
Caecilie.....Richard Strauss
Des Dichter's Letztes Lied
Mit Einer Primula Veris
Erstes Begegnen
Mit Einer Wasserlilie
Ein Schwan
Mein Ziel
} In Memoriam Edvard Grieg 1843 1907.
O Let Night Speak to Me Sweetheart, Thy Lips are Touched With Flame.....George W Chadwick
Who Knows?.....Max Heinrich
Pirate's song.....Hy F Gilbert
The Mad Dog (from "The Vicar of Wakefield").....Liza Lehmann
The Stuttering Lovers.....Old Irish

BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY.
DECEMBER 2, 1907.

BISPHAM OPENS THE SUNDAY CONCERT SERIES

Manager Mudgett's New Departure Meets Cordial Response on the Part of Boston's Music Lovers. Noted Barytone Gives Delightful Program.

Mr. Mudgett began a series of Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall yesterday under very promising circumstances. Judging by the size of the first audience and the genuine enjoyment offered, the series will prove exceedingly attractive. The soloist yesterday was David Bispham, most distinguished of American barytones, and the program was divided into both classical and popular songs. There was also a happy medium in the form of a little cycle of songs in memory of Grieg.

The taste that prompted the singing of Gilbert's setting of the "Pirate Song" of Robert Louis Stevenson at a Sunday concert is questionable. However, there is no accounting for tastes on Sunday or any other day, for in all truth it must be said that the audience heartily enjoyed the song. Mr. Bispham's spirit was irresistible, and particularly when it dwelt on the rollicking refrain, "Yo! ho! ho! and a bottle of rum."

It is only fair to both the singer and the audience to state that the songs which gave the most pleasure were "The Monotone" of Cornelius and Max Heinrich's "Who Knows?" But there were a dozen others scarcely less enjoyable.

The soloist for next Sunday has not been announced, but on the following Sunday Fritz Kreisler, one of the greatest violinists of the day, will appear.

KREISLER WINS OVATION AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fritz Kreisler, the renowned violinist, was the soloist at the Symphony concert Saturday night. He took part in the performance of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra. He was warmly applauded after each movement and at the end of the number was recalled half a dozen times. He drew an unusually large audience and he created unusually fervent enthusiasm.

But it could hardly be otherwise in view of the powerful magnetism and charming style of the young artist—he is only 32 years of age, though already one of the great musical performers of the day. Lalo's work was first played at the Symphony concerts just twenty years ago by Mr. Loeffler, now no longer one of the musical practitioners, but the most notable example of the new school of composers. It is a work that gives the soloist a rare opportunity to display his taste as well as his skill, and Mr. Kreisler's interpretation was well-nigh perfect in every respect. However, the orchestra itself wove a spell hardly less magical with its superb performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony. The band played like a mighty virtuoso.

The novelty of the evening was Boehe's Tone Poem "Taormina." The name is that of a town in Sicily, and the music embodies memories of a visit. It has sadness and gaiety, but over all is a religious cast suggestive of the vesper hour. The chime of bells at the end introduced a picturesque element. The piece was spiritedly played. In fact, the fine performance, aside from the merits of the composition itself, deserved the applause that followed.

The orchestra will be out of town this week. Next week's program offers Bizet's Overture, "Patrie," MacDowell's Suite, op. 42, and Hermann Goetz's Symphony in F major.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)

Idress.....
ite..... NOV 30 1907

Strings, Wood W

PADEREWSKI will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubeinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. 884

The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms' second in D major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture, "Genovava." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year with great success. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chazbrier's brilliant rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "Espana."

[73]

NEW YORK EV'G POST

NOV 30 1907

Arrangements have been made whereby Paderewski will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. It was originally announced that he would play at but one of these concerts, on Saturday afternoon, but it was the desire also of Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to have him at both concerts, so that both sets of subscribers would have the opportunity to hear him with the Orchestra. As he was scheduled to play five times with the Orchestra that week, it was impossible to announce him for the Thursday night concert until he had been consulted. He finally consented to do this. He will play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor," on Thursday evening, and Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, on Saturday afternoon. This will be his only appearance in New York with an orchestra, and he will play only twice more here. His third recital will be on Saturday afternoon, December 14. The orchestral numbers on Thursday will be Brahms's second symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture; on Saturday, Boehe's "Taormina," an Adagio and Scherzo by Reznicek, and Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody.

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, on Friday evening, December 6. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor, No. 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other number on the programme will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "España."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y. EV'G SUN

NOV 30 1907

Paderewski next week is the first soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visits to town this season. He plays three times, in two boroughs. The programmes are:

At Carnegie Hall on Thursday, Brahms's symphony No. 2, Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture.

At Brooklyn's Baptist Temple, on Friday Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, No. 6; Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto No. 4 and Chabrier's "España."

Saturday matinée, at Carnegie Hall, two novelties, Boehe's tone-poem, "Taormina," and Reznicek's adagio and scherzo-finale from a symphonic suite in E minor, and again Rubinstein's concerto and Chabrier's rhapsody of Spain.

Mr. Paderewski gives two more piano recitals, in Manhattan Dec. 14 and Brooklyn Dec. 16.

NEW YORK MAIL

NOV 30 1907

The Boston Symphony programmes, with Paderewski as soloist, Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, will be as follows:

Thursday evening, December 5:

Brahms' symphony, No. 2, in D major, op. 73.

Beethoven's concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 5, in E flat major, op. 73.

Schumann's overture, "Genovéva."

Saturday afternoon, December 7, at 2.30:

Boehe: Tone poem, "Taormina" (new).

Reznicek: Adagio and scherzo, finale from symphonic suite in E minor (first time).

Rubinstein: Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D minor, No. 4, op. 70.

Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

* * *

Y. EVG WORLD

NOV 30 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon is to have the assistance of Paderewski. At the evening performance he will play the piano part in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and at the matinee Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. Brahms's second symphony in D major will be played on Thursday evening, but Dr. Karl Muck has elected to do without a symphony on Saturday afternoon. Instead he will offer "Taormina," a tone poem by Ernst Boehe, and two movements from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek.

ished:

The Globe and Commercial Advertiser

Date NOV 30 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Paderewski as soloist, announces the following programmes for its second pair of concerts, Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, at Carnegie Hall. Thursday evening Brahms symphony No. 2; Beethoven, piano concerto No. 5 in E flat; Schumann, overture to "Genoveva." Saturday—Boehe, tone poem, "Taormina" (new); Reznicek, adagio and scherzo—finale from symphonic suite in E minor; Rubinstein, piano concerto No. 4 in D minor; Chabrier, rhapsody "España."

884.

[illegible] Madeleine Walther, soprano, and

N. Y. TRIBUNE.

DEC 1 - 1907

CONCERTS.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, December 5 and 7. This will bring the first soloist of the season, Mr. Paderewski, who will play at both concerts. These will be his only appearances with orchestra in New York on his present tour. The programmes that Dr. Muck has arranged are strongly contrasted. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's second symphony in D major and Schumann's overture "Genoveva," while Mr. Paderewski will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Remembering Dr. Muck's notable performance of Brahms's C minor symphony a year ago, there should be interest to see what he will do with the less profound and more cheerful work.

On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony. Mr. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral number will include two works new to New York. The first is a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by the young Bavarian composer, Ernst Boehe. This is his latest work, and it calls not merely for full orchestra, but numerous instruments of percussion and a set of bells. The other new work will be two movements from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek, the Bohemian composer, who is best known as the writer of the successful opera comique "Donna Diana." The final number will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody "España."

In Brooklyn on Friday night at the Baptist Temple the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme will also include Mr. Paderewski as soloist in the Rubinstein D minor pianoforte concerto. The orchestral pieces will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and Chabrier's "España."

DR. KARL MUCK.
Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

m NEW YORK TIMES

ress

DEC 1 - 1907

te

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in F flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique, "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "España."

[74]

[illegible] second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, December [illegible] and 7. This will bring the first soloist of the season—Paderewski—who will play at both concerts. The second programmes that Dr. Muck has arranged are strongly contrasted. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's second symphony in D major and Schumann's overture "Genoveva," while Paderewski will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers will include two works new to New York. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by the young Bohemian composer, Ernst Boehe. The other work consists of two movements from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek, the Bohemian composer, who is best known in America as the composer of the successful opera comique, "Donna Diana."

rom

ddress NEW YORK WORLD

ate DEC 1 - 1907

The Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 5 and 7. They will introduce the first soloist of the season—Paderewski—who will play at both concerts, making his only appearance with orchestra in New York during his present tour.

On Thursday evening Brahms's second Symphony in D major and Schumann's overture "Genoveva" will be given, while Paderewski will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral number will include two works new to New York. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by the young Bavarian composer, Ernest Boehe. This is his latest work, and it had its first performance in America on the 29th and 30th in Boston. It is a composition calling not merely for a full orchestra, but a large number of instruments of percussion and a set of bells. The other novelty is two movements from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek, the Bohemian composer, who is best known in America as the composer of the successful opera comique "Donna Diana," the overture of which was first played in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur.

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

ddress

ate

MUSIC NOTES.

Estab

MR. PADEREWSKI will be the soloist at both concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this week. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and the orchestral piece de résistance will be Brahms' symphony in D major.

Rubinstein's familiar D minor concerto is the pianist's selection for Saturday afternoon, when two orchestral novelties will be presented—a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, and an adagio and scherzo by Reznicek, the composer of "Donna Diana." Chabrier's highly colored Spanish rhapsody is also on the programme.

From

Address N. Y. TRIBUNE.

Date DEC 1 - 1907

Paderewski will be in Brooklyn on Friday evening. He will appear under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street. He will be the soloist at the second Philharmonic concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor. The programme will be as follows:

Symphony in F major, No. 6, Pastoral, Op. 68.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 70.....Rubinstein
España (Spanish rhapsody).....Chabrier

Paderewski will give a piano recital at the Baptist Temple under the auspices of the institute on the evening of Monday, December 16. This is the only recital which the musician has planned to give in Brooklyn this season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m NEW YORK SUN

ress

Paderewski will be soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concerts of December 5 and 7 in Carnegie Hall. At the first he will play Beethoven's E flat concerto and at the second Rubinstein's in D minor. The orchestral numbers on Thursday evening will be Brahms's D major symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture; on Saturday afternoon Boehe's tone poem "Taormina" (new), the adagio and finale from Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor (new) and Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody.

...ncer, London, 1881; New York, 1

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY

DEC 2 1907

[illegible] Seventh Symphony [illegible] Ninth. The scores [illegible] Brahms's symphonies had provoked years before in Boston. The audience did not show its disapproval in the manner applied in certain cities in Europe, by hissing; but there are other ways of signifying displeasure, ways more becoming to ladies and gentlemen, and these were utilized freely. There are persons who find it agreeable to boast of [illegible]. The college undergraduate, his head centred in athletics, vaunts his [illegible] ence toward literature and the arts; glorifies in eyes blind to aesthetic beauty, in ears deaf to the potency of music, in emotions callous to aesthetic appeal. As he grows in maturity the American youth begins to realize that appreciation of [illegible] at least, interest in literature and pictorial art are essential factors in general education. Only music still lies without the pale of his comprehension; he regards it with scorn, as if it were something for women and children, not for men. How often one meets persons of refinement who plume themselves on a lack of musical appreciation, instead of acknowledging their weakness and striving to extend their scope of enjoyment! What man making claim to good breeding would think of announcing from the housetops that trash made a greater appeal to him than good literature, that chromos gave him more satisfaction than paintings in oil? Shame, if nothing else, would prevent such an exhibition. Not so with music. There seems to be little incentive to improve public taste in this most intangible form of art; the average person still feels that to acknowledge a preference for trashy music over works of real art is a profession of power rather than a confession of weakness. It is that spirit which prompts men and women to leave the hall in mock indignation when they are asked to give attention to new works, such as those of Strauss, Debussy and Bruckner; and that spirit, too, finds vent in newspaper protests against productions of novelties. What once was true of Brahms now is true of Bruckner.

It is whispered that Muck has been told by the powers that be that Bruckner's music must be dropped from the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Let us hope the story is false. The conductor had undertaken the noble task of teaching his audiences to understand Bruckner as Gericke taught Boston to love Brahms. His efforts in that direction should receive the encouragement of all persons interested in the furtherance of musical appreciation, most of all by Higginson himself, who, as the writer in the Music Lovers' Almanac tells us, did not found the orchestra "to win the applause of the populace." Let there be differences of opinion as to the ultimate value of Bruckner's music; let musicians disagree as to the real merit of this symphonist. His works nevertheless deserve frequent hearing, and the public ought to have opportunity to become acquainted with them. That they are too long for the ordinary concert is one objection and a reasonable one. But why not perform single movements occasionally, say, the wonderful adagios of the Seventh, Eighth and Ninth symphonies or the remarkable scherzos belonging to those compositions? Surely this would show no greater disrespect to the wishes of the author than is shown in the presentation of excerpts from Wagner's operas in concerts, and it might well be the means of bringing home Bruckner's message to the masses. By administering his music in small doses the public eventually would become so accustomed to the composer's idiom, and so fond of it, too, we have no doubt, that a whole symphony of more than an hour's duration would be received as a welcome offering. We suggest that Franz X. Arens make his People's Symphony audiences familiar with Bruckner, and that Walter Damrosch, in pursuance of his theory not to permit personal judgment to interfere with his selection of the works he performs, step into the field for this great man, as he has for many others, including Mahler and Debussy.

N. Y. EVG. STAATSZEITU

ess

DEC 2 - 1907

— Das Kuchow'sche Wiener Quartett, bestehend aus den Herren L. Schenberger, Lecio Ligay, Otto Kriat und J. [illegible] giebt Donnerstag, den 5. Dezember, [illegible] erstes diesjähriges Konzert in der [illegible] Cooper Union Halle. Das Programm enthält viele Novitäten. Das Konzert verspricht ein überaus interessantes zu werden. Das Quartett nimmt einen [illegible] hohen Rang ein und stehen die Glanzleistungen ganz unerreicht da. Hofkapellmeister Dr. Karl Muck, der das Quartett schon des Oefteren gehört hat, ist ein besonderer Verehrer desselben und hat demselben ein sehr schmeichelhaftes Anerkennungsschreiben zukommen lassen. [illegible] ersten der aus einem Cyklus von [illegible] stehenden Konzerte giebt sich ein [illegible] reges Interesse kund, und versprechen selbe einen genussreichen Abend.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y

NOV 30 1907

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, will give the lecture recital on the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple, on [illegible] day evening. (Philharmonic and Brooklyn Institute). He will be assisted by Miss Edith Miller [illegible] piano, instead of Miss Katharine [illegible] heretofore announced.

NEW YORK EV'G POST

NOV 30 1907

Arrangements have been made whereby Paderewski will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 5, and Saturday afternoon, December 7. It was originally announced that he would play at but one of these concerts, on Saturday afternoon, but it was the desire also of Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to have him at both concerts, so that both sets of subscribers would have the opportunity to hear him with the Orchestra. As he was scheduled to play five times with the Orchestra that week, it was impossible to announce him for the Thursday night concert until he had been consulted. He finally consented to do this. He will play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor," on Thursday evening, and Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor, No. 4, on Saturday afternoon. This will be his only appearance in New York with an orchestra, and he will play only twice more here. His third recital will be on Saturday afternoon, December 14. The orchestral numbers on Thursday will be Brahms's second symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture; on Saturday, Boehe's "Taormina," an Adagio and Scherzo by Reznicek, and Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody.

Paderewski will be the soloist at the next Boston Symphony concert, on Friday evening, December 6. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor, No. 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," and the other number on the programme will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "España."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

N.Y. EVG SUN

Paderewski next week is the first soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visits to town this season. He plays three times, in two boroughs. The programmes are:

At Carnegie Hall on Thursday, Brahms's symphony No. 2, Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture.

At Brooklyn's Baptist Temple, on Friday Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, No. 6; Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto No. 4 and Chabrier's "España."

Saturday matinée, at Carnegie Hall, two novelties, Boehe's tone-poem, "Taormina," and Reznicek's adagio and scherzo-finale from a symphonic suite in E minor, and again Rubinstein's concerto and Chabrier's rhapsody of Spain.

Mr. Paderewski gives two more piano recitals, in Manhattan Dec. 14 and Brooklyn Dec. 16.

NOV 30 1907

The Boston Symphony programmes, with Paderewski as soloist, Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, will be as follows:

Thursday evening, December 5:

Brahms' symphony, No. 2, in D major, op. 73.

Beethoven's concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 5, in E flat major, op. 73.

Schumann's overture, "Genoveva."

Saturday afternoon, December 7, at 2.30:

Boehe: Tone poem, "Taormina" (new).

Reznicek: Adagio and scherzo, finale from symphonic suite in E minor (first time).

Rubinstein: Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D minor, No. 4, op. 70.

Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

* * *

N.Y. EV'G WORLD

NOV 30 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon is to have the assistance of Paderewski. At the evening performance he will play the piano part in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and at the matinee Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. Brahms's second symphony in D major will be played on Thursday evening, but Dr. Karl Muck has elected to do without a symphony on Saturday afternoon. Instead he will offer "Taornina," a tone poem by Ernest Boehe, and two movements from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek.

The Globe and Commercial Advertiser

NOV 30 1907

Date.....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Paderewski as soloist, announces the following programmes for its second pair of concerts, Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7, at Carnegie Hall. Thursday evening, Brahms symphony No. 2; Beethoven, piano concerto No. 5 in E flat; Schumann, overture to "Genoveva." Saturday—Boehe, tone poem, "Taormina" (new); Reznicek, adagio and scherzo—finale from symphonic suite in E minor; Rubinstein, piano concerto No. 4 in D minor; Chabrier, rhapsody "España."

Miss Madeleine Walther, soprano, and 884.

N. Y. TRIBUNE.

ss.....

DEC 1 - 1907

CONCERTS.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, December 5 and 7. This will bring the first soloist of the season, Mr. Paderewski, who will play at both concerts. These will be his only appearances with orchestra in New York on his present tour. The programmes that Dr. Muck has arranged are strongly contrasted. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's second symphony in D major and Schumann's overture "Genoveva," while Mr. Paderewski will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. Remembering Dr. Muck's notable performance of Brahms's C minor symphony a year ago, there should be interest to see what he will do with the less profound and more cheerful work.

On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony. Mr. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral number will include two works new to New York. The first is a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by the young Bavarian composer, Ernst Boehe. This is his latest work, and it calls not merely for full orchestra, but numerous instruments of percussion and a set of bells. The other new work will be two movements from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek, the Bohemian composer, who is best known as the writer of the successful opera comique "Donna Diana." The final number will be Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody "España."

In Brooklyn on Friday night at the Baptist

Temple the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme will also include Mr. Paderewski as soloist in the Rubinstein D minor pianoforte concerto. The orchestral pieces will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony and Chabrier's "España."

DR. KARL MUCK.
Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

m.....NEW YORK TIMES

ress.....

DEC 1 - 1907

te.....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Paderewski will be the soloist at both of the next Boston Symphony concerts at Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening, Dec. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 7. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in F flat major, "The Emperor," and on Saturday afternoon he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The symphony at the Thursday night concert will be Brahms's second in D major, op. 73, and the other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture, "Genoveva." On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony, and Dr. Muck will present two novelties. The first is a tone poem, entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, whose "Ulysses's Departure and Shipwreck" was played in Boston in Mr. Gericke's last year. The other novelty will be an adagio and scherzo-finale by Reznicek, who is best known as the composer of the opera comique, "Donna Diana." The final number on the programme will be Chabrier's rhapsody for orchestra, entitled "España."

1

[74]

DEC 1 1907

THE second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, December 5 and 7. This will bring the first soloist of the season—Paderewski—who will play at both concerts. The second programmes that Dr. Muck has arranged are strongly contrasted. On Thursday evening he will play Brahms's second symphony in D major and Schumann's overture, "Geneveva," while Paderewski will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers will include two works new to New York. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by the young Bohemian composer, Ernst Boehe. The other work consists of two movements from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek, the Bohemian composer, who is best known in America as the composer of the successful opera comique, "Donna Diana."

rom.....

ldress.....

ate.....DEC 1 - 1907

The Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 5 and 7. They will introduce the first soloist of the season—Paderewski—who will play at both concerts, making his only appearance with orchestra in New York during his present tour.

rk, 188

On Thursday evening Brahms's second symphony in D major and Schumann's overture "Genoveva" will be given, while Paderewski will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. On Saturday afternoon there will be no symphony. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers will include two works new to New York. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by the young Bavarian composer, Ernest Boehe. This is his latest work, and it had its first performance in America on the 29th and 30th in Boston. It is a composition calling not merely for a full orchestra, but a large number of instruments of percussion and a set of bells. The other novelty is two movements from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek, the Bohemian composer, who is best known in America as the composer of the successful opera comique "Donna Diana," the overture of which was first played in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur.

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

ddress.....

ate.....

MUSIC NOTES.

Estab MR. PADEREWSKI will be the soloist at both concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall this week. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, and the orchestral piece de résistance will be Brahms' symphony in D major.

Rubinstein's familiar D minor concerto is the pianist's selection for Saturday afternoon, when two orchestral novelties will be presented—a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, and an adagio and scherzo by Reznicek, the composer of "Donna Diana." Chabrier's highly colored Spanish rhapsody is also on the programme.

From.....N. Y. TRIBUNE.

Address.....

Date.....DEC 1 - 1907

Paderewski will be in Brooklyn on Friday evening. He will appear under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences at the Baptist Temple, Third avenue and Schermerhorn street. He will be the soloist at the second Philharmonic concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Karl Muck is the conductor. The programme will be as follows:

Symphony in F major, No. 6, Pastoral, Op. 68...Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 70...Rubinstein
España (Spanish rhapsody).....Chabrier

Paderewski will give a piano recital at the Baptist Temple under the auspices of the institute on the evening of Monday, December 16. This is the only recital which the musician has planned to give in Brooklyn this season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m.....

ress.....

Paderewski will be soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concerts of December 5 and 7 in Carnegie Hall. At the first he will play Beethoven's E flat concerto and at the second Rubinstein's in D minor. The orchestral numbers on Thursday evening will be Brahms's D major symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. On Saturday afternoon, Boche's tone poem "Taormina" (new), the adagio and finale from Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor (new) and Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody.

...ished: London, 1881; New York, 18

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY

DEC 2 1907

...ner's Seventh Symphony, this year ... Ninth. The scenes were like those ... Brahms's symphonies had provoked many years before in Boston. The audience did not show its disapproval in the manner applied in certain cities in Europe, by hissing; but there are other ways of signifying displeasure, ways more becoming to ladies and gentlemen, and these were utilized freely. There are persons who find it agreeable to boast of ignorance. The college undergraduate, his interest centred in athletics, vaunts his indifference toward literature and the arts; he glorifies in eyes blind to esthetic beauty, in ears deaf to the potency of music, in emotions callous to esthetic appeal. As he grows in maturity the American youth begins to realize that appreciation of or, at least, interest in literature and pictorial art are essential factors in general education. Only music still lies without the pale of his comprehension; he treats it with scorn, as if it were something for women and children, not for men. How often one meets persons of refinement who plume themselves on a lack of musical appreciation, instead of acknowledging their weakness and striving to extend their scope of enjoyment! What man making claim to good breeding would think of announcing from the housetops that trash made a greater appeal to him than good literature, that chromos gave him more satisfaction than paintings in oil? Shame, if nothing else, would prevent such an exhibition. Not so with music. There seems to be little incentive to improve public taste in this most intangible form of art; the average person still feels that to acknowledge a preference for trashy music over works of real art is a profession of power rather than a confession of weakness. It is that spirit which prompts men and women to leave the hall in mock indignation when they are asked to give attention to new works, such as those of Strauss, Debussy and Bruckner; and that spirit, too, finds vent in newspaper protests against productions of novelties. What once was true of Brahms now is true of Bruckner.

It is whispered that Muck has been told by the powers that be that Bruckner's music must be dropped from the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Let us hope the story is false. The conductor had undertaken the noble task of teaching his audiences to understand Bruckner as Gericke taught Boston to love Brahms. His efforts in that direction should receive the encouragement of all persons interested in the furtherance of musical appreciation, most of all by Higginson himself, who, as the writer in the Music Lovers' Almanac tells us, did not found the orchestra "to win the applause of the populace." Let there be differences of opinion as to the ultimate value of Bruckner's music; let musicians disagree as to the real merit of this symphonist. His works nevertheless deserve frequent hearing, and the public ought to have opportunity to become acquainted with them. That they are too long for the ordinary concert is one objection and a reasonable one. But why not perform single movements occasionally, say, the wonderful adagios of the Seventh, Eighth and Ninth symphonies or the remarkable scherzos belonging to those compositions? Surely this would show no greater disrespect to the wishes of the author than is shown in the presentation of excerpts from Wagner's operas in concerts, and it might well be the means of bringing home Bruckner's message to the masses. By administering his music in small doses the public eventually would become so accustomed to the composer's idiom, and so fond of it, too, we have no doubt, that a whole symphony of more than an hour's duration would be received as a welcome offering. We suggest that Franz X. Arens make his People's Symphony audiences familiar with Bruckner, and that Walter Damrosch, in pursuance of his theory not to permit personal judgment to interfere with his selection of the works he performs, step into the field for this great man, as he has for many others, including Mahler and Debussy.

...STAATSZEITUNG

ess.....

...1907

— Das Luchow'sche Wiener Quartett, bestehend aus den Herren L. Sabinberger, Lecio Ligghi, Otto Kriat und J. Zucker, giebt Donnerstag, den 5. Dezember, sein erstes diesjähriges Konzert in der großen Cooper Union Halle. Das Programm enthält viele Novitäten. Das Konzert verspricht ein überaus interessantes zu werden. Das Quartett nimmt einen sehr hohen Rang ein und stehen die Glanzleistungen ganz unerreicht da. Hofkapellmeister Dr. Karl Muck, der das Quartett schon des Oefteren gehört hat, ist ein besonderer Verehrer desselben und hat demselben ein sehr schmeichelhaftes Anerkennungsschreiben zukommen lassen. Zu den ersten der aus einem Cyklus von fünf bestehenden Konzerte giebt sich ein besonderes Interesse kund, und verspricht dasselbe einen glänzenden Besuch.

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y

idress.....

ate.....NOV 30 1907

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York Sun, will give the lecture recital on the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening (Philharmonic Society and Brooklyn Institute). He will be assisted by Miss Edith Milligan, at the piano, instead of Miss Katharine Linn, as heretofore announced. The recital takes place on Wednesday, at 4 P. M., at Association Hall.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1907

For weeks every seat in the Baptist Temple for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday night has been sold, and as Paderewski is to be the soloist, the reason is not far to seek. Most of the house is taken for these concerts by the subscribers for season tickets, so that only a limited number of seats were available to non-subscribers. Disappointment is in store for many who leave it till the last week to decide about attending such a concert. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, the one with which he won his Copyright 1902 by J. E. Purdy.

IGNACE JAN PADEREWSKI.
Soloist at Boston Orchestra Concert on Friday Evening.

usual enormous success in Boston with the orchestra on the 15th and 16th of this month. He is soloist with the orchestra the whole of this week at all of the concerts on its regular December trip. All his orchestral work in the East is confined to eight appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Boston, two in New York, one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 6, in F major, the one which is entitled the "Pastoral" symphony. From Boston comes the hint in nothing that the orchestra has done under the capital hand of Dr. Muck has its work been more exquisite than in this idylic open-air symphony, and as it is not played so often as some of the others, its appearance on this programme will be all the more welcome. The final number will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana," played here last week by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 1 1907

It seems almost supererogatory to say anything whatever about the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, Dec. 8. For weeks every seat in the house has been sold, and necessarily a large number of those who want to go to this concert will have to be disappointed. Next year, when the new Academy of Music is finished, there will be more seats to go around. As it is, when the Boston Symphony brings an unusual attraction as soloist, like Paderewski, who is to assist it on Friday night, there are very few seats open to the general public, because the subscription takes up nearly the whole of the house. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, the one with which he won his usual enormous success in Boston with the orchestra on the 15th and 16th of this month. He is soloist with the orchestra the whole of this week at all of the concerts on its regular December trip. None but those who hear him with the Boston Symphony will be able to hear him with orchestra at all unless they journey to Chicago or Minneapolis, in which cities he is to play with the Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras respectively, for all his orchestral work in the East is confined to eight appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Boston, two in New York, one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 6, in F major, the one which is entitled the "Pastoral" symphony. As it is not played so often as some of the others, its appearance on this programme will be all the more welcome. The final number will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana." Regarding this work, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur years ago, Philip Hale, the distinguished critic, made the remark that "it caused the sacred codfish in the State House to wag its tail with joy." The programme in full is as follows:

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1907

PADEREWSKI TO PLAY HERE ON FRIDAY NIGHT

He Will Be the Soloist of the Boston Symphony Concert.

THE BROOKLYN "MARTHA"

On Monday Night—Good Bills at the Operas, and Many Concerts.

It seems almost supererogatory to say anything whatever about the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, December 6. For weeks every seat in the house has been sold, and necessarily a large number of those who want to go to this concert will have to be disappointed. Next year, when the new Academy of Music is finished, there will be more seats to go around. As it is, when the Boston Symphony brings an unusual attraction as soloist, like Paderewski, who is to assist it on Friday night, there are very few seats open to the general public, because the subscription takes up nearly the whole of the house.

Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, the one with which he won his usual enormous success in Boston with the orchestra on the 15th and 16th of this month. He is soloist with the orchestra the whole of this week at all of the concerts on its regular December trip. None but those who hear him with the Boston Symphony will be able to hear him with the orchestra at all, unless they journey to Chicago or Minneapolis, in which cities he is to play with the Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras, respectively. All his orchestral work in the East is confined to eight appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra: two in Boston, two in New York, one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 6, in F major, the one which is entitled the "Pastoral" symphony. As it is not played so often as some of the others, its appearance on this programme will be all the more welcome. The final number will be Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana." Regarding this work, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur years ago, Philip Hale, the distinguished critic, made the remark that "it caused the sacred codfish in the State House to wag its tail with joy." The programme in full is as follows:

Beethoven's Smyphony in F major ("Pastoral"), Op. 68.
Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 70.
Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana."

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1907

STAGE GOSSIP.

Brooklyn will get a fine hearing of Paderewski this year. He is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony on Friday night, playing the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. Then, on December 16, he is to give a recital, on which occasion he may be expected to crowd the Baptist Temple.

Paderewski.

Daily Cruzen
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S RED-LETTER CONCERT.

Paderewski Will Appear With the Orchestra.

OTHER LOCAL MUSIC EVENTS.

Gala Week of Musicales in Manhattan, with First of the Bagby Series.

Paderewski and a programme of more than usual possibilities of pleasure make the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season a red-letter occasion to be looked forward to for Friday evening of this week at the Baptist Temple. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, the one with which he won his usual enormous success in Boston with the orchestra on the 15th and 16th of this month. He is soloist with the orchestra the whole of this week at all of the concerts on its regular December trip. None but those who hear him with the Boston Symphony will be able to hear him with orchestras at all unless they journey to Chicago or Minneapolis, in which cities he is to play with the Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras respectively, for all his orchestral work in the East is confined to eight appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Boston, two in New York, one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 6 in F major, the one which is entitled the "Pastoral" symphony. In nothing that the orchestra has done under the capital hand of Dr. Muck has its work been more exquisite in this idyllic open-air symphony, and as it is not played so often as some of the others, its appearance on this programme will be all the more welcome. The final number will be Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana."

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York "Sun," will give the lecture recital on the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. He will be assisted by Miss Edith Milligan at the piano, instead of Miss Katharine Linn, as heretofore announced. The recital takes place on Wednesday, at 4 p. m., at Association Hall.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address Bklyn. Ed.
Date DEC

WITH Ignace Jan Paderewski as the soloist of the evening the second Philharmonic Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening of this week, promises to be one of the most distinguished in the musical life of the borough this season.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, has arranged a most interesting programme, which in detail will be:—

Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68.....Beethoven
I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d'allegro. Thunder storm: Tempest: Allegro.
IV. Shepherd's song: Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, op. 70.....Rubinstein
I. Moderato (D minor).
II. Moderato assai (F major).
III. Allegro assai (D minor).
Espana (Spanish Rhapsody).....Chabrier

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1907

Campanari Next Sunday
Symphony Hall—Pachmann Second Programme—"Graustark" Again To Boston Theatre

Mr. Campanari, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, familiar here by many appearances in opera and in concerts, is to be the principal singer at the concert next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall. His rich baritone voice, his dramatizing temperament and the communicating vitality of his singing have long commended him, and it will be good to hear him again. With him come Miss Sassoli, the accomplished young harpist, who has often appeared in Mme. Melba's concerts, and Miss Elizabeth Dodge, a new soprano of Parisian training and repu-

N.Y. Press.

[75]

per Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 30 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The personality and the achievement of any musical director, who conducts the performances of such a great orchestra as the Boston Symphony, which will give its first concert in Newark in the Krueger Auditorium Monday night, December 9, have an interest for all who delight in the interpretations of the finest compositions by creative genius in musical expression. Therefore a few words about Dr. Karl Muck, who is the guiding and animating spirit in the Boston Symphony and will occupy the post of conductor at the coming concert, should be welcomed by those unacquainted with his notable career.

Dr. Muck is enjoying his second year's leave of absence from his duties as conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. With much difficulty the Boston Symphony Orchestra succeeded in the spring of 1906 in securing Emperor William's consent to his absence from the German capital for a year. His success in this country last season has become a part of our musical history, and great was the rejoicing when last spring it was announced that the Emperor had extended his leave for another year, which, unfortunately, is most likely to be his last in America.

Dr. Muck was born in Wuerzburg, Bavaria, on October 22, 1859. His father, a government official, was a talented amateur musician and gave the future conductor his first lessons, teaching him violin, piano and counterpoint. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later was a violinist in the local symphony orchestra. He became a resident at the University of Heidelberg in 1876, where he remained one year. Thence he went to Leipsic, where he matriculated in the university and at the same time entered the Conservatory of Music. In the university he worked for his degree of "doctor juris" in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, while in the conservatory his teachers were Karl Reinecke and Ernst Friedrich Richter. He made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in 1880, the same year in which he received his university degree.

Following his original plan to become a conductor, he took as his first engagement the post of chorus master in the opera at Zurich, where he stayed during the season of 1880-1881. Thence he went to Salzburg, where he was the conductor of the opera from 1881 to 1884. His first post of real importance was the conductorship at Graz, in Austria, which he occupied for two years following his engagement at Brunn. There he gave the first uncut performance of "Die Meistersinger" in Austria. During his stay in Graz he was the conductor of the important Styrian Musical Society, and in February, 1886, gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's seventh symphony, his performance of which work was one of the sensations of the past musical season in Boston and New York.

His success in Graz was so great that in 1886 he was called to Prague to be conductor of the German opera and the Philharmonic Orchestra in that city. This post he held until 1892, and while in Prague he was the conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to give in that country the first performances of Wagner's "Ring." In 1891 Neumann took an opera company to the Lessing Theatre in Berlin, giving the first performances in that city of "Cavalleria Rusticana," "The Barber of Bagdad" and Mahler's revised version of "The Three Pintos." So profound was the impression he made that he was immediately offered the post of principal conductor of the Berlin opera, his associate being Felix Weingartner. This post he still holds. His progress in public esteem has been very rapid since he went to Berlin. In the festivals of 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906, he was the conductor of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. In 1904-5 and 1905-6 he shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the celebrated Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and this year, had he not returned to America, he was to have conducted all of them. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Schleswig music festival. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow, in Madrid and Barcelona, in Paris and London, in Brussels and Amsterdam, in Hamburg, Bremen and Budapest. For one season he was the conductor of the German opera at Covent Garden, London. He has never composed.

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here will not be one by a section of the band, but will employ its full strength of ninety-seven musicians, every one of whom ranks among the best of his kind in this world. The audience also will have the pleasure of hearing Mme. Olga Samaroff, the talented pianist, who will appear as one of the soloists. Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager of the concert, is receiving orders for reserved seats at his office, 794 Broad street. These requests, when accompanied by checks or money orders, are placed on file and will be filled the day before the general sale opens at the Lauter company's music warerooms next Wednesday morning. Orders are also being received by him for the recital to be given by Paderewski, the great pianist, in the Krueger Auditorium, Tuesday night, December 17.

Paderewski will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two concerts, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Thursday he will be heard in Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, opus 73, and at the Saturday matinee he will perform Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, opus 70. The programme Dr. Muck has arranged for the first concert will include Brahms's second symphony in D major and Schumann's "Genovena" overture. On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will comprise Boehe's tone-poem "Taormina," which will be heard for the first time here; the adagio and scherzo from Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor, also new to New York, Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana," "Taormina" is his latest work, [illegible] only for full orchestra, but

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1907

For weeks every seat in the Baptist Temple for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday night has been sold, and as Paderewski is to be the soloist, the reason is not far to seek. Most of the house is taken for these concerts by the subscribers for season tickets, so that only a limited number of seats were available to non-subscribers. Disappointment is in store for many who leave it till the last week to decide about attending such a concert. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, the one with which he won his Copyright 1902 by J. E. Purdy.

IGNACE JAN PADEREWSKI.
Soloist at Boston Orchestra Concert on Friday Evening.

usual enormous success in Boston with the orchestra on the 15th and 16th of this month. He is soloist with the orchestra the whole of this week at all of the concerts on its regular December trip. All his orchestral work in the East is confined to eight appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Boston, two in New York, one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 6, in F major, the one which is entitled the "Pastoral" symphony. From Boston comes the hint in nothing that the orchestra has done under the capital hand of Dr. Muck has its work been more exquisite than in this idylic open-air symphony, and as it is not played so often as some of the others, its appearance on this programme will be all the more welcome. The final number will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana," played here last week by the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 1 1907

It seems almost supererogatory to say anything whatever about the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, Dec. 8. For weeks every seat in the house has been sold, and necessarily a large number of those who want to go to this concert will have to be disappointed. Next year, when the new Academy of Music is finished, there will be more seats to go around. As it is, when the Boston Symphony brings an unusual attraction as soloist, like Paderewski, who is to assist it on Friday night, there are very few seats open to the general public, because the subscription takes up nearly the whole of the house. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, the one with which he won his usual enormous success in Boston with the orchestra in the 15th and 16th of this month. He is soloist with the orchestra the whole of this week at all of the concerts on its regular December trip. None but those who hear him with the Boston Symphony will be able to hear him with orchestra at all unless they journey to Chicago or Minneapolis, in which cities he is to play with the Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras respectively, for all his orchestral work in the East is confined to eight appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Boston, two in New York, one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 6, in F major, the one which is entitled the "Pastoral" symphony. In nothing that the orchestra has done under the capital hand of Dr. Muck has its work been more exquisite than in this idylic open-air symphony, and as it is not played so often as some of the others, its appearance on this programme will be all the more welcome. The final number will be Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana." Regarding this work, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur years ago, Philip Hale, the distinguished critic, made the remark that "it caused the sacred codfish in the State House to wag its tail with joy." The programme in full is as follows:

Beethoven's Symphony in F major ("Pastoral"), Op. 68.
Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 70.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1907

PADEREWSKI TO PLAY HERE ON FRIDAY NIGHT

He Will Be the Soloist of the Boston Symphony Concert.

THE BROOKLYN "MARTHA"

On Monday Night—Good Bills at the Operas, and Many Concerts.

It seems almost supererogatory to say anything whatever about the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Baptist Temple on next Friday evening, December 6. For weeks every seat in the house has been sold, and necessarily a large number of those who want to go to this concert will have to be disappointed. Next year, when the new Academy of Music is finished, there will be more seats to go around. As it is, when the Boston Symphony brings an unusual attraction as soloist, like Paderewski, who is to assist it on Friday night, there are very few seats open to the general public, because the subscription takes up nearly the whole of the house.

Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, the one with which he won his usual enormous success in Boston with the orchestra on the 15th and 16th of this month. He is soloist with the orchestra the whole of this week at all of the concerts on its regular December trip. None but those who hear him with the Boston Symphony will be able to hear him with the orchestra at all, unless they journey to Chicago or Minneapolis, in which cities he is to play with the Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras, respectively. All his orchestral work in the East is confined to eight appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra: two in Boston, two in New York, one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 6, in F major, the one which is entitled the "Pastoral" symphony. As it is not played so often as some of the others, its appearance on this programme will be all the more welcome. The final number will be Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana." Regarding this work, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur years ago, Philip Hale, the distinguished critic, made the remark that "it caused the sacred codfish in the State House to wag its tail with joy." The programme in full is as follows:

Beethoven's Smyphony in F major ("Pastoral"), Op. 68.
Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 70.
Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana."

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1907

STAGE GOSSIP.

Brooklyn will get a fine hearing of Paderewski this year. He is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony on Friday night, playing the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. Then, on December 16, he is to give a recital, on which occasion he may be expected to crowd the Baptist Temple.

Paderewski.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S RED-LETTER CONCERT.

Paderewski Will Appear With the Orchestra.

OTHER LOCAL MUSIC EVENTS.

Gala Week of Musicales in Manhattan, with First of the Bagby Series.

Paderewski and a programme of more than usual possibilities of pleasure make the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season a red-letter occasion to be looked forward to for Friday evening of this week at the Baptist Temple. Paderewski will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, the one with which he won his usual enormous success in Boston with the orchestra on the 15th and 16th of this month. He is soloist with the orchestra the whole of this week at all of the concerts on its regular December trip. None but those who hear him with the Boston Symphony will be able to hear him with orchestras at all unless they journey to Chicago or Minneapolis, in which cities he is to play with the Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras respectively, for all his orchestral work in the East is confined to eight appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Boston, two in New York, one each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn.

The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 6 in F major, the one which is entitled the "Pastoral" symphony. In nothing that the orchestra has done under the capital hand of Dr. Muck has its work been more exquisite in this idyllic open-air symphony, and as it is not played so often as some of the others, its appearance on this programme will be all the more welcome. The final number will be Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana."

William J. Henderson, music editor of the New York "Sun," will give the lecture recital on the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple on Friday evening. He will be assisted by Miss Edith Milligan at the piano, instead of Miss Katharine Linn, as heretofore announced. The recital takes place on Wednesday, at 4 p. m., at Association Hall.

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Address Bklyn. Ed.
Date

Estabi

WITH Ignace Jan Paderewski as the soloist of the evening the second Philharmonic Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple, on Friday evening of this week, promises to be one of the most distinguished in the musical life of the borough this season.

Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, has arranged a most interesting programme, which in detail will be:—

Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68.....Beethoven
I. Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Scene by the brookside: Andante molto moto.
III. Jolly gathering of country folk: Allegro. In tempo d'allegro. Thunder storm: Tempest: Allegro.
IV. Shepherd's song; Gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm: Allegretto.

Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, op. 70.....Rubinstein
I. Moderato (D minor).
II. Moderato assai (F major).
III. Allegro assai (D minor).

Espana (Spanish Rhapsody).....Chabrier

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1907

Campanari [illegible] of Next Sunday at Symphony Hall—Pachmann's Second Programme—"Graustark" Again for the Boston Theatre

Mr. Campanari, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, familiar here by many appearances in opera and in concerts, is to be the principal singer at the concert next Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall. His rich baritone voice, his dramatizing temperament and the communicating vitality of his singing have long commended him, and it will be good to hear him again. With him come Miss Sassoli, the accomplished young harpist, who has often appeared in Mme. Melba's concerts, and Miss Elizabeth Dodge, a new soprano of Parisian training and reputation.

[75] per Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 30

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The personality and the achievement of any musical director, who conducts the performances of such a great orchestra as the Boston Symphony, which will give its first concert in Newark in the Krueger Auditorium Monday night, December 9, have an interest for all who delight in the interpretations of the finest compositions by creative genius in musical expression. Therefore a few words about Dr. Karl Muck, who is the guiding and animating spirit in the Boston Symphony and will occupy the post of conductor at the coming concert, should be welcomed by those unacquainted with his notable career.

Dr. Muck is enjoying his second year's leave of absence from his duties as conductor of the Royal Opera in Berlin. With much difficulty the Boston Symphony Orchestra succeeded in the spring of 1906 in securing Emperor William's consent to his absence from the German capital for a year. His success in this country last season has become a part of our musical history, and great was the rejoicing when last spring it was announced that the Emperor had extended his leave for another year, which, unfortunately, is most likely to be his last in America.

Dr. Muck was born in Wuerzburg, Bavaria, on October 22, 1859. His father, a government official, was a talented amateur musician and gave the future conductor his first lessons, teaching him violin, piano and counterpoint. At the age of eleven he began to appear in public as a pianist, generally in chamber music, and later was a violinist in the local symphony orchestra. He became a resident at the University of Heidelberg in 1876, where he remained one year. Thence he went to Leipsic, where he matriculated in the university and at the same time entered the Conservatory of Music. In the university he worked for his degree of "doctor juris" in philosophy, classical philology and musical history, while in the conservatory his teachers were Karl Reinecke and Ernst Friedrich Richter. He made his debut as a pianist at a Gewandhaus concert in 1880, the same year in which he received his university degree.

Following his original plan to become a conductor, he took as his first engagement the post of chorus master in the opera at Zurich, where he stayed during the season of 1880-1881. Thence he went to Salzburg, where he was the conductor of the opera from 1881 to 1884. His first post of real importance was the conductorship at Graz, in Austria, which he occupied for two years following his engagement at Brunn. There he gave the first uncut performance of "Die Meistersinger" in Austria. During his stay in Graz he was the conductor of the important Styrian Musical Society, and in February, 1886, gave the first performance in Austria of Bruckner's seventh symphony, his performance of which work was one of the sensations of the past musical season in Boston and New York.

His success in Graz was so great that in 1886 he was called to Prague to be conductor of the German opera and the Philharmonic Orchestra in that city. This post he held until 1892, and while in Prague he was the conductor of the company which Angelo Neumann took to Russia to give in that country the first performances of Wagner's "Ring." In 1891 Neumann took an opera company to the Lessing Theatre in Berlin, giving the first performances in that city of "Cavalleria Rusticana," "The Barber of Bagdad" and Mahler's revised version of "The Three Pintos." So profound was the impression he made that he was immediately offered the post of principal conductor of the Berlin opera, his associate being Felix Weingartner. This post he still holds. His progress in public esteem has been very rapid since he went to Berlin. In the festivals of 1901, 1902, 1904 and 1906, he was the conductor of "Parsifal" at Bayreuth. In 1904-5 and 1905-6 he shared with Felix Mottl the honor of conducting the celebrated Philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and this year, had he not returned to America, he was to have conducted all of them. Since 1894 he has been the conductor of the Schleswig music festival. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in St. Petersburg and Moscow, in Madrid and Barcelona, in Paris and London, in Brussels and Amsterdam, in Hamburg, Bremen and Budapest. For one season he was the conductor of the German opera at Covent Garden, London. He has never composed.

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here will not be one by a section of the band, but will employ its full strength of ninety-seven musicians, every one of whom ranks among the best of his kind in this world. The audience also will have the pleasure of hearing Mme. Olga Samaroff, the talented pianist, who will appear as one of the soloists. Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager of the concert, is receiving orders for reserved seats at his office, 794 Broad street. There requests, when accompanied by checks or money orders, are placed on file and will be filled the day before the general sale opens at the Lauter company's music warerooms next Wednesday morning. Orders are also being received by him for the recital to be given by Paderewski, the great pianist, in the Krueger Auditorium, Tuesday night, December 17.

Paderewski will be the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two concerts, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Thursday he will be heard in Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, opus 73, and at the Saturday matinee he will perform Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, opus 70. The programme Dr. Muck has arranged for the first concert will include Brahms's second symphony in D major and Schumann's "Genovena" overture. On Saturday afternoon the orchestral numbers will comprise Boehe's tone-poem "Taormina," which will be heard for the first time here; the adagio and scherso from Reznieck's symphonic suite in E minor, also new to New York, and Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana." Boehe's "Taormina" is his latest work. It calls not only for full orchestra, but for a great number of percussion instru-

Paper Cutting Bureau of the World
STAR.
NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 30 1907

Boston Symphony Seat Sale.

The public sale of seats for the first appearance in Newark of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will open at Lauter's, 657-659 Broad street, next Wednesday morning. The concert, as has been already announced, will be given in the Krueger Auditorium on Monday night, December 9, and will begin at 8 o'clock precisely. The orchestra will stay in New York after its matinee on Saturday afternoon, December 7, purposely for this concert, and those who have not been able to attend its concerts in Carnegie Hall will have the opportunity of listening to its playing here under the same conditions which prevailed there.

The soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff, is also a newcomer in Newark, and much is promised of her. Mme. Samaroff, despite her Russian name, is a native-born American; in fact, she is very native born, as she was born at the government army post in San Antonio, Tex., where her father was an officer. Of course, a great deal of her life has been spent abroad, but she is thoroughly American, and she did what few dare to do—she began her career in this country before she had ever played in public abroad. Her career of the last three years is a standing refutation of the hackneyed charge that no musician can succeed in America without a European cachet. In three years from an absolutely unknown girl, without "pull" or influence of any kind, she has become one of the foremost and popular pianists in this country. She has been soloist with all the great orchestras of America, and has played at least a dozen times with the Boston Symphony.

To play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra means more for an artist than to play with any other orchestra in this country, for not only is it the leading organization of its kind, but it has very few soloists, and its choice is restricted to the very best. Mme. Samaroff, having had three more successful seasons in America, is going to spend next year abroad, and she will make her European debut with the famous Colonne orchestra at the Chatelet, in Paris, on the third Sunday of next October. She is to play with the leading orchestras of London, Berlin, Vienna and other musical centres.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is of more than ordinary interest. It comprises a characteristic work by the great living French composer, Vincent d'Indy; pianoforte concerto by Edward Grieg, the noted Norwegian, who died a few months ago, and a characteristic work by the great Schumann. D'Indy's work will be the Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," based upon Schiller's trilogy of dramas. The Schumann work will be the overture to the opera "Genoveva."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m ..... PHILADELPHIA PA ress ..... DEC 1- 1907
te .....

BEETHOVEN AND BRAHMS; PADEREWSKI AND DR. MUCK

The second Boston symphony concert tomorrow evening will arouse more than usual interest because Paderewski is to be the assisting artist, this being his only local appearance with orchestra. The great pianist is to perform this week the exacting task of playing six times in six days as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its regular December trip. He will use two concertos, Beethoven's in E flat, commonly known as "The Emperor," and Rubinstein's in D minor. Before the Friday afternoon public rehearsal in Boston recently the line of those who wanted to hear the great pianist began to form at 7 o'clock in the morning, although the doors were not opened until 9:30. The general opinion seems to be wherever he has played this year that the great Pole's art has never been so even, so wonderfully impressive as it is now. He will play in Philadelphia the Beethoven concerto in E flat, which stands to all other pianoforte concertos as Beethoven's concerto for the violin stands over all other concertos for violin.

The first work on the programme will be Brahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major. The work in which Doctor Muck last year won the unqualified praise and admiration of the critics was Brahms's C Minor Symphony, No. 1. This performance, perhaps, more than anything else, stamped him as one of the few really great conductors of the world. Although Paderewski, by force of his personality and his art, is likely to dominate any concert in which he takes part, it is an interesting fact that in Boston on the 15th and 16th he shared the enthusiastic applause with Doctor Muck, for, especially on Saturday night, the performance of Brahms's symphony was rewarded with cheers. The Schumann overture, "Genoveva," completed the programme.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
PHILADELPHIA PA
NOV 30 1907

Paderewski will be heard at the Academy of Music again on Monday evening next, when he will be the soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert. He will appear six times next week with the orchestra, playing in Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York. He will use two concertos, Beethoven's in E flat, and Rubinstein's in D minor. He will play the former in Philadelphia.

The symphonic number on the programme will be Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D Major, the other number being Schu-

NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
NOV 17 1907

Kommende Konzerte.

Dr. Karl Muck hat für das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester eine neue Komposition von Charles Martin Löffler, der früher viele Jahre hindurch zweiter Konzertmeister des berühmten Orchesters war, zur Aufführung angenommen. Die Komposition heißt „A Pagan Poem", ist auf einer der Virgil'schen Eklogen basirt und gehört der Programmmusik an. — In den nächsten, am kommenden Samstag und Sonntag stattfindenden Konzerten der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft unter der Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch in Carnegie Hall wird Frau Emma Eames zum einzigen Mal in der laufenden Saison auf dem Konzertpodium erscheinen. Die Künstlerin wird Arien aus Mozart's „Cosi fan tutte" und Puccini's „Tosca" singen. Das Programm schließt ferner Tschaikowsky's 5. Symphonie ein. Herr Walter Damrosch will in einem der nächsten Konzerte der genannten Gesellschaft den Versuch machen, das Orchester nach dem Vorbild des Wagner'schen Theater-Orchesters den Zuhörern unsichtbar zu machen. — Die beiden ersten Konzerte der People's Symphonie-Gesellschaft finden am 21. November in Cooper Union Hall und am 22. November in Carnegie Hall, beide Abends, statt. Das Programm ist dem Andenken des verstorbenen Komponisten Grieg gewidmet. Als Solistin wird Fräulein August Cottlow das Grieg'sche Pianokonzert spielen, während die populäre Tschaikowsky'sche „Pathetique" den Beschluß bildet. — Das nächstkommende Konzert der Tonkünstler-Gesellschaft findet Dinstag, Abends 8 Uhr 30, in der Assembly Hall statt. — Das Kneisel-Quartett hat am 12. November in Boston, das erste Mal in seiner neuen Zusammensetzung, mit großem Erfolg konzertirt. Wie wir erfahren, ist die Nachfrage nach Sitzen für die New Yorker Konzerte so bedeutend wie immer. — Das Margulies-Trio veranstaltet am kommenden Dinstag Abend in Mendelssohn Hall sein erstes Konzert unter Mitwirkung von Herrn Lorenz Smith und Herrn Sam Franko. — Das zweite Piano-Rezital Paderewski's ist für nächsten Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall angekündigt. Der berühmte Künstler spielt außer einer Auslese von zehn Chopin-Nummern Liszt's B-Moll-Sonate und seine eigene Komposition, Sonate, op. 21. Paderewski wird in den Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerten am 5. und 7. Dezember Beethoven's „Kaiser"-Konzert, resp. Rubinstein's D-Moll-Konzert No. 4 spielen. Paderewski wird nur diese zwei Mal im Rahmen eines Symphoniekonzertes auftreten. — Ein Liederabend von Frl. Susan Metcalfe findet Dinstag Nachmittag 3 Uhr 30 in Mendelssohn Hall mit interessantem Programm statt. — Am Dinstag Abend singt Frl. Gertrude Hinz in College Hall, am Dinstag Nachmittag Herr David Bispham ebendaselbst, am Donnerstag Abend findet das Piano-Rezital des Herrn Julius Schenbel in Mendelssohn Hall statt. — Für nächsten Donnerstag Abend ist das erste Konzert der Volpe Symphonie-Gesellschaft unter Leitung des Herrn Arnold Volpe, angesetzt. Als Solist fungirt der bekannte Cello-Virtuose Herr Jean Gérardy, der Lalo's Violinkonzert zum Vortrag bringen wird. — Am Freitag giebt Herr Max Donner in Mendelssohn Hall ein Violinkonzert, am Samstag wird Herr Richard Buhlig sein drittes Piano-Rezital daselbst absolviren. — Matja von Niessen-Stone, die bekannte Altistin, kündigt für den 4. Dezember, 29. Januar und 11. März drei Liederabende in Mendelssohn Hall an. Die Dame wird in 11 verschiedenen Sprachen singen. — Der Bariton Herr Albert Janpolski kündigt für den 6. Dezember ein Gesang-Rezital in Mendelssohn Hall an.

Frau Teresa Careño, die gefeierte Pianistin, ist gestern aus Neuseeland in Vancouver, B. C., angekommen und hat sofort die Reise nach dem Osten der Vereinigten Staaten angetreten.

INQUIRER
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 1- 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening at quarter past eight. More than usual interest attaches to this concert, because Paderewski is to be the assisting solo artist, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. The following is the program in full:

Brahms—Symphony, No. 2, in D major, op. 73.

Beethoven—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, op. 73.

Schumann—Overture, "Genoveva."

[76]

Record
Address .....
PHILADELPHIA, PA
Date ..... DEC 1- 1907

concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Paderewski will be the assisting solo artist, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. He will play the Beethoven concerto in E flat. The orchestra will play Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major and the overture of "Genoveva," by Schumann.

IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

DEC 1- 1907

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening at quarter past eight. More than usual interest attaches to this concert because Paderewski is to be the assisting solo artist, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. The great pianist is going to perform this week the not slight task of playing six times in six days, for he is the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its regular December trip. To-morrow night he plays here; Tuesday afternoon he plays in Washington; Wednesday evening in Baltimore; Thursday evening in New York; Friday evening in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon again in New York. He will use two concertos, Beethoven's in E-flat, commonly known as "The Emperor," and Rubinstein's in D minor.

The following is the program in full:—

Brahms—
Symphony, No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73.
Beethoven—
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat Major, Op. 73.
Schumann—
Overture, "Genoveva."

Soloist, Mr. Paderewski.

NEWS
Address ..... BALTIMORE, MD
Date ..... NOV 30 1907

PADEREWSKI AS SOLOIST.

Musical Events Of Interest In City Next Week.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, December 4, will bring the first soloist of the season, and that soloist will be Ignace Jan Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Baltimore it will be; in fact, it will be his final appearance in this city during his present tour. The programme in full is as follows:

Tone poem, "Taormina".....Boehe
Adagio and Scherzo—Finale from symphonic suite in E minor...Reznicek
Concerto for piano and orchestra in E-flat major, Op. 73.....Beethoven
Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann

The next concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra will take place at the Lyric on December 16.

NEWS
Address ..... NEWARK, N.J.
Date ..... DEC 3- 1907

Seats for the Boston Symphony.

The public sale of seats foor the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium next Monday night will [illegible] Company's music wa[illegible] street, to-morrow morning. [illegible] by the number of mail orders thus far received by Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager, a large audience is assured. Many good seats are still to be had, however, but those who wish to attend the concert should not delay in securing tickets. The full orchestra of ninety-seven musicians will appear here, and Mme. [illegible] Samaroff, the not[illegible]

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 1- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TUESDAY

Paderewski Will Be Soloist Playing Rubinstein's Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able this year to redeem the promise it made last that Paderewski would be the assisting solo artist at one of its Washington concerts. At its second concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, Mr. Paderewski will be the soloist. During the week the distinguished pianist has the rather difficult task of playing six times in six days, because he will be soloist with the orchestra at all the concerts it gives on its regular December trip. Monday night he plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore, Thursday night in New York, Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon again in New York.

At three of the concerts he will play Beethoven's concerto, in E flat, and at the other three he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. It is this latter work which he will play in Washington. To all music lovers it is well known as one of the most brilliant pieces of its kind. Written by a great pianist, who happened also to be a great composer, it contains all the material necessary to display the ability of the performer, and at the same time holds within itself musical value of an uncommon sort. Mr. Paderewski played this work in Boston November 15 and 16, and won with it an enormous success.

The first work on the program will be one that is new to Washington, and one which should win the same favor here that it has in other places the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played this winter. It is a symphonic trilogy by Vincent d'Indy, entitled, "Wallenstein." It is inspired, of course, by the three Schiller dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," "I Piccolomini," and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and last movements of the work bear the same names as the first and last parts of the dramatic trilogy, but the second movement instead of being called "I Piccolomini," is entitled "Max and Thekla." Vincent d'Indy will be remembered as having conducted the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington two years ago. He ranks among the greatest contemporary French composers, if, indeed, he does not stand at the very head of the list.

The program in full will be as follows:

D'Indy—Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," after the dramatic poem of Schiller, op. 12.

Rubinstein—Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 70.

Lalo—Overture Le Roi d'Ys.

Soloist—Paderewski.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 1- 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, with Paderewski as soloist. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. To all lovers of music it is well known as one of the most brilliant pieces of its kind. Written by a great pianist, who was also a great composer, it contains all the material necessary to display the virtuosity of the performer and at the same time holds within itself musical value of an uncommon sort. Paderewski played this work in Boston November 15 and 16, and won an enormous success.

The first work of the program will be one that is new to Washington, and which should win the same favor here that it has in other places the Boston Symphony Orhestra has played this year. It is a symphonic trilogy by Vincent d'Indy, entitled "Wallenstein." It is inspired by the three Schiller dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," "I Piccolomini," and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and last movements of the work bear the same names as the first and last parts of the dramatic trilogy, but the second movement, instead of being called "I Piccolomini," is entitled "Max and Thekla." Vincent d'Indy will be remembered as having conducted the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington two years ago. He ranks among the greatest contemporary French composers. D'Indy wrote the second movement as a concert overture in the early seventies, when it was played in Paris, and the work was per[illegible] as a whole in Paris nineteen [illegible] Parts of it have been played in this country, but it was never performed in its entirety until Dr. Muck brought it out in Boston a few weeks ago. It is straight program music, the first movement portraying the marital excitement and the rude carousings of a camp, the second being a love song pure and simple, and the third being marked with the shadow of tragedy.

The program in full will be as follows:

D'Indy—Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," after the dramatic poem of Schiller, op. 12.

Rubinstein—Concerto in D [illegible]

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR.
NEWARK, N.J.
NOV 30 1907

Boston Symphony Seat Sale.

The public sale of seats for the first appearance in Newark of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, will open at Lanter's, 657-659 Broad street, next Wednesday morning. The concert, as has been already announced, will be given in the Krueger Auditorium on Monday night, December 9, and will begin at 8 o'clock precisely. The orchestra will stay in New York after its matinee on Saturday afternoon, December 7, purposely for this concert, and those who have not been able to attend its concerts in Carnegie Hall will have the opportunity of listening to its playing here under the same conditions which prevailed there.

The soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff, is also a newcomer in Newark, and much is promised of her. Mme. Samaroff, despite her Russian name, is a native-born American; in fact, she is very native born, as she was born at the government army post in San Antonio, Tex., where her father was an officer. Of course, a great deal of her life has been spent abroad, but she is thoroughly American, and she did what few dare to do—she began her career in this country before she had ever played in public abroad. Her career of the last three years is a standing refutation of the hackneyed charge that no musician can succeed in America without a European cachet. In three years from an absolutely unknown girl, without "pull" or influence of any kind, she has become one of the foremost and popular pianists in this country. She has been soloist with all the great orchestras of America, and has played at least a dozen times with the Boston Symphony.

To play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra means more for an artist than to play with any other orchestra in this country, for not only is it the leading organization of its kind, but it has very few soloists, and its choice is restricted to the very best. Mme. Samaroff, having had three more successful seasons in America, is going to spend next year abroad, and she will make her European debut with the famous Colonne orchestra at the Chatelet, in Paris, on the third Sunday of next October. She is to play with the leading orchestras of London, Berlin, Vienna and other musical centres.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is of more than ordinary interest. It comprises a characteristic work by the great living French composer, Vincent d'Indy; pianoforte concerto by Edward Grieg, the noted Norwegian, who died a few months ago, and a characteristic work by the great Schumann. D'Indy's work will be the Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," based upon Schiller's trilogy of dramas. The Schumann work will be the overture to the opera "Genoveva."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m ress
te
DEC 1- 1907

BEETHOVEN AND BRAHMS; PADEREWSKI AND DR. MUCK

The second Boston symphony concert tomorrow evening will arouse more than usual interest because Paderewski is to be the assisting artist, this being his only local appearance with orchestra. The great pianist is to perform this week the xacting task of playing six times in six ays as soloist with the Boston Symphony rchestra in its regular December trip. e will use two concertos, Beethoven's in flat, commonly known as "The Empe- or," and Rubinstein's in D minor. Be- ore the Friday afternoon public rehear- l in Boston recently the line of those ho wanted to hear the great pianist be- an to form at 7 o'clock in the morning, lthough the doors were not opened until 30. The general opinion seems to be herever he has played this year that the reat Pole's art has never been so even, wonderfully impressive as it is now. e will play in Philadelphia the Bee- oven concerto in E flat, which stands to l other pianoforte concertos as Bee- oven's concerto for the violin stands or all other concertos for violin.

The first work on the programme will be rahms's Symphony No. 2 in D major. The ork in which Doctor Muck last year won he unqualified praise and admiration of he critics was Brahms's C Minor Sym- hony, No. 1. This performance, perhaps, ore than anything else, stamped him as ne of the few really great conductors of he world. Although Paderewski, by force f his personality and his art, is likely to ominate any concert in which he takes art, it is an interesting fact that in Bos- on on the 15th and 16th he shared the en- husiastic applause with Doctor Muck, for, specially on Saturday night, the perform- nce of Brahms's symphony was rewarded ith cheers. The Schumann overture, "Geoseva," completed the programme.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NOV 30 1907

Paderewski will be heard at the Academy of Music again on Monday evening next, when he will be the soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert. He will appear six times next week with the orchestra, playing in Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and twice in New York. He will use two concertos, Beethoven's in E flat, and Rubenstein's in D minor. He will play the former in Philadelphia.

The symphonic number on the programme will be Braham's Symphony No. 2 in D Major, the other number being Schu- [illegible] "Genoveva."

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
NOV 17 1907

Kommende Konzerte.

Dr. Karl Muck hat für das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester eine neue Komposition von Charles Martin Löffler, der früher viele Jahre hindurch zweiter Konzertmeister des berühmten Orchesters war, zur Aufführung angenommen. Die Komposition heißt „A Pagan Poem", ist auf einer der Virgil'schen Eklogen basirt und gehört der Programmmusik an. — In den nächsten, am kommenden Samstag und Sonntag stattfindenden Konzerten der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft unter der Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch in Carnegie Hall wird Frau Emma Eames zum einzigen Mal in der laufenden Saison auf dem Konzertpodium erscheinen. Die Künstlerin wird Arien aus Mozart's „Cosi fan tutte" und Puccini's „Tosca" singen. Das Programm schließt ferner Tschaikowsky's 5. Symphonie ein. Herr Walter Damrosch will in einem der nächsten Konzerte der genannten Gesellschaft den Versuch machen, das Orchester nach dem Vorbild des Wagner'schen Theater-Orchesters den Zuhörern unsichtbar zu machen. — Die beiden ersten Konzerte der People's Symphonie-Gesellschaft finden am 21. November in Cooper Union Hall und am 22. November in Carnegie Hall, beide Abends, statt. Das Programm ist dem Andenken des verstorbenen Komponisten Grieg gewidmet. Als Solistin wird Fräulein August Cottlow das Grieg'sche Pianokonzert spielen, während die populäre Tschaikowsky'sche „Pathetique" den Beschluß bildet. — Das nächstkommende Konzert der Tonkünstler-Gesellschaft findet Dinstag, Abends 8 Uhr 30, in der Assembly Hall statt. — Das Kneisel-Quartett hat am 12. November in Boston, das erste Mal in seiner neuen Zusammensetzung, mit großem Erfolg konzertirt. Wie wir erfahren, ist die Nachfrage nach Sitzen für die New Yorker Konzerte so bedeutend wie immer. — Das Margulies-Trio veranstaltet am kommenden Dinstag Abend in Mendelsohn Hall sein erstes Konzert unter Mitwirkung von Herrn Lorenz Smith und Herrn Sam Franko. — Das zweite Piano-Rezital Paderewski's ist für nächsten Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall angekündigt. Der berühmte Künstler spielt außer einer Auslese von zehn Chopin-Nummern Liszt's B-Moll-Sonate und seine eigene Komposition, Sonate, op, 21. Paderewski wird in den Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerten am 5. und 7. Dezember Beethoven's „Kaiser"-Konzert, resp. Rubinstein's D-Moll-Konzert No. 4 spielen. Paderewski wird nur diese zwei Mal im Rahmen eines Symphoniekonzertes auftreten. — Ein Liederabend von Frl. Susan Metcalfe findet Dinstag Nachmittag 3 Uhr 30 in Mendelsohn Hall mit interessantem Programm statt. — Am Dinstag Abend singt Frl. Gertrude Hinz in College Hall, am Dinstag Nachmittag Herr David Bispham ebendaselbst, am Donnerstag Abend findet das Piano-Rezital des Herrn Julius Schendel in Mendelsohn Hall statt. — Für nächsten Donnerstag Abend ist das erste Konzert der Volpe Symphonie-Gesellschaft unter Leitung des Herrn Arnold Volpe, angesetzt. Als Solist fungirt der bekannte Cello-Virtuose Herr Jean Gérardy, der Lalo's Violinkonzert zum Vortrag bringen wird. — Am Freitag giebt Herr Max Donner in Mendelsohn Hall ein Violinkonzert, am Samstag wird Herr Richard Buhlig sein drittes Piano-Rezital daselbst absolviren. — Matja von Nissen-Stone, die bekannte Altistin, kündigt für den 4. Dezember, 29. Januar und 11. März drei Liederabende in Mendelsohn Hall an. Die Dame wird in 11 verschiedenen Sprachen singen. — Der Bariton Herr Albert Janpolski kündigt für den 6. Dezember ein Gesang-Rezital in Mendelsohn Hall an.

Frau Teresa Careño, die gefeierte Pianistin, ist gestern aus Neuseeland in Vancouver, B. C., angekommen und hat sofort die Reise nach dem Osten der Vereinigten Staaten angetreten.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
DEC 1- 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening at quarter past eight. More than usual interest attaches to this concert, because Paderewski is to be the assisting solo artist, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. The following is the program in full:

Brahms—Symphony, No. 2, in D major, op. 73.

Beethoven—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, op. 73.

Schumann—Overture "Genoveva."

[76]

om RECORD
ddress PHILADELPHIA, PA
ate DEC 1- 1907

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Paderewski will be the assisting solo artist, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. He will play the Beethoven concerto in E flat. The orchestra will play Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major and the overture of "Genoveva," by Schumann.

IGNACE PADEREWSKI.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
DEC 1- 1907

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening at quarter past eight. More than usual interest attaches to this concert because Paderewski is to be the assisting solo artist, and this will be his only appearance with orchestra in this city. The great pianist is going to perform this week the not slight task of playing six times in six days, for he is the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its regular December trip. To-morrow night he plays here; Tuesday afternoon he plays in Washington; Wednesday evening in Baltimore; Thursday evening in New York; Friday evening in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon again in New York. He will use two concertos, Beethoven's in E-flat, commonly known as "The Emperor," and Rubinstein's in D minor.

The following is the program in full:—

Brahms—
Symphony; No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73.
Beethoven—
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat Major, Op. 73.
Schumann—
Overture, "Genoveva."

Soloist, Mr. Paderewski.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 30 1907

PADEREWSKI AS SOLOIST.

Musical Events Of Interest In City Next Week.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, December 4, will bring the first soloist of the season, and that soloist will be Ignace Jan Paderewski, whose only appearance with orchestra in Baltimore it will be; in fact, it will be his final appearance in this city during his present tour. The programme in full is as follows:

Tone poem, "Taormina".....Boehe
Adagio and Scherzo—Finale from symphonic suite in E minor...Reznicek
Concerto for piano and orchestra in E-flat major, Op. 73.....Beethoven
Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann

The next concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra will take place at the Lyric on December 16.

NEWS
NEWARK, N.J.
DEC 3- 1907

Seats for the Boston Symphony.

The public sale of seats foor the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium next Monday night will open at the Lauter Company's music warerooms, 657 Broad street, to-morrow morning. Judging by the number of mail orders thus far received by Frederick N. Sommer, the local manager, a large audience is assured. Many good seats are still to be had, however, but those who wish to attend the concert should not delay in securing tickets. The full orchestra of ninety-seven musicians will appear here, and Mme. Olga Samaroff, the noted pianist, will assist.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 1- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TUESDAY

Paderewski Will Be Soloist Playing Rubinstein's Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able this year to redeem the promise it made last that Paderewski would be the assisting solo artist at one of its Washington concerts. At its second concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, Mr. Paderewski will be the soloist. During the week the distinguished pianist has the rather difficult task of playing six times in six days, because he will be soloist with the orchestra at all the concerts it gives on its regular December trip. Monday night he plays in Philadelphia, Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore, Thursday night in New York, Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon again in New York.

At three of the concerts he will play Beethoven's concerto, in E flat, and at the other three he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. It is this latter work which he will play in Washington. To all music lovers it is well known as one of the most brilliant pieces of its kind. Written by a great pianist, who happened also to be a great composer, it contains all the material necessary to display the ability of the performer, and at the same time holds within itself musical value of an uncommon sort. Mr. Paderewski played this work in Boston November 15 and 16, and won with it an enormous success.

The first work on the program will be one that is new to Washington, and one which should win the same favor here that it has in other places the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played this winter. It is a symphonic trilogy by Vincent d'Indy, entitled, "Wallenstein." It is inspired, of course, by the three Schiller dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," "I Piccolomini," and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and last movements of the work bear the same names as the first and last parts of the dramatic trilogy, but the second movement instead of being called "I Piccolomini," is entitled "Max and Thekla." Vincent d'Indy will be remembered as having conducted the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington two years ago. He ranks among the greatest contemporary French composers, if, indeed, he does not stand at the very head of the list.

The program in full will be as follows:

D'Indy—Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," after the dramatic poem of Schiller, op. 12.

Rubinstein—Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 70.

Lalo—Overture Le Roi d'Ys.

Soloist—Paderewski.

STAR
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 1- 1907

Boston Symphony and Paderewski.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, with Paderewski as soloist. He will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. To all lovers of music it is well known as one of the most brilliant pieces of its kind. Written by a great pianist, who was also a great composer, it contains all the material necessary to display the virtuosity of the performer and at the same time holds within itself musical value of an uncommon sort. Paderewski played this work in Boston November 15 and 16, and won an enormous success.

The first work of the program will be one that is new to Washington, and which should win the same favor here that it has in other places the Boston Symphony Orhestra has played this year. It is a symphonic trilogy by Vincent d'Indy, entitled "Wallenstein." It is inspired by the three Schiller dramas, "Wallenstein's Camp," "I Piccolomini," and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and last movements of the work bear the same names as the first and last parts of the dramatic trilogy, but the second movement, instead of being called "I Piccolomini," is entitled "Max and Thekla." Vincent d'Indy will be remembered as having conducted the December concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Washington two years ago. He ranks among the greatest contemporary French composers. D'Indy wrote the second movement as a concert overture in the early seventies, when it was played in Paris, and the work was performed as a whole in Paris nineteen years ago. Parts of it have been played in this country, but it was never performed in its entirety until Dr. Muck brought it out in Boston a few weeks ago. It is straight program music, the first movement portraying the marital excitement and the rude carousings of a camp, the second being a love song pure and simple, and the third being marked with the shadow of tragedy.

The program in full will be as follows:

D'Indy—Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," after the dramatic poem of Schiller, op. 12.

Rubinstein—Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 70.

Lalo—Overture Le Roi d'Ys.

SUN, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1907.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Paderewski Plays the "Emperor" Piano Concerto of Beethoven.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night was one of those entertainments which require but little comment but leave in the mind some extremely pleasant memories. The programme contained only three numbers, the D major symphony of Brahms, the "Emperor" piano concerto of Beethoven and the "Genoveva" overture of Schumann. The solo performer was Mr. Paderewski, and an item of interest is the fact that despite his presence the audience was no larger than those which heard the previous concerts of the orchestra this season.

The performance of the symphony was a memorable one. Dr. Muck has ere this demonstrated that he is a master conductor of Brahms, and his reading of the D major symphony was quite in keeping with his reputation. His treatment of the work was such as to bring out the most enthusiastic approval from devotees of the composer. He made even the passages of bad scoring, such as that at the close of the first movement, sound good. After the performance Dr. Muck was called out half a dozen times, and even the orchestra had to rise and bow.

Mr. Paderewski is not regarded as a Beethoven specialist, but his reading of the E flat concerto has certainly gained in dignity and breadth of style. The reading of last night was sane, clear, reverent and yet not without those touches of exquisite tenderness never absent from this artist's playing. That he dropped a few notes only went to show that he is a man and not a mechanical piano player. They never make mistakes.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1907.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Restitution being impossible, under the circumstances, Dr. Muck made amends which were most honorable last night for the olla podrida programme which he provided for the subscribers of the Boston Symphony concerts at their first meeting a month ago. Instead of again dallying with the three B's—Bruckner, Bach and Beethoven—merely for the sake of the dalliance, he permitted his audience to hear a symphony by the composer whom von Bülow associated with the two classical masters when he originated the play on composers' initials—he brought forward the second symphony by Brahms. It was played to the enthusiastic delight of the fine audience which the Boston musicians have drawn to their concerts—audiences that are numerous and also intelligent and refined in their tastes. Not only did Dr. Muck give them Brahms to make them forget Bruckner—or at least forgive him—he also gave them Paderewski as the solo performer in Beethoven's E flat concerto. This must have appeared to many in the light of a benefaction. The Boston Orchestra needs no solo performer to attract an audience; Mr. Paderewski has demonstrated over and over again that he is a more powerful loadstone without an orchestra than with one. Yet last night we had the two combined, to the delight of the lovers of the higher forms in pianoforte music. He played the concerto superbly, with the loveliest devotion to the text, with complete subservience of himself to the music—an unselfishness which has not been always noticeable when he played with orchestra—with admirable clarity, with dignity and strength and nobility. Afterward, since the audience would have it so, he supplemented the concerto with a solo number—Mendelssohn's "Song Without Words," in F major, and in it transported his listeners with the loveliness of his cantilena. Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" concluded the concert. It is scarcely necessary to add that the capacity of the audience room was taxed to its utmost.

H. E. K.

...r Cutting Bureau in the World

...TIMES, N. Y.

DEC 1 - 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening will bring the first soloist of the season, and that soloist will be Ignace Jan Paderewski, whose only appearance with ochestras in Baltimore it will be. In fact, it will be his final appearance in this city during his present tour. It is unnecessary to say anything about the way in which Mr. Paderewski is playing this year, because his concert at the end of October in Baltimore is still vividly remembered by all those of the large audience present. It has been necessary to increase the prices of tickets for this concert, owing to the expense of having this great artist as soloist. Paderewski will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major.

There will be no symphony on the program, but two novelties of more than ordinary interest. The first is a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, the latest work of a young man who shows at least as much promise as any of the younger composers of Germany. Boehe is the son of an officer in the Bavarian Army, and he himself was intended for a military career, but he quickly switched off into music. The other novelty is the last two sections, an Adagio and Scherzo-Finale of a suite in three movements by Emile Nicolaus von Reznicek. The program in full is as follows:

Boehe—Tone poem, "Taormina."
Reznicek—Adagio and Scherzo-Finale, from Symphonic Suite in E minor.
Beethoven—Concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat major. Op. 73.
Schumann—Overture, "Genoveva."

THE NEW YORK TIMES. DECEMBER 6, 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS

M. Paderewski the Soloist in Beethoven's E Flat Concerto.

A FINE PERFORMANCE

Brahms's Second Symphony Played Splendidly—Schumann's Genoveva Overture.

The two concerts that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives at its second visit to New York this season are made notable by the co-operation of Mr. Paderewski. He appeared as its soloist at the first concert given last evening, playing here for the first time with orchestra in a number of years. The hall was, of course, more than usually crowded, and there was plenty of enthusiasm for the distinguished artist. And yet the appearance of a soloist, however distinguished, at these concerts is evidently not a matter that comes first in the minds of its audiences, which value, first of al, the performances of the orchestra itself.

Mr. Paderewski played Beethoven's concerto in E flat, a work that in the earlier years of his American visits he was several times heard in. It was a noble and beautiful performance, infused with the spirit of poetry, and suffering not at all from any undue forcing of the solo instrument in an effort to make it predominate over the orchestra. There were breadth, repose, and poise in his rending throughout, clarity and perspicuity in the outlining of its larger proportions as in the delineation of every phrase. Mr. Paderewski put into certain portions of the concerto where the music for the solo instrument is resolved into an efflorwarmth and color and vitality of tone that, under the circumstances, aroused admiration. He was most warmly greeted.

The symphonic numbers were Brahms's second symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. Dr. Muck made his first deep impression in New York by his remarkable reading of Brahms's first symony a year ago; and his performance of this second one last evening was of the same surpassing sormt. It was played with a wonderful verve and fire, with an enthusiasm that kindled the audience to an answering emotion throughout.

There was a remarkable freedom and elasticity in all Dr. Muck's tempos, a pregnant significance in his outlining of every phrase and in his modeling of the symmetry of the whole. There was everywhere an insistent feeling for the unbroken current of the melody that wells so strongly through the work. But most remarkable of all was the beauty of the orchestral coloring as it was disclosed by Dr. Muck's treatment. It is a commonplace of hostile criticism that Brahms's orchestration is "bad," that it does not "sound."

Felix Weingartner not long ago wrote a brilliantly sarcastic article against this order of criticism, in which he spoke out the fullness of knowledge, of the "magical beauties" of Brahms's orchestration. To confute the parrotted criticisms against it should be the result of all good performances of Brahms's works. "The difficulty of which," he said, "consists in the elaboration of all details with the utmost clearness and a proper estimate of their relative importance, at the same time preserving the large outline, effacing nothing, exaggerating nothing, connecting the utmost rhythmical clearness with an expressive leading of the melodic line."

How effective such a study of Brahms's orchestration is, the orchestra's performance triumphantly showed last night. But orchestration cannot be made to sound as that did. It is bad or unintelligent performance that makes this orchestral writing sound badly.

POST

...D. C.

DEC 1 - 1907

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is able this year to redeem the promise it made last that Paderewski would be the assisting solo artist at one of its Washington concerts. At its second concert of the season, to be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, Mr. Paderewski will be the soloist. During the week the distinguished pianist has the rather difficult task of playing six times in six days. On Monday night he plays in Philadelphia, on Tuesday afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore, Thursday night in New York, Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday afternoon again in New York. At three of the concerts he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat, and at the other three he will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. It is this latter work which he will play here in Washington. To all music lovers it is well known as one of the most brilliant pieces of its kind. Written by a great pianist, who happened also to be a great composer, it contains all the material necessary to display the virtuosity of the performer, and at the same time holds within itself musical value of an uncommon sort.

The programme will be as follows:

D'Indy—Symphonic Trilogy "Wallenstein," after the dramatic poem of Schiller, op. 12.
Rubinstein—Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 70.
Lalo—Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

SUN

...ALTIMORE, MD

DEC 1 - 1907

MUSIC IN BALTIMORE

Paderewski As Soloist At Boston Symphony Concert.

DR. MUCK PREPARES SURPRISE

Will Introduce Two Decided Novelties — Mr. Van Hulsteyn And Miss Morris In Peabody Recital.

The second of the present series of Baltimore concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric Wednesday evening. It will mark the second appearance here of Ignace Paderewski, the Polish pianist, who gave a concert in October. Because of the expense of bringing Paderewski to Baltimore as soloist, the management of the orchestra has been obliged to increase the price of the regular admission charged.

Paderewski will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major. There will be no symphony on the program. Instead Dr. Muck will introduce two novelties of more than ordinary interest. The first will be a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, the latest work of a young man who shows at least as much promise as any of the younger composers of Germany. Two years ago Mr. Gericke brought out Boehe's "Ulysses' Departure and Shipwreck," and it made a decidedly favorable impression in Boston. Circumstances, however, prevented its performance that year on any of the trips of the orchestra.

Boehe is the son of an officer in the Bavarian army. He himself was intended for a military career, but he switched off into music. He is a young man, still in his twenties, and much is expected of him. As the title of his tone poem suggests, the composer has drawn his inspiration for the work from the quaint little Sicilian town perched upon the foothills of Mount Etna.

To Introduce Novelties.

The other is a novelty in a sense that until Dr. Muck produced it in Boston on the 22d and 23d of this month it had never been heard here. It is the last two sections, an adagio and scherzo-finale, of a suite in three movements by Emile Nicolaus von Reznicek. Reznicek is a composer and a conductor of considerable note in Germany. His father was a field marshal in the Austrian army, and he is a Bohemian by nativity and descent. He is best known as the composer of the opera comique "Donna Diana," the overture of which was first played in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Paur. This suite was published as long ago as 1883, and it belongs to that class of music which through some strange chance has been left in unmerited obscurity.

Following will be the full program of Wednesday's concert:

Boehe—Tone poem "Taormina."
Reznicek—Adagio and scherzo-finale, from Symphonic Suite in E minor.
Beethoven—Concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat major, op. 73.
Schumann—Overture, "Genoveva."

COLUMBIA

...N. Y.

DEC 1 - 1907

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, under whose management America's two leading orchestras, the New York and the Boston Symphony, are coming to Convention Hall next month, is delighted at the way in which the public has shown its interest in the undertaking. The people are certainly giving evidence of their appreciation of the musical treat soon to be offered them and mail orders are coming in for both concerts in a most gratifying way.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conductor, plays here on Friday evening, January 3d; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will be here on Monday evening, January 27th

While the prices for seats for either orchestra are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents, those subscribing for both concerts at the same time get both $2 seats for $3, and both $1.50 seats for $2.50. There will be no reduction of the $1 or the 75-cent seats.

Mail orders, accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith, may be sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place, and will be taken care of in the order of receipt and filled in advance of the general sale.

...N. Y.

DEC 1 - 1907

...nave been coming in.

On Friday evening, Jan. 3, the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch conductor, will play at Convention Hall, and on Monday evening, Jan. 27, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will be here. It is an announcement that cannot fail to attract the attention of every music lover in Buffalo and Western New York.

...TIMES

...om

...BUFFALO

...dress

...te

DEC 1 - 1907

That Buffalo music lovers appreciate the fact that the two leading orchestras of America are coming to Convention Hall in January is shown by the number of mail orders coming in to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, the local manager. The New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, plays here on Friday evening, January 3d, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, will be heard here on Monday evening, January 27th. The announcement is worthy of the interest it has aroused.

So many are ordering for orchestras at the same time that Mrs. Smith has arranged a material reduction in price for those so subscribing. The prices for either orchestra are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those buying for both at the same time get both $2 seats for $3 and the $1.50 seats for $2.50; no reduction on either the $1 or the 75 cent seats. Mail orders will be filled in the order of their receipt in advance of the general sale, but they must be accompanied by check, payable to Mai Davis Smith, and sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving Place.

...Cutting Bureau in the World

...BUFFALO N. Y.

DEC 1 - 1907

Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, under whose management the New York Symphony Orchestra and the Boston Symphony Orchestra come to Convention Hall in January, is delighted over the interest shown in these two concerts and the rapidity with which mail orders are coming in.

On Friday evening, January 3d, the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, will be in Buffalo, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, plays there on Monday evening, January 27th.

While mail orders will be received for either of these concerts, most of them are for both and to those so subscribing a material reduction is made. The prices for either orchestra are $2, $1.50, $1 and 75 cents; but those buying for the two at once get the $2 seats for both at $3 and the $1.50 seats at $2.50, no reductions on the $1 or the 75-cent seats.

These mail orders are filled in the order of their receipt and in advance of the general sale, but to be honored they must be accompanied by check payable to Mai Davis Smith and sent to Mrs. Smith at No. 26 Irving place.

...ss

...-07 8-

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Second Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when it was heard in a program which comprised only two orchestral numbers, Brahms' symphony in D major, No. 2, and Schumann's not very consequential overture of "Genoveva." It cannot be said that the performance was one of extraordinary distinction. Brahms' beautiful music was of course rendered with the utmost brilliancy of execution, with a lovely quality of tone and with a fine lucidity of statement, but these are things which one takes for granted whenever Mr. Higginson's organization is concerned and what one missed was the accent of a personal interest and the eloquence of a personal sympathy.

Dr. Muck's interpretation of the score was intelligent and correct, but it lacked color and emphasis and movement and that indiscribable something which makes all the difference between what is perfunctory and commonplace and what is inspired and communicatively impressive. Comparisons are said to be odious, but they may also be illuminative and it must be said that much better readings of this symphony have been heard under less favorable conditions from the hands of the late Fritz Scheel. This is the more noteworthy because the preliminary announcements had suggested the idea that as an exponent of Brahms Dr. Muck was especially effective and in this way expectations were aroused which the issue disappointed. However, one cannot be always at one's best and perhaps last night Dr. Muck was not in the mood.

The assisting artist was Mr. Paderewski, who brought his extraordinary if not unequaled powers to a masterly and admirable presentation of Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat major, the so-called "Emperor." It is undeniable that of late Mr. Paderewski has taken to what in one less eminent would be called pounding, and there were moments last evening when this tendency was in evidence, but there were many passages in which he was heard at his finest and in which the charm of his tone, the limpidity of his legato, the sweetness of his cantabile and the delicacy of his tonal shading were most strikingly apparent. The composition with its interminable repetitions has come to sound old fashioned, but it contains some material of entrancing loveliness and its revival once in a while is very welcome, especially when the executant is a Pade-

OMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
rom PUBLIC LEDGER
ddress PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 3-

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Vast Audience Welcomes the Orchestra and Paderewski.

The power to draw a large audience in this city is by no means lacking to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When its own great clientele is reinforced by a crowd of Paderewski's admirers the demand for accommodation in the Academy of Music greatly exceeds the supply. In consequence there were many disappointed persons last night. Music lovers began to assemble before the door of the amphitheatre at 5 o'clock in the afternoon and by 7, before the doors were open, reached in double line to Spruce street.

A fine concert was given. The symphony, Brahms's 2d in D major, the work of one still young in a great career, sounded as joyous and exquisitely melodic as 20 years ago, when it was acclaimed a brilliant refutation of the Wagnerian theory that Beethoven had said the last word in the symphonic form. Scored by one who was yet to attain more absolute command over the instrumental resources of the modern orchestra, this D major symphony is not a work which calls out the entire force of the splendid orchestra which interpreted it last night. Nevertheless, the composer's primary reliance, through the first three movements, upon the strings gave new emphasis to the depth, the richness of quality and perfection of intonation of the violins, violas and 'cellos, which are the glory of this orchestra. As heard last night the adagietto, especially, was given in a gracefully whimsical spirit, yet so truly considerate of the direction "grazioso" that there was no lack of applause to proclaim the appreciation of the audience.

To describe Paderewski as the "assisting artist" would be to indulge in unconscious sarcasm. A soloist is generally auxiliary to a symphony concert, but Paderewski demonstrated last night that the part may be greater than the whole, whatever may logically be considered possible in this regard. There was no repetition of the effort of his last appearance here to gild refined gold or add effectiveness to his wonderful art by artificially lighting the auditorium so as to create a spectral chiaroscuro supposed to react upon the nerves.

Paderewski came before his audience, sombre faced as usual, a great artist, calmly ready for the expression of his supreme gifts and not like a half-fledged tragedian depending upon the electric bulbs to create an impression where he failed. Nothing more splendid than his playing of the Beethoven E flat major concerto could be asked. It is likely to remain an unapproachable memory for a long time to come, perhaps until he is prevailed upon to return to us and repeat his great rendition.

Every great quality of the pianist's art found expression during the massive dimensions and emotional variations of this work, rightly called "The Emperor." Devices of extreme pianissimo, an accent that compelled and a rhythm that allured, a perfection of trill, brilliant and soft by turns, the shadowed luminosity of the cantabile passages, an effect almost exclusively Paderewskian, brilliant dynamics alternating with a perfect simplicity of utterance—to catalogue these things is simply to fail of any inclusive estimate.

So splendid a tone was drawn from the piano, forced beyond its normal capabilities, that at times it seemed but the projection of the soul of the entire orchestra; no longer solo and accompaniment, the instruments were truly one and that one the famous pianist. After so great a performance it is no wonder that the people were loath to allow Paderewski to bow his final acknowledgment of their plaudits.

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 3- 1907

A PADEREWSKI NIGHT

Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert Centres Attention.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the combination which crowded the Academy of Music with auditors last evening, and a wonderful combination it proved. As a vehicle to display his virtuosity the Polish pianist selected Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat major (opus 73), a composition which afforded him an opportunity to exhibit not only remarkable skill, but intense musical feeling as well. Dimuendoes and Crescendos were played in a fashion which made one hold one's breath and his nuances were simply wonderful.

So great was the applause which greeted the pianist upon the termination of the Concerto that he departed from the usual custom at these symphony concerts and favored the audience with an encore—this time a Schumann composition, the exquisite and familiar "Nocturne."

The symphony of the evening was Brahms' No. 2, in D major, a work which did not meet the approval of the critics when it was given its initial performance, in 1877. Despite flashes of beauty and skill of composition, it is doubtful whether this symphony can ever become much of a favorite. It was played beautifully last evening, but it left the audience rather cold.

The only other selection on the program was Schumann's operture to "Genoveva."

884

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
WASHINGTON, D.
DEC 4- 1907

PUT TRADITIONS ASIDE

Paderewski Gave Programme with Double Encore.

ACTION DELIGHTED AUDIENCE

Novel Proceeding, Overturning All Precedents of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Greeted with Hysterical Enthusiasm—Final Appearance in Washington of Great Pianist Brings Crowd.

The audience which jammed itself yesterday afternoon into every available inch of the National Theater permitted by those laws which wise lawmakers have devised for public safety, witnessed an upheaval in the sacred traditions and an overturning of the revered precedents of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the like of which has probably never been known before in this city. The occasion of a cataclysm so tremendous was none other than the second and final appearance in this city of the pianist, Paderewski, who, contrary to all customs and rules prevailing in this venerable and conservative organization, interrupted the regular course of the announced programme by a double encore. Only once within the memory of the writer has the rule preventing encores at these concerts been set aside, and that was last year when Saint-Saens, the great composer and pianist, created a sensation after recalls by dropping upon the piano stool to add some dainty trifle to a programme in all other respects precise and proper.

Yielded to Impulses.

Paderewski had completed the Rubinstein concerto in D minor, and had come forward to the front of the stage four times, amid the applause and cheers, when he, too, as though yielding to a sudden impulse, moved once again toward the piano. There were little hysterical screams and one universal gasp of delight, which seemed to have issued from a thousand feminine throats, with an accompanying chorus of bravos from the men of the audience. Then, in that subtle, singing tonal beauty which Paderewski, it would seem, can command even though the instrument be out of tune, he played the Chopin nocturne in F sharp major, Op. 15, No. 2. There it was expected he would stop. But he didn't. Instead, he gave a few modulatory chords and went straight into Liszt's thirteenth rhapsody. It was a novel proceeding from every viewpoint, and was evidently enjoyed by the audience, which was not dismissed until 6:45 o'clock.

Whether the insertion of two numbers so frequently played and so hackneyed as these was discreet, from an esthetic viewpoint, in connection with a programme so admirably constructed and so adjusted in itself, the audience did not appear to suffer, although there were many who would have preferred one of Paderewski's own compositions to selections which are now so threadbare.

Work of the Orchestra.

The orchestra was in good form yesterday—almost, but not quite in its best form. It opened the programme with Vincent D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," which was given at the orchestra's first Baltimore concert this season. The contemporary school of French composers, those that claim to have imbibed their artistic formulas from Ceasar Franck, and who are now headed by D'Indy, have been practicing in their own peculiar manner for so long that the more advanced disciples are now arrived at a plane too elevated to be perceived by the artistic eye of the average musician of any other nation. In Germany Richard Strauss and Max Reger have reached the summit, each on a separate mountain. An American audience, listening to the most recent composition of any of these composers for the first time, and ignorant of all the preceding works which aided in their development, would scarcely be qualified to pass judgment upon the merits of the creations; though quite capable of enjoying and appreciating their earlier works. The trilogy in question was written toward the beginning of D'Indy's musical career, and is, therefore, not too difficult, is sufficiently modern, and bristles with pungent chords which are neither sugar-coated nor rounded into conventional roly-poly smoothness. The melodies are fascinating, and the "programme," such as it is, for the work is strictly of the "programme" music type, well carried out.

Accompaniment Was Superb.

In Rubinstein's concerto, No. 4, which is more frequently performed than any of his others, the orchestral accompaniment, down to the little responsive solo notes echoing the piano in the second movement, was superb. The pianist, while missing the perfection of technical execution of a Rosenthal, soared high up into the heavens of emotional poesy and idealism. The concert concluded with Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," an interesting and well-written number with an important cello solo, which was admirably performed. Dr. Muck's readings were commendable throughout, and his programme one of the best he has ever given in this city.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

MRS. ROOSEVELT PRESENT.

She Entertains Box Party at Boston Symphony Concert.

The inclemency of the weather yesterday afternoon told somewhat on the appearance of the house at the Boston Symphony concert. While it was thronged,

[78]

DEC 4- 1907

Mrs. Longworth, who, with Mr. Longworth, was among the guests in Mrs. Roosevelt's box, wore with her dark velvet gown a large white hat, trimmed with black plumes and magenta roses. Mrs. Roosevelt's gown was among the few light ones worn yesterday. It was of a rich cream color, with golden brown trimmings, and was worn with a hat in the two colors, harmonizing with the gown. Miss Hagner was in black velvet, with a black hat.

Other box holders were Baroness Sternburg, Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. James Lowndes, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Parsons, and Mrs. Lisner. Baroness Sternburg was becomingly gowned in violet cloth, with which she wore a small hat with a long plume matching the gown in color, and an ermine stole. Miss Langham wore a gown of art green cloth, with white lace undersleeves and guimp, and a black hat with black and light green plumes.

Mrs. Williams had with her in her box Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Miss Cannan, and Mrs. Hitt. Mrs. Parsons also entertained an interesting party, including Miss Nina Gaither, of Baltimore; Miss Eleanor Slater, Prince zu Lynar, Mr. William Phillips, and Mr. Schubert.

With Mrs. Lowndes were Mrs. Theodore Boal and a party of young girls.

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 4- 1907

N THE SOCIAL WORLD

Mrs. Roosevelt Entertainsat Symphony Concert.

BROOME - TUCKER NUPTIALS

Marriage a Quiet One, and Couple Depart on Honeymoon, After Which They Will Sail for Cuba—Miss Sallie Garlington Presented to Society at Luncheon—Personals.

Mrs. Roosevelt entertained a box party yesterday at the National to hear the Boston Symphony Concert. Her guests included Mrs. Root, Miss Hagner, and Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth. Mrs. Roosevelt was gowned in a becoming costume of tan and white. Mrs. Root, as always, was simply gowned in a tailored suit, and Mrs. Longworth wore a brown velvet suit and sable furs, with a becoming white hat of mushroom shape, trimmed with pink roses.

The Baroness von Sternburg occupied the box opposite Mrs. Roosevelt and looked unusually pretty in a suit of brown velvet and white lace, with which she wore a brown fur toque. Miss Langham, who was with her sister, was gowned in a blue afternoon frock with a large black hat. Other prominent society people in the audience were Mrs. Churchill Candee, Mrs. Harriet Blaine Beale, Mrs. Julian James, and Maj. Gen. and Mrs. Henry Corbin.

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 4- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paderewski Appears as Soloist with Noted Orchestra.

Of unusual brilliance was the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Paderewski as soloist.

Dr. Muck was greeted enthusiastically by the audience, and led the orchestra through the intricate compositions with his customary magnetic ability. The programme was selected with a view to combining exquisite daintiness and pianissimo effects with dramatic passages, highly colored. Each number bore the marks of the greatest and most stirring works of the composers. The programme was as follows:

D'Indy—"Wallenstein," Trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, Op. 12. First time in Washington. 1. Wallenstein's Camp. 2. Max and Thekla (the piccolomini). 3. The death of Wallenstein.

Rubinstein—Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforto and orchestra, Op. 70. 1. Moderato. 2. Moderato assai. 3. allegro assai.

Lalo—Overture to the opera, "The King of Is."

TIMES.
WASHINGTON D. C
DEC 4- 1907

Mrs. Roosevelt At Concert.

Mrs. Roosevelt attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the National Theater having with her Miss Ethel Roosevelt, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Miss Hagner, and Miss Young.

The Baroness von Sternburg had as her guests the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, Herr von Bruninge and Miss Langham.

Other boxholders were Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. James Lowndes, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Parsons and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner.

DEC 5- 1907

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF.

Talented Pianist to Appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite her Russian name, Mme. Olga Samaroff, the pianist, who will be the soloist at the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium next Monday night and will appear for the first time in this city on that occasion, is an American. She is the daughter of German parents and was born at the federal army post in San Antonio, Tex., where her father was an officer. Much of her life has been spent abroad, where she pursued her musical studies; but her career as a professional musician began in this country three years ago, when she made her debut as a pianist. Since then all her professional appearances have been confined to America, and the remarkable success she has made refutes the notion that talented musicians must have earned European reputations before they can hope to win recognition in this country. She has appeared as the soloist with all the great orchestras in the United States and has played a dozen times with the Boston Symphony. An engagement with that organization means much, as it is not only the finest orchestra in the world, but it employs few soloists and its choice is restricted to the very best. Having had three very successful seasons in this country she will spend next year abroad and will make her European debut with the famous Colonne orchestra, in Paris, next October. At the concert next Monday night she will play Grieg's concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra. The work is one of the late Norwegian composer's most melodious and interesting products, while it has the brilliancy needful for the display of a pianist's virtuosity.

NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
DEC 5- 1907

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Heute Abend findet in Carnegie Hall ein Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Ignace Padarewski statt. Der Künstler spielt das Beethoven'sche „Kaiser"-Concert. Die Symphonie ist Brahms' Zweite.

884

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
DEC 6- 1907

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Aside from the orchestral joys offered by Dr. Muck and his musicians last night in Carnegie Hall, several unusual features marked the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert of the season. First and foremost, Ignaz Paderewski appeared as the soloist, which event attracted hundreds of persons not in the habit of hearing Higginson's orchestra; second, the no-encore rule, rigidly enforced under ordinary circumstances, was cast aside for Paderewski, and last, but not least, the famous pianist played in the glare of electric lights, generally so offensive to his poetic fancy.

Yes, owing to the natural exigencies of an orchestral concert, Paderewski had to forego the picturesque twilight in which he loves to spin spells. Yet he played fully as well as in gloomy surroundings. Indeed, the illumination seemed to sooth his nerves. Maybe he felt that, radiantly prominent as he was to the eye, less muscular force would be necessary for an appeal to the ear. Certainly he played far more quietly than has been his habit recently. Paderewski luciferous pleases us better than Paderewski tenebrious.

His performance of the Beethoven concerto in E flat major, opus 73, was in most respects beautiful, exquisitely so at times. Persons in the audience recalled that the Polish pianist was heard for the first time in New York in that work. Then his interpretation made no deep impression. The orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, left much to be desired, and Paderewski felt the need of beating time with his feet.

Last night it was different. He had orchestral support wellnigh perfect, Dr. Muck contributing more than his share in making the performance noteworthy. There were moments when the conductor had to be alert, for Paderewski is not always given to strong rhythmical accentuation, and indulges occasionally in ideas of his own not noted in the music he plays. The pianist achieved his best results through a fine command of cantilena and a mastery of dynamic gradation. Few, if any, could imitate his performance of the familiar F major Song Without Words by Mendelssohn, which he gave as an encore. His mezzo-forte and pianissimo were wonderful. What excuse there was, however, for that encore one fails to understand. If Paderewski is to have such a privilege why should other soloists appearing with the Boston orchestra be debarred from the same thing?

The concert opened with Brahms's symphony in D major, opus 73, which Muck as one of the great composer's most sympathetic interpreters, set forth with beautiful attention to expressive details. At times his tempos seemed slow, but the average conductor the pace he adopted would have been tiresome in effect. But Muck did not permit one moment of sluggishness. The performance was alive with significant shadings and came to a close of cumulative power and energy that brought a storm of applause. Dr. Muck was recalled several times and finally asked the whole orchestra to rise.

The concert ended with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.

OMEIKE" NEW YORK
The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
rom
ddress

Murphy, Mrs. [illegible] C 3

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Vast Audience Welcomes the Orchestra and Paderewski.

The power to draw a large audience in this city is by no means lacking to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When its own great clientele is reinforced by a crowd of Paderewski's admirers the demand for accommodation in the Academy of Music greatly exceeds the supply. In consequence there were many disappointed persons last night. Music lovers began to assemble before the door of the amphitheatre at 5 o'clock in the afternoon and by 7, before the doors were open, reached in double line to Spruce street.

A fine concert was given. The symphony, Brahms's 2d in D major, the work of one still young in a great career, sounded as joyous and exquisitely melodic as 20 years ago, when it was acclaimed a brilliant refutation of the Wagnerian theory that Beethoven had said the last word in the symphonic form. Scored by one who was yet to attain more absolute command over the instrumental resources of the modern orchestra, this D major symphony is not a work which calls out the entire force of the splendid orchestra which interpreted it last night. Nevertheless, the composer's primary reliance, through the first three movements, upon the strings gave new emphasis to the depth, the richness of quality and perfection of intonation of the violins, violas and 'cellos, which are the glory of this orchestra. As heard last night the adagietto, especially, was given in a gracefully whimsical spirit, yet so truly considerate of the direction "grazioso" that there was no lack of applause to proclaim the appreciation of the audience.

To describe Paderewski as the "assisting artist" would be to indulge in unconscious sarcasm. A soloist is generally auxiliary to a symphony concert, but Paderewski demonstrated last night that the part may be greater than the whole, whatever may logically be considered possible in this regard. There was no repetition of the effort of his last appearance here to gild refined gold or add effectiveness to his wonderful art by artificially lighting the auditorium so as to create a spectral chiaroscuro supposed to react upon the nerves.

Paderewski came before his audience, sombre faced as usual, a great artist, calmly ready for the expression of his supreme gifts and not like a half-fledged tragedian depending upon the electric bulbs to create an impression where he failed. Nothing more splendid than his playing of the Beethoven E flat major concerto could be asked. It is likely to remain an unapproachable memory for a long time to come, perhaps until he is prevailed upon to return to us and repeat his great rendition.

Every great quality of the pianist's art found expression during the massive dimensions and emotional variations of this work, rightly called "The Emperor." Devices of extreme pianissimo, an accent that compelled and a rhythm that allured, a perfection of trill, brilliant and soft by turns, the shadowed luminosity of the cantabile passages, an effect almost exclusively Paderewskian, brilliant dynamics alternating with a perfect simplicity of utterance—to catalogue these things is simply to fail of any inclusive estimate.

So splendid a tone was drawn from the piano, forced beyond its normal capabilities, that at times it seemed but the projection of the soul of the entire orchestra; no longer solo and accompaniment, the instruments were truly one and that one the famous pianist. After so great a performance it is no wonder that the people were loath to allow Paderewski to bow his final acknowledgment of their plaudits.

RECORD
HILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 3- 1907

A PADEREWSKI NIGHT

Soloist at Boston Symphony Concert Centres Attention.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the combination which crowded the Academy of Music with auditors last evening, and a wonderful combination it proved. As a vehicle to display his virtuosity the Polish pianist selected Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat major (opus 73), a composition which afforded him an opportunity to exhibit not only remarkable skill, but intense musical feeling as well. Dimuendoes and Crescendos were played in a fashion which made one hold one's breath and his nuances were simply wonderful.

So great was the applause which greeted the pianist upon the termination of the Concerto that he departed from the usual custom at these symphony concerts and favored the audience with an encore—this time a Schumann composition, the exquisite and familiar "Nocturne."

The symphony of the evening was Brahms' No. 2, in D major, a work which did not meet the approval of the critics when it was given its initial performance, in 1877. Despite flashes of beauty and skill of composition, it is doubtful whether this symphony can ever become much of a favorite. It was played beautifully last evening, but it left the audience rather cold.

The only other selection on the program was Schumann's operture to "Genoveva."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
POST
SHINGTON, D.
DEC 4- 1907

PUT TRADITIONS ASIDE

Paderewski Gave Programme with Double Encore.

ACTION DELIGHTED AUDIENCE

Novel Proceeding, Overturning All Precedents of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Greeted with Hysterical Enthusiasm—Final Appearance in Washington of Great Pianist Brings Crowd.

The audience which jammed itself yesterday afternoon into every available inch of the National Theater permitted by those laws which wise lawmakers have devised for public safety, witnessed an upheaval in the sacred traditions and an overturning of the revered precedents of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the like of which has probably never been known before in this city. The occasion of a cataclysm so tremendous was none other than the second and final appearance in this city of the pianist, Paderewski, who, contrary to all customs and rules prevailing in this venerable and conservative organization, interrupted the regular course of the announced programme by a double encore. Only once within the memory of the writer has the rule preventing encores at these concerts been set aside, and that was last year when Saint-Saens, the great composer and pianist, created a sensation after recalls by dropping upon the piano stool to add some dainty trifle to a programme in all other respects precise and proper.

Yielded to Impulses.

Paderewski had completed the Rubinstein concerto in D minor, and had come forward to the front of the stage four times, amid the applause and cheers, when he, too, as though yielding to a sudden impulse, moved once again toward the piano. There were little hysterical screams and one universal gasp of delight, which seemed to have issued from a thousand feminine throats, with an accompanying chorus of bravos from the men of the audience. Then, in that subtle, singing tonal beauty which Paderewski, it would seem, can command even though the instrument be out of tune, he played the Chopin nocturne in F sharp major, Op. 15, No. 2. There it was expected he would stop. But he didn't. Instead, he gave a few modulatory chords and went straight into Liszt's thirteenth rhapsody. It was a novel proceeding from every viewpoint, and was evidently enjoyed by the audience, which was not dismissed until 6:45 o'clock.

Whether the insertion of two numbers so frequently played and so hackneyed as these was discreet, from an esthetic viewpoint, in connection with a programme so admirably constructed and so adjusted in itself, the audience did not appear to suffer, although there were many who would have preferred one of Paderewski's own compositions to selections which are now so threadbare.

Work of the Orchestra.

The orchestra was in good form yesterday—almost, but not quite in its best form. It opened the programme with Vincent D'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," which was given at the orchestra's first Baltimore concert this season. The contemporary school of French composers, those that claim to have imbibed their artistic formulas from Ceasar Franck, and who are now headed by D'Indy, have been practicing in their own peculiar manner for so long that the more advanced disciples are now arrived at a plane too elevated to be perceived by the artistic eye of the average musician of any other nation. In Germany Richard Strauss and Max Reger have reached the summit, each on a separate mountain. An American audience, listening to the most recent composition of any of these composers for the first time, and ignorant of all the preceding works which aided in their development, would scarcely be qualified to pass judgment upon the merits of the creations; though quite capable of enjoying and appreciating their earlier works. The trilogy in question was written toward the beginning of D'Indy's musical career, and is, therefore, not too difficult, is sufficiently modern, and bristles with pungent chords which are neither sugar-coated nor rounded into conventional roly-poly smoothness. The melodies are fascinating, and the "programme," such as it is, for the work is strictly of the "programme" music type, well carried out.

Accompaniment Was Superb.

In Rubinstein's concerto, No. 4, which is more frequently performed than any of his others, the orchestral accompaniment, down to the little responsive solo notes echoing the piano in the second movement, was superb. The pianist, while missing the perfection of technical execution of a Rosenthal, soared high up into the heavens of emotional poesy and idealism. The concert concluded with Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," an interesting and well-written number with an important cello solo, which was admirably performed. Dr. Muck's readings were commendable throughout, and his programme one of the best he has ever given in this city.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

MRS. ROOSEVELT PRESENT.

She Entertains Box Party at Boston Symphony Concert.

The inclemency of the weather yesterday afternoon told somewhat on the appearance of the house at the Boston Symphony concert. While it was thronged, [illegible] blage, so far as color went, the greater number of the women present wearing tailored gowns of dark material. Handsome light hats here and there added a bit of brightness to the scene.

Mrs. Longworth, who, with Mr. Longworth, was among the guests in Mrs. Roosevelt's box, wore with her dark velvet gown a large white hat, trimmed with black plumes and magenta roses. Mrs. Roosevelt's gown was among the few light ones worn yesterday. It was of a rich cream color, with golden brown trimmings, and was worn with a hat in the two colors, harmonizing with the gown. Miss Hagner was in black velvet, with a black hat.

Other box holders were Baroness Sternburg, Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. James Lowndes, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Parsons, and Mrs. Lisner. Baroness Sternburg was becomingly gowned in violet cloth, with which she wore a small hat with a long plume matching the gown in color, and an ermine stole. Miss Langham wore a gown of art green cloth, with white lace undersleeves and guimp, and a black hat with black and light green plumes.

Mrs. Williams had with her in her box Mrs. Metcalf, wife of the Secretary of the Navy; Miss Cannon, and Mrs. Hitt. Mrs. Parsons also entertained an interesting party, including Miss Nina Gaither, of Baltimore; Miss Eleanor Slater, Prince zu Lynar, Mr. William Phillips, and Mr. Schubert.

With Mrs. Lowndes were Mrs. Theodore Boal and a party of young girls.

[illegible]

ERALD
D. C
1907

N THE SOCIAL WORLD

Mrs. Roosevelt Entertainsat Symphony Concert.

BROOME - TUCKER NUPTIALS

Marriage a Quiet One, and Couple Depart on Honeymoon, After Which They Will Sail for Cuba—Miss Sallie Garlington Presented to Society at Luncheon—Personals.

Mrs. Roosevelt entertained a box party yesterday at the National to hear the Boston Symphony Concert. Her guests included Mrs. Root, Miss Hagner, and Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth. Mrs. Roosevelt was gowned in a becoming costume of tan and white. Mrs. Root, as always, was simply gowned in a tailored suit, and Mrs. Longworth wore a brown velvet suit and sable furs, with a becoming white hat of mushroom shape, trimmed with pink roses.

The Baroness von Sternburg occupied the box opposite Mrs. Roosevelt and looked unusually pretty in a suit of brown velvet and white lace, with which she wore a brown fur toque. Miss Langham, who was with her sister, was gowned in a blue afternoon frock with a large black hat. Other prominent society people in the audience were Mrs. Churchill Candee, Mrs. Harriet Blaine Beale, Mrs. Julian James, and Maj. Gen. and Mrs. Henry Corbin.

FRALD
D. C.
DEC 4- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paderewski Appears as Soloist with Noted Orchestra.

Of unusual brilliance was the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, with Paderewski as soloist.

Dr. Muck was greeted enthusiastically by the audience, and led the orchestra through the intricate compositions with his customary magnetic ability. The programme was selected with a view to combining exquisite daintiness and pianissimo effects with dramatic passages, highly colored. Each number bore the marks of the greatest and most stirring works of the composers. The programme was as follows:

D'Indy—"Wallenstein." Trilogy, after the dramatic poem of Schiller, Op. 12. First time in Washington. 1. Wallenstein's Camp. 2. Max and Thekla (the piccolomini). 3. The death of Wallenstein.

Rubinstein—Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 70. 1. Moderato. 2. Moderato assai. 3. allegro assai.

Lalo—Overture to the opera, "The King of Is."

TIMES.
DEC 4- 1907

Mrs. Roosevelt At Concert.

Mrs. Roosevelt attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon at the National Theater having with her Miss Ethel Roosevelt, Representative and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Miss Hagner, and Miss Young.

The Baroness von Sternburg had as her guests the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, Herr von Bruninge and Miss Langham.

Other boxholders were Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs. Samuel Thomas, Mrs. James Lowndes, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Parsons, and Mr. and [illegible] Lisner.

[78]

NEWARK, N.
DEC 6-

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF.

A Talented Pianist to Appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Despite her Russian name, Mme. Olga Samaroff, the pianist, who will be the soloist at the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium next Monday night and will appear for the first time in this city on that occasion, is an American. She is the daughter of German parents and was born at the federal army post in San Antonio, Tex., where her father was an officer. Much of her life has been spent abroad, where she pursued her musical studies; but her career as a professional musician began in this country three years ago, when she made her debut as a pianist. Since then all her professional appearances have been confined to America, and the remarkable success she has made refutes the notion that talented musicians must have earned European reputations before they can hope to win recognition in this country. She has appeared as the soloist with all the great orchestras in the United States and has played a dozen times with the Boston Symphony. An engagement with that organization means much, as it is not only the finest orchestra in the world, but it employs few soloists and its choice is restricted to the very best. Having had three very successful seasons in this country she will spend next year abroad and will make her European debut with the famous Colonne orchestra, in Paris, next October. At the concert next Monday night she will play Grieg's concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra. The work is one of the late Norwegian composer's most melodious and interesting products, while it has the brilliancy needful for the display of a pianist's virtuosity.

s
DEC 30

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Heute Abend findet in Carnegie Hall ein Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters unter solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Ignace Padarewski statt. Der Künstler spielt das Beethoven'sche „Kaiser"-Concert. Die Symphonie ist Brahms' Zweite.

884

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Aside from the orchestral joys offered by Dr. Muck and his musicians last night in Carnegie Hall, several unusual features marked the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert of the season. First and foremost, Ignaz Paderewski appeared as the soloist, which event attracted hundreds of persons not in the habit of hearing Higginson's or[illegible] second, the no-encore rule, rigidly enforced under ordinary circumstances, was cast aside for Paderewski, and last, but not least, the famous pianist played in the glare of electric lights, generally so offensive to his poetic fancy.

Yes, owing to the natural exigencies of an orchestral concert, Paderewski had to forego the picturesque twilight in which he loves to spin spells. Yet he played fully as well as in gloomy surroundings. Indeed, the illumination seemed to sooth his nerves. Maybe he felt that, radiantly prominent as he was to the eye, less muscular force would be necessary for an appeal to the ear. Certainly he played far more quietly than has been his habit recently. Paderewski luciferous pleases us better than Paderewski tenebrious.

His performance of the Beethoven concerto in E flat major, opus 73, was in most respects beautiful, exquisitely so at times. Persons in the audience recalled that the Polish pianist was heard for the first time in New York in that work. Then his interpretation made no deep impression. The orchestra, Walter Damrosch conducting, left much to be desired, and Paderewski felt the need of beating time with his feet.

Last night it was different. He had orchestral support wellnigh perfect, Dr. Muck contributing more than his share in making the performance noteworthy. There were moments when the conductor had to be alert, for Paderewski is not always given to strong rhythmical accentuation, and indulges occasionally in ideas of his own not noted in the music he plays. The pianist achieved his best results through a fine command of cantilena and a mastery of dynamic gradation. Few, if any, could imitate his performance of the familiar F major Song Without Words by Mendelssohn, which he gave as an encore. His mezzo-forte and pianissimo were wonderful. What excuse there was, however, for that encore one fails to understand. If Paderewski is to have such a privilege why should other soloists appearing with the Boston orchestra be debarred from the same thing?

The concert opened with Brahms's symphony in D major, opus 73, which Muck as one of the great composer's most sympathetic interpreters, set forth with beautiful attention to expressive details. At times his tempos seemed slow, with the average conductor the pace he adopted would have been tiresome in effect. But Muck did not permit one moment of sluggishness. The performance was alive with significant shadings and came to a close of cumulative power and energy that brought a storm of applause. Dr. Muck was recalled several times and finally asked the whole orchestra to rise.

The concert ended with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.

YORK WORLD

DEC 6- 1907

MUSICAL STARS IN CONJUNCTION.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony in Concert at Carnegie Hall.

By Reginald De Koven.

That the Dante of the pianoforte and the Boston Symphony Orchestra together are a rare and potent attraction was shown by the size of the audience that gathered at Carnegie Hall last night to enjoy these two great musical stars in conjunction and hear Paderewski play with orchestra for the first time this season.

Brahms's genial and melodious symphony in D minor, No. 11, which opened the programme, was rarely well played, and read by Dr. Muck in entire accord with the happy mood and classic spirit of the composer it displays. I never hear this Boston orchestra without being struck with its wonderful balance and unity of tone. The relative tonal values of the different choirs, wood, brass and strings, are always adjusted to a nicety, while the particular group to express the dominant melodic thought stands out ever clear and distinct. Read as it was, the familiar work revealed new beauties on every page.

There seemed a singular fitness in the Napoleon of the pianoforte, as I called him these many years ago, playing the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven—No. 5, E flat major—and he played it like the king of pianists that he is. An authority and reserve force, a classic repose and feeling which did not, however, exclude the romantic, as in the exquisite adagio, and an even brilliancy and contrasting effect of tone color characterized his playing of this most satisfying and exacting of all piano concertos, and made his performance as always a remarkable one. His admirable reserve in treating the solo instrument as merely one factor in the general plan of orchestral color and effect at the proper moments was noteworthy. The verve and rhythmic dash and swing of the rondo, too, were fairly inspiring.

A storm of applause, as of right, greeted M. Paderewski at the conclusion of the number, and he was often recalled, and finally—as all rules of even Boston Symphony concerts must give way when Paderewski is concerned—gave the desired encore, a Mendelssohn "Song Without Words," if memory serve.

I would not be thought of as trying to pick holes in perfection, but it must be noted, to be truthful, that—perhaps because of the weather—the heavy brass and horns were unwontedly uncertain at the opening of the symphony, and the attack in the concerto more than once decidedly ragged. Was that also weather?

A fine performance of Schumann's Geno veva" overture, with a stunning climax, ended a most enjoyable concert.

Again on Saturday afternoon Paderewski appears, playing the Rubinstein concerto.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. NEW YORK'S GREAT NEWSPAPER. 1827

Date DEC 6- 1907

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

DR. MUCK, whose programmes are too seldom a joy, presented for a change last night at Carnegie Hall a programme in all respects worthy of his own ability as a conductor and of the great orchestra at his command. Brahms's wonderful second symphony—the most melodious, the most ingratiating, and many insist the greatest of the master's four; Beethoven's greatest piano concerto—the "Emperor" in E flat—and, therefore, it is safe enough to say, the greatest piano concerto yet written; lastly, Schumann's fine overture to "Genoveva"—this was indeed a programme, and when we consider that Mr. Paderewski was the soloist further praise is almost superfluous.

It was in Brahms's first symphony that Dr. Muck revealed to New York the fulness of his powers a year ago. Quite as remarkable was his triumph with the second symphony yesterday. Seldom can the "Emperor" concerto have been played with so admirable a union of nobility and beauty as when Mr. Paderewski played it last night. Altogether the concert was an occasion for rejoicing—one of the most notable the Boston orchestra has ever given in this town.

Daily Citizen,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 6 1907

MUSICAL CALENDAR.

[illegible] Temple, concert [illegible] Orchestra, Dr. [illegible] Paderewski, [illegible] Horace [illegible] Post.

...ress ... Clipping Bureau in the World

N. Y. AMERICAN

DEC 6- 1907

PADEREWSKI GIVES BEETHOVEN SOLO

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Fine Programme at Carnegie Hall.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Returning to the accustomed order of things, from which it had made a brief digression, on the occasion of its second visit to New York this season the ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra came to us yesterday evening at Carnegie Hall accompanied by a soloist. And that soloist was no less conspicuous a celebrity than Paderewski.

Even without the aid of the eminent pianist, the appearance of the admirable Boston organization would doubtless have crowded the auditorium. The time when it was difficult for it to attract an audience has long passed, and the mere announcement that the orchestra, which is now so ably and sympathetically directed by Dr. Muck, is to appear suffices to assure success.

A programme of a sober but attractive character had been arranged for the evening, opening with the Eleventh Symphony of Brahms, in D major, continuing with Beethoven's beautiful and always enjoyable "Emperor" Concerto for Pianoforte, in E flat major, and ending with Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva."

Transition Is Natural.

The transition from one composer to another was natural and not, as is sometimes the case, violent. There were passages in the Brahms Symphony, especially in the delicate and graceful Adagietto, and in the final Allegro, which Beethoven might have conceived if not worked out, and Schumann was not so far removed from either Brahms or Beethoven as some others who so frequently appear with them on our concert programmes.

The orchestra, led and at times truly inspired by Dr. Muck, did justice to the symphony and co-operated faultlessly with Paderewski in the interpretation of the concerto.

Dr. Muck, thin, tall, pale and distinguished, with his intelligent reserve, his discreet eloquence and his uplifting although unobtrusive power, is a model conductor. His fingers, eyes and features work in harmony, and his baton points his every shade of meaning.

Paderewski gave a dignified and skillful reading of the concerto, putting brilliancy and fire into the Allegro and charm into the Adagio. His rendering of the closing Rondo had force and even more than his old authority.

A French Song Recital.

Madeleine Walther, a French coloratura singer, gave a song recital at Mendelssohn Hall last night which was well attended. She has a rather well trained voice of no great natural beauty. Gerardy, the popular 'cellist, added to the interest of the recital by co-operating with Andre Benoist, the pianist, in the interpretation of Grieg's Sonata in A minor for piano and 'cello, and by contributing as a solo Boellmann's "Variations Symphoniques." M. Barrere, the well-known flautist, played the flute obligato in the accompaniment to Mlle. Walther's singing of an aria from Handel's "L'Allegro ed il Pensiero."

Puccini's charming opera, "La Boheme," was repeated last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, with Sembrich, Bonci, Stracciari, Dereyne and Journet in the cast. The audience was fairly large, but the auditorium was not crowded.

To-night Mascagni's Japanese opera, "Iris," will be revived, and Emma Eames will make her re-entry in the title role. The cast will include Caruso, Scotti and a new mezzo-soprano named Le Fornia. Those who intend to be present will do well to be in their seats early, as some of the most fascinating music in the opera occurs at the very beginning of the performance.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM

(See other side.)

...ddress ... DEC 6- 1907

...ate ...

Paderewski Plays with the Boston Symphony

THE criticisms of those who object to listening to the Boston Symphony marred by "the impertinence of a soloist" are doubtless disarmed when that soloist is Mr. Paderewski, as was the case last night at Carnegie Hall. This tawny-haired hero of a hundred recitals played the Beethoven Concerto, No. 5, with an absence of all affectation, worthy of the composer himself.

The poetic and imaginative quality of the work, as was to be expected, was clearly revealed by the pianist, ably augmented by Dr. Muck and his famous band. If the heavier chords seemed lacking in tone the limitations of the instrument were to blame, and not the soloist.

In sharp contrast to the apathy that greeted the performance of Bruckner's symphony, the first number at the last concert, was the enthusiasm awakened by Brahms' symphony No. 2, which opened the concert last night. The work is one of delicate fancy, with strains of serene, and appealing beauty. The playful notes here and there in the work seemed at times to be reflected in Dr. Muck's countenance during the performance.

Schumann's spirited overture to the opera "Genoveva" was the third and concluding number of a more than agreeable programme.

...ress ... Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 5 1907

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Gives Second Lecture Recital of Institute Series.

H. R. ROSE PRAISES EMERSON.

Swami Abhedananda Expounds "Doctrine of Karma" From an East Indian's Viewpoint.

Interpretative study of the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple to-morrow evening attracted an audience of music lovers to Association Hall yesterday afternoon. It was the second lecture recital of the series, which is under direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The lecturer, William J. Henderson, was assisted by Miss Edith Milligan, of Manhattan, at the piano. The programme includes the Beethoven Symphony in F major, called the "Pastoral"; the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, in which Paderewski will be the soloist, and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody for orchestra. The last was dismissed as needing little interpretation, for it is easy to follow and picturesque in form.

Beethoven's symphonies were said to have some striking peculiarities. The "Eroica," Beethoven's favorite, is a study of human character representing a type. The fifth, which is totally different, represents something known to the experience of all, the four opening notes signifying "Thus Fate knocks at the door." Beethoven's love of nature is shown in the sixth symphony. He was an accurate observer of out-of-door things. He walked about, composing the while, and "howling out the melody," as he could not sing it. But his note books show how carefully he elaborated his ideas. He was the first one to put "programme music" into symphonic form.

Here Mr. Henderson told of the growth of programme music and, mentioning Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," said he thought this latest work does not seem to be much of an advance over the earliest of such writings. Taine puts Beethoven among the "supreme men" of the world.

"Beethoven never made any mistakes," the lecturer declared. "It is extraordinary what that man did with simple medium. He did not write for heavy orchestra, nor had he complicated schemes of harmony. He did just what ought to be done. He had a clear conception of just what could and what could not be done in programme music."

As an example of this, Mr. Henderson said, "You can say 'I am sad,' in music, but you cannot say, 'I am sad because I had to pay a large bill to-day.'" The sixth symphony is more an expression of feeling than of tone painting. In the playing of the orchestra it will seem to be in three movements, because only the first two are given with pause following. It was urged that special attention be paid to Dr. Muck's reading of the thunder storm in the third movement.

The concerto was mainly presented through piano illustration.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD

DEC 6- 1907

Paderewski Plays With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Polish Pianist, Dr. Karl Muck, the Conductor, and the Band All Win Distinction.

PADEREWSKI combined his talents with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, and the blending was a delight to an overflowing house. There was a trinity of stars; for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, and the orchestra fairly shared the honors with the Polish pianist. It was a musical evening not soon to be forgotten by any one who was present. Only in superlatives can one write of it.

Was there ever better playing than that of Brahms's second symphony in D minor? A momentary faulty intonation in the brass was the only blur upon an otherwise perfect performance. If there is another orchestra that excels this one in tone, precision, balance, modulation and convincing expression, those who have the privilege of listening to it are fortunate indeed. The composition itself, if it utters no profoundly inspiring word, is void of ambiguities. Its message is simple, melodious, pic[illegible] it was finished Dr. Muck was called out many times. He insisted that his men rise and share the applause with him.

In Beethoven's noble piano concerto No. 5, in E flat major, known as the "Emperor," Paderewski was the soloist. He was at his best. Not once did he over-exploit himself or the instrument. Always his dynamics were in unison with the orchestra. He gave a marvellous exhibition of power under proper restraint; of delicacy, refinement and daintiness of style; of beautiful liquid, singing tone; of clean-cut, masterful fingering. He was brought ful, liquid, singing tone; of clean-cut, that he yielded finally to the demand for him to play again.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture completed the programme.

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. NEW YORK'S GREAT NEWSPAPER. 1827

Date DEC 5-

sta[illegible]

(Copyright by J. E. Purdy, Boston.)

I. J. PADEREWSKI,

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to-night and Saturday afternoon.

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

...ddress ...

...ate ... DEC 6- 1907

MR. PADEREWSKI AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA

With Mr. Paderewski as soloist it was a foregone conclusion that Carnegie Hall would be crowded for the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts, which took place there last night.

The Polish pianist, although he looked tired and worn, nevertheless proved to be at his best, which means that he played the Beethoven Emperor concerto in admirable fashion, making of the adagio a marvel of tender melody, and of the final allegro an equally fine piece of bravura playing.

It was, however, after the concerto and in answer to insistent applause that the great treat of the evening came in the shape of a Mendelssohn "Song Without Words," in which the pianist furnished one of the almost flawless performances that do not occur half a dozen times in a season.

A spirited and delicate performance of Brahms' fine second symphony allowed Dr. Muck and his men to show once more to what technical perfection they have attained.

No one would have complained had the allegro exhibited more freedom and robust tone, especially in the brass, but the grace of the scherzo movement was wholly admirable.

Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" brought the evening to a close.

YORK WORLD

DEC 6- 1907

MUSICAL STARS IN CONJUNCTION.

Paderewski and the Boston Symphony in Concert at Carnegie Hall.

By Reginald De Koven.

That the Dante of the pianoforte and the Boston Symphony Orchestra together are a rare and potent attraction was shown by the size of the audience that gathered at Carnegie Hall last night to enjoy these two great musical stars in conjunction and hear Paderewski play with orchestra for the first time this season.

Brahms's genial and melodious symphony in D minor, No. 11, which opened the programme, was rarely well played, and read by Dr. Muck in entire accord with the happy mood and classic spirit of the composer it displays. I never hear this Boston orchestra without being struck with its wonderful balance and unity of tone. The relative tonal values of the different choirs, wood, brass and strings, are always adjusted to a nicety, while the particular group to express the dominant melodic thought stands out ever clear and distinct. Read as it was, the familiar work revealed new beauties on every page.

There seemed a singular fitness in the Napoleon of the pianoforte, as I called him these many years ago, playing the "Emperor" concerto of Beethoven—No. 5, E flat major—and he played it like the king of pianists that he is. An authority and reserve force, a classic repose and feeling which did not, however, exclude the romantic, as in the exquisite adagio, and an even brilliancy and contrasting effect of tone color characterized his playing of this most satisfying and exacting of all piano concertos, and made his performance as always a remarkable one. His admirable reserve in treating the solo instrument as merely one factor in the general plan of orchestral color and effect at the proper moments was noteworthy. The verve and rhythmic dash and swing of the rondo, too, were fairly inspiring.

A storm of applause, as of right, greeted M. Paderewski at the conclusion of the number, and he was often recalled, and finally—as all rules of even Boston Symphony concerts must give way when Paderewski is concerned—gave the desired encore, a Mendelssohn "Song Without Words," if memory serve.

I would not be thought of as trying to pick holes in perfection, but it must be noted, to be truthful, that—perhaps because of the weather—the heavy brass and horns were unwontedly uncertain at the opening of the symphony, and the attack in the concerto more than once decidedly ragged. Was that also weather?

A fine performance of Schumann's "Geno veva" overture, with a stunning climax, ended a most enjoyable concert.

Again on Saturday afternoon Paderewski appears, playing the Rubinstein concerto.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. ESTD 1797 NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER.

Date DEC 6 1907

Establi

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

DR. MUCK, whose programmes are too seldom a joy, presented for a change last night at Carnegie Hall a programme in all respects worthy of his own ability as a conductor and of the great orchestra at his command. Brahms's wonderful second symphony—the most melodious, the most ingratiating, and many insist the greatest of the master's four; Beethoven's greatest piano concerto—the "Emperor" in E flat—and, therefore, it is safe enough to say, the greatest piano concerto yet written; lastly, Schumann's fine overture to "Genoveva"—this was indeed a programme, and when we consider that Mr. Paderewski was the soloist further praise is almost superfluous.

It was in Brahms's first symphony that Dr. Muck revealed to New York the fulness of his powers a year ago. Quite as remarkable was his triumph with the second symphony yesterday. Seldom can the "Emperor" concerto have been played with so admirable a union of nobility and beauty as when Mr. Paderewski played it last night. Altogether the concert was an occasion for rejoicing—one of the most notable the Boston orchestra has ever given in this town.

Daily Citizen,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 6 1907

INSTITUTE CALENDAR.

To-night, 8:15, Baptist Temple, concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor; Paderewski, piano. Art Gallery, lecture, "Horace ..." by President Simeon D. Fess, ... D., of Antioch College.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

N. Y. AMERICAN

DEC 6- 1907

PADEREWSKI GIVES BEETHOVEN SOLO

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Fine Programme at Carnegie Hall.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Returning to the accustomed order of things, from which it had made a brief digression, on the occasion of its second visit to New York this season the ever-welcome Boston Symphony Orchestra came to us yesterday evening a Carnegie Hall accompanied by a soloist. And that soloist was no less conspicuous a celebrity than Paderewski.

Even without the aid of the eminent pianist, the appearance of the admirable Boston organization would doubtless have crowded the auditorium. The time when it was difficult for it to attract an audience has long passed, and the mere announcement that the orchestra, which is now so ably and sympathetically directed by Dr. Muck, is to appear suffices to assure success.

A programme of a sober but attractive character had been arranged for the evening, opening with the Eleventh Symphony of Brahms, in D major, continuing with Beethoven's beautiful and always enjoyable "Emperor" Concerto for Pianoforte, in E flat major, and ending with Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva."

Transition Is Natural.

The transition from one composer to another was natural and not, as is sometimes the case, violent. There were passages in the Brahms Symphony, especially in the delicate and graceful Adagietto, and in the final Allegro, which Beethoven might have conceived if not worked out, and Schumann was not so far removed from either Brahms or Beethoven as some others who so frequently appear with them on our concert programmes.

The orchestra, led and at times truly inspired by Dr. Muck, did justice to the symphony and co-operated faultlessly with Paderewski in the interpretation of the concerto.

Dr. Muck, thin, tall, pale and distinguished, with his intelligent reserve, his discreet eloquence and his uplifting although unobtrusive power, is a model conductor. His fingers, eyes and features work in harmony, and his baton points his every shade of meaning.

Paderewski gave a dignified and skillful reading of the concerto, putting brilliancy and fire into the Allegro and charm into the Adagio. His rendering of the closing Rondo had force and even more than his old authority.

A French Song Recital.

Madeleine Walther, a French coloratura singer, gave a song recital at Mendelssohn Hall last night which was well attended. She has a rather well trained voice of no great natural beauty. Gerardy, the popular 'cellist, added to the interest of the recital by co-operating with Andre Benoist, the pianist, in the interpretation of Grieg's Sonata in A minor for piano and 'cello, and by contributing as a solo Boellmann's "Variations Symphoniques." M. Barrere, the well-known flautist, played the flute obligato in the accompaniment to Mlle. Walther's singing of an aria from Handel's "L'Allegro ed il Pensiero."

Puccini's charming opera, "La Boheme," was repeated last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, with Sembrich, Bonci, Stracciari, Dereyne and Journet in the cast. The audience was fairly large, but the auditorium was not crowded.

To-night Mascagni's Japanese opera, "Iris," will be revived, and Emma Eames will make her re-entry in the title role. The cast will include Caruso, Scotti and a new mezzo-soprano named Le Fornia. Those who intend to be present will do well to be in their seats early, as some of the most fascinating music in the opera occurs at the very beginning of the performance.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM

(See other side.)

ddress DEC 6- 1907

ate

Paderewski Plays with the Boston Symphony

THE criticisms of those who object to listening to the Boston Symphony marred by "the impertinence of a soloist" are doubtless disarmed when that soloist is Mr. Paderewski, as was the case last night at Carnegie Hall. This tawny-haired hero of a hundred recitals played the Beethoven Concerto, No. 5, with an absence of all affectation, worthy of the composer himself.

The poetic and imaginative quality of the work, as was to be expected, was clearly revealed by the pianist, ably augmented by Dr. Muck and his famous band. If the heavier chords seemed lacking in tone the limitations of the instrument were to blame, and not the soloist.

In sharp contrast to the apathy that greeted the performance of Bruckner's symphony, the first number at the last concert, was the enthusiasm awakened by Brahms' symphony No. 2, which opened the concert last night. The work is one of delicate fancy, with strains of serene and appealing beauty. The playful notes here and there in the work, seemed at times to be reflected in Dr. Muck's countenance during the performance.

Schumann's spirited overture to the opera "Genoveva" was the third and concluding number of a more than agreeable programme.

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 5 1907

W. J. HENDERSON EXPLAINS SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Gives Second Lecture Recital of Institute Series.

H. R. ROSE PRAISES EMERSON.

Swami Abhedananda Expounds "Doctrine of Karma" From an East Indian's Viewpoint.

Interpretative study of the programme to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple to-morrow evening attracted an audience of music lovers to Association Hall yesterday afternoon. It was the second lecture recital of the series, which is under direction of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society. The lecturer, William J. Henderson, was assisted by Miss Edith Milligan, of Manhattan, at the piano. The programme includes the Beethoven Symphony in F major, called the "Pastoral"; the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra, in which Paderewski will be the soloist, and Chabrier's "Espana" Rhapsody for orchestra. The last was dismissed as needing little interpretation, for it is easy to follow and picturesque in form.

Beethoven's symphonies were said to have some striking peculiarities. The "Eroica," Beethoven's favorite, is a study of human character representing a type. The fifth, which is totally different, represents something known to the experience of all, the four opening notes signifying "Thus Fate knocks at the door." Beethoven's love of nature is shown in the sixth symphony. He was an accurate observer of out-of-door things. He walked about, composing the while, and "howling out the melody," as he could not sing it. But his note books show how carefully he elaborated his ideas. He was the first one to put "programme music" into symphonic form.

Here Mr. Henderson told of the growth of programme music and, mentioning Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica," said he thought this latest work does not seem to be much of an advance over the earliest of such writings. Taine puts Beethoven among the "supreme men" of the world.

"Beethoven never made any mistakes," the lecturer declared. "It is extraordinary what that man did with simple medium. He did not write for heavy orchestra, nor had he complicated schemes of harmony. He did just what ought to be done. He had a clear conception of just what could and what could not be done in programme music."

As an example of this, Mr. Henderson said, "You can say 'I am sad,' in music, but you cannot say, 'I am sad because I had to pay a large bill to-day.'" The sixth symphony is more an expression of feeling than of tone painting. In the playing of the orchestra it will seem to be in three movements, because only the first two are given with pause following. It was urged that special attention be paid to Dr. Muck's reading of the thunder storm in the third movement.

The concerto was mainly presented through piano illustration.

N. Y. EV...

DEC 6- 1907

Paderewski Plays With the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Polish Pianist, Dr. Karl Muck, the Conductor, and the Band All Win Distinction.

PADEREWSKI combined his talents with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, and the blending was a delight to an overflowing house. There was a trinity of stars; for Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, and the orchestra fairly shared the honors with the Polish pianist. It was a musical evening not soon to be forgotten by any one who was present. Only in superlatives can one write of it.

Was there ever better playing than that of Brahms's second symphony in D minor? A momentary faulty intonation in the brass was the only blur upon an otherwise perfect performance. If there is another orchestra that excels this one in tone, precision, balance, modulation and convincing expression, those who have the privilege of listening to it are fortunate indeed. The composition itself, if it utters no profoundly inspiring word, is void of ambiguities. Its message is simple, melodious, pleasing and interesting. When it was finished Dr. Muck was called out many times. He insisted that his men rise and share the applause with him.

In Beethoven's noble piano concerto No. 5, in E flat major, known as the "Emperor," Paderewski was the soloist. He was at his best. Not once did he over-exploit himself or the instrument. Always his dynamics were in unison with the orchestra. He gave a marvellous exhibition of power under proper restraint; of delicacy, refinement and daintiness of style; of beautiful liquid, singing tone; of clean-cut, masterful fingering. He was brought ful, liquid, singing tone; of clean-cut, that he yielded finally to the demand for him to play again.

Schumann's "Genoveva" overture completed the programme.

SYLVESTER RAWLING.

The Globe AND Commercial Advertiser. ESTD 1797 NEW YORK'S OLDEST NEWSPAPER.

Date DEC 5-

sta

(Copyright by J. E. Purdy, Boston.)

I. J. PADEREWSKI,

Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to-night and Saturday afternoon.

NEW YORK HERALD

(See other side.)

ddress

ate DEC 5 1907

MR. PADEREWSKI AND BOSTON ORCHESTRA

With Mr. Paderewski as soloist it was a foregone conclusion that Carnegie Hall would be crowded for the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts, which took place there last night.

The Polish pianist, although he looked tired and worn, nevertheless proved to be at his best, which means that he played the Beethoven Emperor concerto in admirable fashion, making of the adagio a marvel of tender melody, and of the final allegro an equally fine piece of bravura playing.

It was, however, after the concerto and in answer to insistent applause that the great treat of the evening came in the shape of a Mendelssohn "Song Without Words," in which the pianist furnished one of the almost flawless performances that do not occur half a dozen times in a season.

A spirited and delicate performance of Brahms' fine second symphony allowed Dr. Muck and his men to show once more to what technical perfection they have attained.

No one would have complained had the allegro exhibited more freedom and robust tone, especially in the brass, but the grace of the scherzo movement was wholly admirable.

Schumann's overture to "Genoveva" brought the evening to a close.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau, 19, Nassau Street, New York.
HARPER'S WEEKLY.
NEW YORK CITY.
DEC 7 1907

STAR,
WASHINGTON, D. C.
DEC 4- 1907

Music and the Opera

AN ORCHESTRAL MASTERWORK

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

BOSTON, November 24, 1907.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave last night at Symphony Hall the first performance in public of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's new work for orchestra, "A Pagan Poem": thereby accomplishing an event the importance of which in the records of musical art in America will be more fully recognized with the passing of time than it is in the opera-ridden present.

The remarkable art of Mr. Loeffler has been the subject of frequent comment in this place during the last few years. It was observed here not many months ago that this composer (who, though he was born in Alsace, has been identified with music in this country for almost a quarter of a century) is in the unusual case of a creative musician of adventurous style who enjoys, in a measure, the recognition of his contemporaries. It is not needful to attempt to indicate again in detail the peculiar qualities of Mr. Loeffler's art—its genuine unconcern with accepted and familiar modes of musical utterance, its novelty of harmonic, melodic, rhythmic, and orchestral invention, its far-sweeping and fantastic imagination, its rare and subtle emotional background: it is enough to say that his is not the order of music which one thinks of as in the least likely to win any general acceptance; and, of course, it has done no such thing; but it is sufficiently noteworthy that it should have commanded the attention that it has—that it should have won for its composer a kind of appreciation which is as greatly to be desired as it is enduring and cumulative. Mr. Loeffler has never shown the slightest disposition to placate the gods of the mob. He is utterly indifferent—and his indifference, be it marked, has no sign of contempt—to those means of musical beguilement which are sure of approval and acclaim. It is his way to think and feel subtly and reconditely, as it is the way of most of us to think and feel obviously and expectedly. He has always been aroused by moods, by poetic subjects, of a kind which lie over the border of the familiar world. Maeterlinck and Verlaine, Baudelaire, Rollinat, and Kahn were, in the earlier days, his familiars: they made an irresistible appeal to his sense of the fantastic, the mordantly ironic. He loved and was moved by the misty and wraith-haunted landscapes of Verlaine, the tragic and passionate fantasies of Baudelaire, the perturbing and sinister and pathetic imaginings of Maeterlinck and Rollinat, the iridescent visions of Gustave Kahn; and, brooding upon these, he gave forth their poetic and emotional essence in music of exquisite potency, of strange and unexampled beauty. Later he fell captive to Poe—the gentler Poe of "To Helen" and "A Dream Within a Dream"—and to the mystical ardors of Rossetti: the Rossetti of the sonnets. Once he put away moods of foreboding and terror, the menacing and grief-haunted presences which so persistently obsessed his imagination, and translated into radiant orchestral tone the ecstatic aubade which Verlaine, in La Bonne Chanson, addressed to his young bride. And now again, in his newest work, he has exhibited himself under the thrall of a similarly free and joyous impulse.

Rudolph Ganz, the Swiss Pianist
WHO IS MAKING FREQUENT CONCERT APPEARANCES THIS SEASON

"A Pagan Poem"—it is numbered as Opus 14—stands fourth on the list of Mr. Loeffler's chief orchestral works, its predecessors being "La Mort de Tintagiles," after Maeterlinck (1897, 1900), "La Bonne Chanson," after Verlaine (1901), and "La Villanelle du Diable," after Rollinat (1901). It was composed originally, in 1901, for a small combination of instruments (piano, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns in F, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola, and double-bass), and was intended for performance as chamber-music. It was afterward arranged for two pianos and three trumpets, and was performed in private in this form. In 1905–6 the work was recast in its present shape—for orchestra, with piano, three trumpets, and English horn obbligati. Its inspiration is derived from the Eighth Eclogue of Virgil, the subject of which consists of two love-songs, placed in the mouths of the rival shepherds, Damon and Alphesibœus. The poetic basis of the music is found in the second of these love-songs. A Thessalian girl has resorted to magic incantations in the hope that she may bring back to her cottage her truant lover Daphnis. The passage which inspired the mood of Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem is (in the translation of Mr. F. W. Mackail) as follows—beginning, in the original, at the line, Effer aquam, et molli cinge hæc altaria vitta:

Fetch water forth, and twine the altars here with the soft fillet, and burn resinous twigs and make frankincense, that I may try by magic rites to turn my lover's sense from sanity; nothing is wanting now but the songs.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

Songs have might, even, to draw down the moon from heaven; with songs Circe transformed the crew of Ulysses; by singing, the cold snake is burst asunder in the meadows.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

Threefold first I twine about thee these diverse triple-hued threads, and thrice round these altars I draw thine image: an odd number is God's delight.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

Tie the threefold colors in three knots, Amaryllis, but tie them; and say, "I tie Venus's bands."

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

As this clay stiffens and as this wax softens in one and the self-same fire, so let Daphnis do for love of me. Sprinkle barley-meal, and kindle the brittle bay-twists with bitumen. Cruel Daphnis burns me; I burn this bay at Daphnis.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

So may Daphnis love as when the heifer, weary with seeking the steer through woodland and high grove, sinks on the green sedge by a water-brook, in misery, and recks not to retire before the falling night: so may love hold him, nor may I care to heal.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

This dress he wore of old the traitor left me, dear pledges of himself; which now I even in the doorway, O earth, commit to thee; for these pledges Daphnis is the debt.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

These herbs, and these poisons gathered in Pontus, Mœris himself gave me; in Pontus they grow thickest. By their might I have often seen Mœris become a wolf and plunge into the forest, often seen him call up souls from their deep graves and transplant the harvests to where they were not sown.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

Fetch ashes, Amaryllis, out-of-doors, and fling them across thy head into the running brook; and look not back. With these I will assail Daphnis: nothing cares he for gods, nothing for songs.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

See! the embers on the altar have caught with a flickering flame, themselves, of their own accord, while I delay to fetch them. Be it for good! something there is for sure; and Hylax barks in the doorway. May we believe? or do lovers fashion dreams of their own?

Forbear: from the city—forbear now, my songs—Daphnis comes.

Copyright by A. Dupont

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist
THIS DISTINGUISHED VIRTUOSO IS NOW VISITING AMERICA

Mr. Loeffler has attempted in this tone-poem no particularized translation or paraphrase of Virgil's eclogue. "Freely after Virgil" is a subtitle which would truly indicate its character. There is no attempt at a line-for-line or verse-for-verse correspondence between the music and the poem. The composer has sought to body forth the emotional undercurrent of the verses without anxious regard for their details. But he has done more than this: he has written music which heightens immeasurably their appeal. The music is the most largely and vigorously conceived, the most admirably sustained, piece of writing that we have had from Mr. Loeffler: it is incomparably, thus far, his finest achievement. It has an amplitude of poetic speech, an expansive freedom and virility, which are not present in a similar degree or in like association in his earlier work. It has movement and passion, yet it is rich in mood: it has intensity as well as largeness of vision. It contains page after page of extraordinary and overwhelming beauty; and throughout it holds captive the imagination. It is original and unconfined in its purely musical invention beyond any other of Mr. Loeffler's scores; and this originality is displayed not simply through daring and superbly eloquent harmonic conceptions, but by means of rhythmic and melodic ideas that are unfailingly and deeply expressive.

Broad and dignified in plan, profuse in ideas, novel and splendid in color, masterly in its craftsmanship, this work must be ranked deliberately, I am convinced, not only as the most important and noblest of Mr. Loffler's deliverances, but as the most original, imaginative, and significant piece of orchestral writing that has come out of America.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paderewski, the Soloist, Achieves a Decided Triumph.

Paderewski gave a [illegible] and running over at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck gazed in astonished gratification and the members of the orchestra plainly showed their wonder at the breaking of the non-encore tradition of the organization when Paderewski, enthusiastically recalled at the conclusion of the Rubinstein concerto, No. 4, came to the center of the stage, bowed his acknowledgment of the continued applause, and then, turning suddenly to the piano, seated himself without taking his accustomed care to get just the exact position, and started at once into the Chopin nocturne in F sharp major, opus 15, No. 2. The delight of the audience was equaled only by its surprise, and this was intensified when, at the close of the first encore, the pianist, as if abstracted, touched a few soft modulatory chords and then began Liszt's thirteenth rhapsody, which he has added to his repertory for the first time this year.

This double encore made the concert the longest ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city; for but few times before has an encore been given by Paderewski himself, by Joseffy and by Saint-Saens, and it was understood at the time that the French master had broken the rule of the organization only out of compliment to the President, who was in the audience. It was close to 7 o'clock when Dr. Muck made his final bow.

Paderewski played as if carried out of himself, interpreting the nocturne freely, seeming to seek new readings for his own delectation. Perhaps to this abstraction is due the double encore, for the audience had not time to applaud at the end of the nocturne before the rhapsody was begun, but when that was finished came a perfect storm of appreciation, with cries of "Bravo!"

The first number on the program of the orchestra was Vincent d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," after Schiller's dramatic poems. Its performance yesterday was the first time it has been given in Washington. It is so-called "program music," dramatic and stirring—neither too technical nor too abstruse for the amateur of music who has not accompanied the modern French school on its highest flights. The many martial strains, the sonority of many of the chords, dying away in a long pianissimo make the composition one of such marked contrasts that it remains vivid in the recollection. The orchestra's work, under the baton of Dr. Muck, especially in the adagio of the second part, more than equaled expectation. The work was new to most of the audience, but the applause which greeted it showed that familiarity was not necessary for appreciation.

Paderewski made his first entrance to take his seat at the piano for the Rubinstein concerto, and was a long time arranging the position of his low stool to his satisfaction, and was loudly applauded as soon as he stepped on the stage, his entrance being made some little time after Dr. Muck had taken his position. The pianist drew from the keys a torrent of feeling and fancy, making his interpretation highly poetic and idealistic, while the orchestral accompaniment enhanced the beauty of the singing tones which the artist's consummate skill produced.

The overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" was the concluding number of the program, containing the tender melodies of the opera that unfolds the mystic Breton legend of a vanished city. Especially remarkable and well done was the 'cello solo, in B flat major, searching for its sadness.

The largest audience that has greeted the orchestra so far this season crowded the theater to the doors, in spite of the first real snowstorm of the season.

from NEW YORK STAATS ZEITUNG
Date DEC 7- 1907

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Heute Nachmittag findet unter solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Paderewski ein Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester statt.

from N. Y. EV'G SUN
Address
Date DEC 7- 1907

With Paderewski, the Boston Symphony Orchestra wound up a greater week than when Melba was soloist last year by playing in Brooklyn last night, and, finally, at Carnegie Hall late this afternoon.

The first matinée novelty is a tone poem, "Taormina," by the young Bavarian composer, Ernst Boehe. This had its first American performance on Nov. 29 in Boston. It is a brilliant work, calling not only for full orchestra but also a great quantity of instruments of percussion and a set of bells. The other new work consists of two movements, adagio and scherzo, from a symphonic suite in E minor by Rezniček, the Bohemian, best known as composer of an opera, "Donna Diana," the overture of which was played by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Paur. Again Paderewski plays in the Rubinstein concerto, and again the band plays Chabrier's "España."

The orchestra men spend Sunday in New York, playing Monday night in Newark,

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
Date DEC 7 1907

Paderewski, who plays again with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, this afternoon, is to give a third recital in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon. He will not appear again in New York until just before he sails for Europe in the spring, if then.

NEW YORK WORLD
DEC 8- 1907

Paderewski Recital.

M. Ignace Paderewski has prepared a most interesting programme for his recital at Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon. A full opportunity for this great pianist to be heard in a wide variety of compositions is here presented, and, although he was heard last week twice with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will undoubtedly be a large gathering at this recital.

84

N. Y. EV'G SUN
DEC 8- 1907

Madeleine Walther, soprano, will [illegible] a hearing with Jean Gerardy, the Belgian 'cellist, in Mendelssohn Hall this evening, against the Boston Orchestra and Paderewski further uptown. Andrew [illegible] assists in Grieg's A minor sonata for 'cello and piano. Mr. Barrère plays the flute to arias from "L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso" of Handel.

The other selections are "Variations Symphoniques," Boellmann; "Lakmé" and Delibes; "Myrto," Delibes; "Wiegenlied," D'Albert; "Ständchen," Brahms; 'cello pieces by Schumann, Popper and Herbert, and "Chant Hindou," with 'cello obligato, Bemberg.

Manager R. E. Johnston hopes that some kind critics will be found who will be able to be in two places at once.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau (Inc.) World
HUNTER'S WEEKLY
88 NEW YORK CITY
DEC 7 1907

Music and the Opera

AN ORCHESTRAL MASTERWORK

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

BOSTON, November 24, 1907.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, gave last night at Symphony Hall the first performance in public of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's new work for orchestra, "A Pagan Poem": thereby accomplishing an event the importance of which in the records of musical art in America will be more fully recognized with the passing of time than it is in the opera-ridden present.

The remarkable art of Mr. Loeffler has been the subject of frequent comment in this place during the last few years. It was observed here not many months ago that this composer (who, though he was born in Alsace, has been identified with music in this country for almost a quarter of a century) is in the unusual case of a creative musician of adventurous style who enjoys, in a measure, the recognition of his contemporaries. It is not needful to attempt to indicate again in detail the peculiar qualities of Mr. Loeffler's art—its genuine unconcern with accepted and familiar modes of musical utterance, its novelty of harmonic, melodic, rhythmic, and orchestral invention, its far-sweeping and fantastic imagination, its rare and subtle emotional background: it is enough to say that his is not the order of music which one thinks of as in the least likely to win any general acceptance; and, of course, it has done no such thing: but it is sufficiently noteworthy that it should have commanded the attention that it has—that it should have won for its composer a kind of appreciation which is as greatly to be desired as it is enduring and cumulative. Mr. Loeffler has never shown the slightest disposition to placate the gods of the mob. He is utterly indifferent—and his indifference, be it marked, has no sign of contempt—to those means of musical beguilement which are sure of approval and acclaim. It is his way to think and feel subtly and reconditely, as it is the way of most of us to think and feel obviously and expectedly. He has always been aroused by moods, by poetic subjects, of a kind which lie over the border of the familiar world. Maeterlinck and Verlaine, Baudelaire, Rollinat, and Kahn were, in the earlier days, his familiars: they made an irresistible appeal to his sense of the fantastic, the mordantly ironic. He loved and was moved by the misty and wraith-haunted landscapes of Verlaine, the tragic and passionate fantasies of Baudelaire, the perturbing and sinister and pathetic imaginings of Maeterlinck and Rollinat, the iridescent visions of Gustave Kahn; and, brooding upon these, he gave forth their poetic and emotional essence in music of exquisite potency, of strange, and unexampled beauty. Later he fell captive to Poe—the gentler Poe of "To Helen" and "A Dream Within a Dream"—and to the mystical ardors of Rossetti: the Rossetti of the sonnets. Once he put away moods of foreboding and terror, the menacing and grief-haunted presences which so persistently obsessed his imagination, and translated into radiant orchestral tone the ecstatic aubade which Verlaine, in La Bonne Chanson, addressed to his young bride. And now again, in his newest work, he has exhibited himself under the thrall of a similarly free and joyous impulse.

Rudolph Ganz, the Swiss Pianist
WHO IS MAKING FREQUENT CONCERT APPEARANCES THIS SEASON

"A Pagan Poem"—it is numbered as Opus 14—stands fourth on the list of Mr. Loeffler's chief orchestral works, its predecessors being "La Mort de Tintagiles," after Maeterlinck (1897, 1900), "La Bonne Chanson," after Verlaine (1901), and "La Villanelle du Diable," after Rollinat (1901). It was composed originally, in 1901, for a small combination of instruments (piano, two flutes, oboe, clarinet, English horn, two horns in F, three trumpets behind the scenes, viola, and double-bass), and was intended for performance as chamber-music. It was afterward arranged for two pianos and three trumpets, and was performed in private in this form. In 1905–6 the work was recast in its present shape—for orchestra, with piano, three trumpets, and English horn obbligati. Its inspiration is derived from the Eighth Eclogue of Virgil, the subject of which consists of two love-songs, placed in the mouths of the rival shepherds, Damon and Alphesibœus. The poetic basis of the music is found in the second of these love-songs. A Thessalian girl has resorted to magic incantations in the hope that she may bring back to her cottage her truant lover Daphnis. The passage which inspired the mood of Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem is (in the translation of Mr. F. W. Mackail) as follows—beginning, in the original, at the line, Effer aquam, et molli cinge hæc altaria vitta:

Fetch water forth, and twine the altars here with the soft fillet, and burn resinous twigs and make frankincense, that I may try by magic rites to turn my lover's sense from sanity: nothing is wanting now but the songs.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

Songs have might, even, to draw down the moon from heaven: with songs Circe transformed the crew of Ulysses; by singing, the cold snake is burst asunder in the meadows.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

Threefold first I twine about thee these diverse triple-hued threads, and thrice round these altars I draw thine image: an odd number is God's delight.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

Tie the threefold colors in three knots, Amaryllis, but tie them; and say, "I tie Venus's bands."

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

As this clay stiffens and as this wax softens in one and the self-same fire, so let Daphnis do for love of me. Sprinkle barley-meal, and kindle the brittle bay-twists with bitumen. Cruel Daphnis burns me; I burn this bay at Daphnis.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

So may Daphnis love as when the heifer, weary with seeking the steer through woodland and high grove, sinks on the green sedge by a water-brook, in misery, and recks not to retire before the falling night: so may love hold him, nor may I care to heal.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

This dress he wore of old the traitor left me, dear pledges of himself; which now I even in the doorway, O earth, commit to thee; for these pledges Daphnis is the debt.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

These herbs, and these poisons gathered in Pontus, Mœris himself gave me; in Pontus they grow thickest. By their might I have often seen Mœris become a wolf and plunge into the forest, often seen him call up souls from their deep graves and transplant the harvests to where they were not sown.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

Fetch ashes, Amaryllis, out-of-doors, and fling them across thy head into the running brook; and look not back. With these I will assail Daphnis: nothing cares he for gods, nothing for songs.

Draw from the city, my songs, draw Daphnis home.

See! the embers on the altar have caught with a flickering flame, themselves, of their own accord, while I delay to fetch them. Be it for good! something there is for sure; and Hylax barks in the doorway. May we believe? or do lovers fashion dreams of their own?

Forbear: from the city—forbear now, my songs—Daphnis comes.

Copyright by A. Dupont

Fritz Kreisler, Violinist
THIS DISTINGUISHED VIRTUOSO IS NOW VISITING AMERICA

Mr. Loeffler has attempted in this tone-poem no particularized translation or paraphrase of Virgil's eclogue. "Freely after Virgil" is a subtitle which would truly indicate its character. There is no attempt at a line-for-line or verse-for-verse correspondence between the music and the poem. The composer has sought to body forth the emotional undercurrent of the verses without anxious regard for their details. But he has done more than this: he has written music which heightens immeasurably their appeal. The music is the most largely and vigorously conceived, the most admirably sustained, piece of writing that we have had from Mr. Loeffler: it is incomparably, thus far, his finest achievement. It has an amplitude of poetic speech, an expansive freedom and virility, which are not present in a similar degree or in like association in his earlier work. It has movement and passion, yet it is rich in mood: it has intensity as well as largeness of vision. It contains page after page of extraordinary and overwhelming beauty: and throughout it holds captive the imagination. It is original and unconfined in its purely musical invention beyond any other of Mr. Loeffler's scores: and this originality is displayed not simply through daring and superbly eloquent harmonic conceptions, but by means of rhythmic and melodic ideas that are unfailingly and deeply expressive.

Broad and dignified in plan, profuse in ideas, novel and splendid in color, masterly in its craftsmanship, this work must be ranked deliberately, I am convinced, not only as the most important and noblest of Mr. Loffler's deliverances, but as the most original, imaginative, and significant piece of orchestral writing that has come out of America.

STAR,
WASHINGTON, D. C
DEC 4- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paderewski, the Soloist, Achieves a Decided Triumph.

Paderewski gave a measure heaped up and running over at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck gazed in astonished gratification, and the members of the orchestra plainly showed their wonder at the breaking of the non-encore tradition of the organization when Paderewski, enthusiastically recalled at the conclusion of the Rubinstein concerto, No. 4, came to the center of the stage, bowed his acknowledgment of the continued applause, and then, turning suddenly to the piano, seated himself without taking his accustomed care to get just the exact position, and started at once into the Chopin nocturne in F sharp major, opus 15, No. 2. The delight of the audience was equaled only by its surprise, and this was intensified when, at the close of the first encore, the pianist, as if abstracted, touched a few soft modulatory chords and then began Liszt's thirteenth rhapsody, which he has added to his repertory for the first time this year.

This double encore made the concert the longest ever given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city, for but few times before has an encore been given by Paderewski himself, by Joseffy and by Saint-Saens, and it was understood at the time that the French master had broken the rule of the organization only out of compliment to the President, who was in the audience. It was close to 7 o'clock when Dr. Muck made his final bow.

Paderewski played as if carried out of himself, interpreting the nocturne freely, seeming to seek new readings for his own delectation. Perhaps to this abstraction is due the double encore, for the audience had not time to applaud at the end of the nocturne before the rhapsody was begun, but when that was finished came a perfect storm of appreciation, with cries of "Bravo!"

The first number on the program of the orchestra was Vincent d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," after Schiller's dramatic poems. Its performance yesterday was the first time it has been given in Washington. It is so-called "program music," dramatic and stirring—neither too technical nor too abstruse for the amateur of music who has not accompanied the modern French school on its highest flights. The many martial strains, the sonority of many of the chords, dying away in a long pianissimo make the composition one of such marked contrasts that it remains vivid in the recollection. The orchestra's work, under the baton of Dr. Muck, especially in the adagio of the second part, more than equaled expectation. The work was new to most of the audience, but the applause which greeted it showed that familiarity was not necessary for appreciation.

Paderewski made his first entrance to take his seat at the piano for the Rubinstein concerto, and was a long time arranging the position of his low stool to his satisfaction, and was loudly applauded as soon as he stepped on the stage, his entrance being made some little time after Dr. Muck had taken his position. The pianist drew from the keys a torrent of feeling and fancy, making his interpretation highly poetic and idealistic, while the orchestral accompaniment enhanced the beauty of the singing tones which the artist's consummate skill produced.

The overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" was the concluding number of the program, containing the tender melodies of the opera that unfolds the mystic Breton legend of a vanished city. Especially remarkable and well done was the 'cello solo, in B flat major, searching for its sadness.

The largest audience that has greeted the orchestra so far this season crowded the theater to the doors, in spite of the first real snowstorm of the season.

From NEW YORK STAATSZEITUNG
Address
Date DEC 7- 1907

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Heute Nachmittag findet unter solistischer Mitwirkung von Herrn Paderewski ein Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester statt.

From N. Y. EV'G SUN
Address
Date DEC 7- 1907

With Paderewski, the Boston Symphony Orchestra wound up a greater week than when Melba was soloist last year by playing in Brooklyn last night, and, finally, at Carnegie Hall late this afternoon.

The first matinée novelty is a tone poem, "Taormina," by the young Bavarian composer, Ernst Boehe. This had its first American performance on Nov. 29 in Boston. It is a brilliant work, calling not only for full orchestra but also a great quantity of instruments of percussion and a set of bells. The other new work consists of two movements, adagio and scherzo, from a symphonic suite in E minor by Reznicek, the Bohemian, best known as composer of an opera, "Donna Diana," the overture of which was played by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Paur. Again Paderewski plays in the Rubinstein concerto, and again the band plays Chabrier's "España."

The orchestra men spend Sunday in New York, playing Monday night in Newark,

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
DEC 7 1907

Paderewski, who plays again with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, this afternoon, is to give a third recital in Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon. He will not appear again in New York until just before he sails for Europe in the spring, if then.

NEW YORK WORLD
DEC 8- 1907

Paderewski Recital.

M. Ignace Paderewski has prepared a most interesting programme for his recital at Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon. A full opportunity for this great pianist to be heard in a wide variety of compositions is here presented, and, although he was heard last week twice with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there will undoubtedly be a large gathering at this recital.

84

From N. Y. EV'G SUN
Address
Date DEC 5- 1907

Madeleine Walther, soprano, will ask a hearing with Jean Gerardy, the Belgian 'cellist, in Mendelssohn Hall this evening, against the Boston Orchestra and Paderewski further uptown. Andre Benoist assists in Grieg's A minor sonata for 'cello and piano. Mr. Barrère plays the flute to arias from "L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso" of Handel.

The other selections are "Variations Symphoniques," Boellmann; "Lakmé" aria, Delibes; "Myrto," Delibes; "Wiegenlied," D'Albert; "Ständchen," Brahms; 'cello pieces by Schumann, Popper and Herbert, and "Chant Hindou," with 'cello obligato, Bemberg.

Manager R. E. Johnston hopes that some kind critics will be found who will be able to be in two places at once.

[80]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1907

MUSICAL NEWS

The Concerts of Next Week—A New Quintet by Faure for "the Kneisels" and Kreisler and de Pachmann in Recitals

No new music stands on Dr. Muck's programme for the eighth pair of Symphony Concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday next, and there is no "assisting artist." With his usual catholicity toward music by American composers, the conductor will revive MacDowell's suite, opus 42—the suite of the haunted forest and the shepherdess's song—which has not been heard here in some years. The romantic aspects of the woodlands and the seasons touched MacDowell's imagination keenly, and he has written little music more characteristic of his own individuality than this suite. The symphony for the two concerts is Goetz's in F major, the symphony upon which the promise and the achievement of the young composer chiefly rested before untimely death cut him off. For beginning stands Bizet's overture, "Patrie," one of the few pieces for the concert room, and touched with the moods that the defeats of the French by the Prussians and the strength of France under these blows awoke in him. All three numbers of the programme have been unfamiliar of recent years to the public of the Symphony Concerts.

Mr. Campanari, the distinguished baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House and of many concert rooms; Miss Ada Sassoli, the young harpist, who has been heard with Mme. Melba; and Miss Elizabeth Dodge, a new soprano of Parisian training and reputation, will give the second in the new series of popular concerts at moderate prices on Sunday afternoon at 3.30, in Symphony Hall. The rich and songful quality of Mr. Campanari's voice, the warmth of his style and the Latin intensity of his singing have long commended him to our public, and now it is nearly two years since it has had opportunity to hear him. Miss Sassoli is an accomplished young harpist, and the harp as a solo instrument is rarely heard in our concerts. Miss Dodge is a newcomer, but report describes her as a singer of large voice and dramatic style. Their programme is:

1. Prologue from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
   Campanari.
2. Aria (Mad Scene) from Hamlet.....
   Ambroise Thomas
   Miss Elizabeth Dodge.
3. a—Gavotte.....Bach
   b—Am Springbrunnen.....Zabel
   Mlle. Sassoli.
4. Songs: a—Mondacht.....Schumann
   b—Im Kahn.....Grieg
   c—Springtide.....Weil
   Miss Elizabeth Dodge.
5. Tarantella.....
   Campanari.
6. Valse de Concert.....Hasselman
   Mlle. Sassoli.
7. Duet: Crucifixus.....Fauré
   Miss Dodge and Sig. Campanari.

Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, who has already won and kept a numerous and eager public in Boston, will give a third recital here on Wednesday afternoon, at three o'clock, in Jordan Hall. This time the profits of the concert go to the treasury of Lincoln House, the settlement now established and doing excellent work in the South End. It is in need of ampler funds, and it has generously chosen to give the pleasure of Mr. Kreisler's playing to those who are giving to it. For this recital, moreover, the violinist has made the first programme that he has given here in which modern music predominates. A single old classic, Bach's sonata in E major, begins the concert. Then follow a succession of short and often brilliant virtuoso pieces by modern composers, and sometimes by violinists themselves. Among them is Lanner's arrangement of two old Viennese dances that so pleased Mr. Kreisler's hearers at one of his preceding recitals here. In detail the list is:

Sonata in E major.....Bach
Air.....Goldmark
Song without Words.....Tschaikovski
Dance of Elves.....Popper
Romance.....Vieuxtemps
Zigeunerweisen.....Sarasate
Two Old Viennese Waltzes.....Lanner
Berceuse.....Townsend
Czardas.....Hubay

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
DECEMBER 8, 1907

SUNDAY CONCERTS

The second of the "popular" Sunday afternoon concerts, which are to be continued through the winter, takes place this afternoon at 3:30 in Symphony Hall. These concerts will be an exceedingly welcome feature of the musical season, for the management designs that the greatest artists travelling in the country shall appear at them, and there will be an endeavor to give programmes of the utmost interest and variety. The musically inclined are thus afforded an opportunity of hearing the best music interpreted by those most celebrated in their art, and at prices within the reach of all. Such an institution, as has been previously proven and was again demonstrated by a decided response to the announcement of Mr. Bispham's recital last Sunday, will find an extensive patronage in this city, will tend to materially broaden the musical horizon and bring us into closer touch with the great artists of the day.

The prominent feature of the concert this afternoon will be the appearance of Mr. Giuseppe Campanari baritone, of the Metropolitan grand opera company of New York. Mr. Campanari hardly requires introduction to an American audience. He enjoys the distinction of having graduated from the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the operatic stage, for, as many patrons of the Symphony concerts will remember, he was formerly a 'cellist, and his original intention in crossing the seas was to join our instrumentalists in that capacity. Among the great singers now before the public few have a larger following.

Miss Elizabeth Dodge, coloratura soprano, has lately returned from Paris, where she has been for several years a pupil of Jean de Reszke. Excellent reports precede Miss Dodge from Paris and London.

Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist, has long since made a place for herself in the esteem of our musical public, and her numbers will without doubt be a pleasurable feature of the programme, which is printed elsewhere.

On Wednesday afternoon, in Jordan Hall at 3, Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will give a concert in aid of the Lincoln House.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

Second popular concert in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30. Miss Elizabeth Dodge, soprano; Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist, and Mr. Guiseppe Campanari, baritone, will give the following programme:

Prologue from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Mr. Campanari.
Aria, Mad Scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Miss Dodge.
Gavotte.....Bach
Am Springbrunnen.....Zabel
Mlle. Sassoli.
Songs—
Mondnacht.....Schumann
Im Kahne.....Grieg
Springtide.....Weil
Miss Dodge.
Tarantella.....
Mr. Campanari.
Valse de Concert.....Hasselman
Mlle. Sassoli.
Duet, Crucifixus.....Faure
Miss Dodge and Mr. Campanari.

Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8 in Symphony Hall the Symphony Orchestra will give a very interesting programme of works that have been played here, but are not over-familiar to Symphony audiences, as follows: Overture, "Patrie," Bizet; suite in A minor, MacDowell; symphony in F, Goetz. Bizet's overture has had one performance at these concerts, in 1896. The MacDowell suite, one of the happiest orchestral achievements of its creator, has appeared twice on the programmes, in the seasons of 1891-'92 and 1895-'96. The Goetz symphony is a masterpiece of its kind.

OTHER DATES AHEAD

The following is the programme which Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will play at the third Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall, Dec. 15. Mr. Haddon Squire will accompany:

"Trille du Diable" (Devil's Trill).....Tartini
Concerto No. 2, F-sharp minor: Allegro,
Andante, Finale.....Vieuxtemps
Romance, A major.....Schumann
Larghetto, B-flat major.....Weber
Rondo, G-major.....Mozart
Siegfried Paraphrase.....Wilhelmj
Bohemian Fantasie.....Smetana
Non piu Mesta.....Paganini

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1907

SECOND POPULAR CONCERT.

The second of the popular Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall will be given at 3.30 p. m. tomorrow. The chief attraction is Mr. Giuseppe Campanari, the popular baritone of the Conried Grand Opera Company of New York.

The element of novelty will be found in Miss Elizabeth Dodge, the coloratura soprano, lately returned from Paris, where for several years she has been a pupil of Jean de Reszke.

The other artists on the programme will be Miss Ada Sassoli, who needs no introduction to Boston audiences.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1907

Mr. Kreisler's programme for his recital at "popular prices," in Symphony Hall, next Sunday afternoon, consists wholly of pieces that he has not played hitherto at his concerts in Boston this season, and two of them promise especial interest—Tartini's "Devil's Trill" and Vieuxtemps's concerto in F-sharp minor. In "The Devil's Trill," for example, Mr. Kreisler's public in London has found him closer to Joachim than in any other piece; while with Vieuxtemps's concerto he will have music that speaks less by itself than by the qualities of style that a violinist brings to it. Every virtuoso who plays Vieuxtemps's concertos nowadays must glorify them if they are to "sound" at all, and it will be interesting to see what transfiguring process Mr. Kreisler will choose. In detail the programme is:

"The Devil's Trill".....Tartini
Concerto in F-sharp minor.....Vieuxtemps
Romance in A major.....Schumann
Larghetto in B-flat major.....Weber
Rondo in G major.....Mozart
Siegfried Paraphrase.....Wilhelmj
Bohemian Fantasie.....Smetana
Non piu Mesta.....Paganini

[81]

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON
DECEMBER 8, 1907.

Sunday Concert at Symphony Hall.

The second of the popular Sunday concerts in Symphony hall will be given at 3:30 this afternoon. It is the purpose of the management to bring to Boston for these concerts, of which there will be a considerable number during the season, singers and instrumental musicians of high rank who are seldom heard at popular prices. The lack of such concerts as these are designed to be cuts off the Boston musical public from hearing many of the most interesting artists now before the public, because concerts with a general and varied program are seldom given. The quick response given to the announcement of Mr Bispham's concert last Sunday proves that there is a field for such concerts here, especially when the price of tickets, as in the case of these concerts, is kept practically within reach of all.

The chief attraction for the concert today is Mr Giuseppe Campanari, the popular baritone of the Conried grand opera company of New York. Mr Campanari has the distinction of having graduated from the Boston Symphony orchestra to the opera stage, for as many patrons of the orchestra will remember, he was a cellist, having been brought from Italy for that purpose.

The element of novelty will be found in Miss Elizabeth Dodge, the coloratura soprano, lately returned from Paris, where she has been a pupil of Jean de Reszke. The other artist on the program will be Miss Ada Sassoli, who is a harpist of highest ability. The program is as follows:

Prologue from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Campanari.
Aria, the Mad Scene from "Hamlet,"
Ambroise Thomas
Miss Elizabeth Dodge.
Gavotte.....Bach
Am Springbrunnen.....Zabel
Mlle Sassoli.
Mondnacht.....Schumann
Im Kahn.....Grieg
Springtide.....Weil
Miss Elizabeth Dodge.
Tarantelle.....
Campanari.
Valse de Concert.....Hasselman
Mlle Sassoli.
Duet, Crucifixus.....Faure
Miss Dodge and Sig Campanari.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This week's Symphony program makes no provision for a soloist. Three works will be presented, all of which have been played here, and yet none of which are very familiar to Symphony audiences. Bizet's overture, "Patrie," has appeared once on a Symphony program, in 1896. MacDowell's suite No. 1 in A minor has been on two programs, but Hermann Goetz' symphony in F major has appeared five times, having been a favorite with Mr Gericke. Last year Dr Muck played MacDowell's "Indian" suite.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—DECEMBER 8, 1907.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

SUNDAY—Symphony Hall, 3:30 P. M. Concert by Mr. Giuseppe Campanari, baritone; Miss Elizabeth Dodge, soprano; Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist. Mr. Campanari will sing the prologue from "Pagliacci." Rossini's "Tarantella" and, with Miss Dodge, Faure's "Crucifixus." Miss Dodge will sing the mad scene from "Hamlet," Schumann's "Mondnacht," Grieg's "Im Kahn" and Weil's "Springtide." Miss Sassoli will play a gavotte by Bach, Zabel's "Am Springbrunnen" and Hasselman's concert waltz.

The third popular Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall will be given next Sunday afternoon, the 15th, at 3:30. It will bring to Boston at popular prices Fritz Kreisler, the violinist. Tickets will go on sale tomorrow (Monday) morning.

Mr. Kreisler will play Tartini's "Devil's Trill," Vieuxtemp's Concerto No. 2, and pieces by Schumann, Weber, Mozart, Wilhelmj, Smetana and Paganini.

BOSTON HERALD—MONDAY
DECEMBER 9, 1907.

CAMPANARI SINGS FOR AID SOCIETY

Miss Elizabeth Dodge Scores Success in Her First Boston Appearance.

The second concert in the series given for the Roxbury Aid Society took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Giuseppe Campanari, baritone, Miss Elizabeth Dodge, soprano, and Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist, were the soloists. Mr. Campanari sang the prologue to "Pajliacci," Rossini's "Tarantella," and, with Miss Dodge, Faure's "Crucifixus." Miss Dodge sang the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet," Schumann's "Mondnacht," Grieg's "Im Kahne," and Weil's "Springtide." Miss Sassoli played Bach's Gavotte, Zabel's "Am Springbrunnen," and Hasselman's Concert Waltz.

The published programme, however, was only a section of the entire concert, as every number, except the final duet, was encored, and Mr. Campanari gave such delight by a performance of the "Toreador" song from "Carmen" that he had to repeat a stanza of it. This extremely popular singer is heard here so seldom nowadays that it was gratifying to hear him in even so small a programme, and it was a pleasure to many to have those pieces with which he has long been identified, even though the operatic numbers, especially the Prologue, suffer by lack of orchestral accompaniment.

The first appearance here of Miss Dodge aroused considerable interest, which was justified by her performance. Her voice is very high and of brilliant and incisive rather than emotional quality. It would not be fair, however, to say that the singer is without emotion, for she made the "mad scene" interesting by other means than by purely technical display, thereby doing somewhat toward justifying the title. She sang the shorter pieces with delightful grace, and included Schubert's "Sylvia" as one of her encore pieces.

Miss Sassoli's artistry is familiar here. Her performance causes the hearer to regret the exceedingly limited amount of good music for the harp, but her programme was wisely chosen, and the arrangement of Bach's Gavotte proved the most delightful feature.

The soloists next Sunday's concert

BOSTON POST, MONDAY

SECOND SUNDAY AFTERNOON CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

The soloists of the second of the popular Sunday afternoon concerts were Mr. Giuseppe Campanari, baritone; Miss Elizabeth Dodge, soprano, and Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist. They gave the following programme: "Pagliacci" Prologue, Leoncavallo; mad scene from "Hamlet," Ambroise Thomas; Gavotte, Bach, and "Am Springbrunnen," Zabel; songs, "Mondnacht," Schumann; "Im Kahne," Grieg; "Springtide," Neil; "Tarantella," Rossini; "Valse de Concert," Hasselman; duet, "Crucifixus," Faure.

Mr. Campanari was fortunate in his selection of the "Pagliacci" Prologue, for he has a fiery soul, and his methods are better adapted to the expression of such things than of passages of a purely lyric nature. He was encored.

Miss Dodge did what was in her power to invest the Thomas chestnut with real dramaticism. Possibly she was not entirely wise in her selection of a different display piece, a piece of much gilt and many flourishes, a piece that should be performed by a double-barrelled automatic flute. Possibly, too, the manner in which the singer surmounted some of the whizzing roulades might have suggested the antics of a very nimble landcrab ascending a particularly difficult cocoanut tree. But let that pass; if it were so the music was largely to blame. Miss Dodge interpreted with authority and not without individuality. Her lower notes, in sustained passages, were full and warm. She was encored.

Mlle. Sassoli received the warmest applause, praise amply deserved, for there are few more finished virtuosos upon the harp before the public today. She was encored.

Mr. Campanari's performance of the "Tarantella" was sufficiently animated to give the most cool-blooded auditor "the jumps." He was encored, she was encored, they were encored. A performance of the "Toreador Song" seemed, in the estimation of those present, to be one of the main features of the entertainment.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be soloist at the concert of next Sunday.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
DECEMBER 9, 1907

CAMPANARI AT SYMPHONY HALL.

The second in the series of Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall took place yesterday. The concert was given by Signor Giuseppe Campanari, Baritone of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, assisted by Miss Elizabeth Dodge, Soprano, and Miss Ada Sassoli, Harp, with Mr. Byron E. Hughes as Accompanist.

The programme, which offered no special features of interest, evidently pleased a fair-sized audience, for nearly every number received an encore. Signor Campanari sang the familiar Prologue from "Pagliacci," and the Tarantella by Rossini in his usual pleasing and satisfying manner, while Miss Dodge contributed the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet" and songs by Schumann, Grieg and Weil, which she sang with good understanding. Miss Sassoli deserves great praise for her most artistic harp playing. She succeeds in producing a variety of tone color from her instrument which is remarkable and which enables her to hold the interest of her listeners to a marked degree, considering the nature of her instrument, which is apt to become tiresome unless in the hands of a skilful player, which Miss Sassoli undoubtedly is.

Mr. Fritz Kreisler is announced for next Sunday.

F. S. M.

BOSTON GLOBE—MONDAY
DECEMBER 9, 1907.

STARS AT SYMPHONY HALL.

Second in Series of Sunday Concerts Pleased Large Audience.

The second of the series of Sunday afternoon concerts to be given each week in Symphony hall brought a large audience together yesterday afternoon who listened with evident pleasure to an exceptionally fine program.

The enthusiasm expressed not only manifested the enjoyment derived from such a concert, but might well be accepted as an assurance that a deep interest was also taken in the establishing of permanent Sunday afternoon concerts of the kind.

Sig Guiseppe Campanari, baritone, was the principal attraction, assisted by Miss Elizabeth Dodge soprano and Miss Ada Sassoli harpist, and a better program could hardly have been arranged for the artists.

Campanari was in excellent voice and his solos were given in a manner that afforded those present extreme pleasure, the applause that greeted him attesting the enjoyment of all. Miss Dodge sang her numbers with excellent breadth and expression and was given an ovation. The playing of Miss Sassoli on the harp was received with much enthusiasm. The program follows:

Prologue from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Sig Campanari.
Aria (mad scene) from "Hamlet".....
Ambroise Thomas
Miss Elizabeth Dodge.
Gavotte.....Bach
Am Springbrunnen.....Zabel
Mlle Sassoli.
Mondnacht.....Schumann
Im Kahne.....Grieg
Springtide.....Weil
Miss Elizabeth Dodge.
Tarantella.....Rossini
Sig Campanari.
Valse de Concert.....Hasselman
Mlle Sassoli.
Duet, Crucifixus.....Faure
Miss Dodge and Sig Campanari.

TIGHT BINDING

BOSTON JOURNAL
NDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1907

SUNDAY CONCERT A MARKED SUCCESS

Campanari and Miss Dodge, the Vocalists, With Miss Sassoli as Harpist at Symphony Hall.

At the second Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall yesterday the entertainers were Giuseppe Campanari, the popular barytone, Miss Elizabeth Dodge, a soprano who has studied with Jean de Reszke, and Miss Ada Sassoli, the charming harpist. Mr. Campanari sang the Prologue from "I Pagliacci," Rossini's "Tarantella," and as an encore, the "Toreador" song from "Carmen." Miss Dodge gave the aria of the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet," Schumann's "Mondnacht," Grieg's "Im Kahne" and Weil's "Springtide;" also another beautiful German song for an encore. Miss Sassoli played Bach's Gavotte, the "Am Springbrunnen" of Zabel, and the Valse de Concert of Hasselman.

All three artists gave rare enjoyment, though, of course, Mr. Campanari, a former Bostonian, carried off the chief honors. The concert closed with Faure's famous duet, "Crucifixus," sung by Miss Dodge and Mr. Campanari. All in all, it was a delightful concert.

Next Sunday the concert giver will be Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, whose success here has been so remarkable that it would seem as if Boston is never to let him go.

m. .....

ress .....

e.....

Paderewski as Missionary.

When Paderewski landed on American soil a few weeks ago he remarked with reference to one of the most important pieces he intended to play—Liszt's great sonata'—that he would do some missionary work for it. He is also doing missionary work for a composer who, strange to say, needs it much more than Liszt, viz., Mendelssohn. In his volume of Paderewski, just published by the John Lane Co., Mr. E. A. Baughan, the eminent London critic, remarks: "He has done a great deal to rehabilitate Mendelssohn. He made serious musicians ashamed of their estimate of the Variations Sérieuses and he reset the exquisite gems of melody enshrined in the 'Songs Without Words,' made so dim by the clumsy handling of generations of schoolgirls."

Of this process of rehabilitating Mendelssohn there was a splendid illustration at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That organization has a rule forbidding "encores," and a wise rule it is. Nevertheless, it would be foolish to enforce it always. To enforce it last night would have been criminal, for Paderewski was the soloist. He played Beethoven's fifth concerto; and he played it with such rare delicacy of shading, beauty of tone, and charm of phrasing that the audience imperatively insisted on an extra. After all, these concerts are given for the pleasure of the public; and if the public unanimously desires a thing it must be granted. So Paderewski played again. His piece was one of Mendelssohn's songs without words—the one in F major which bears the name "Tristesse de l'âme" in the French editions of the good old times when shrewd publishers attached titles to pieces to which composers had given merely opus numbers. The manner in which the Polish pianist sang this exquisite melody on his instrument was indescribably beautiful; it brought tears to many eyes. It was a revelation; it will cause hundreds of amateur pianists to get out their Mendelssohn again, to bathe their souls in his melody. Melody is what we need to-day more than anything, as an antidote to the cacophony of R. Strauss, Debussy, & Co.; and in calling attention to such old mines of the purest melody, Paderewski is doing missionary work of inestimable value. There is only one drawback—no one in the world can make so much of those simple melodies as he can. The magic of his art cannot be explained; but there is a word for it—genius.

The Boston Orchestra and Dr. Muck were at their best last night. The programme included the second Brahms symphony and Schumann's "Genoveva Overture." In these, as well as in the Beethoven concerto, there was admirable balance, refinement, and beauty of tone. The Brahms symphony fairly glowed with color; it is the one of his four symphonies which even those who are not Brahmsites have always acclaimed with enthusiasm—especially the first two movements, in which there is a wealth and spontaneity of invention not found elsewhere in the same composer's works, excepting some of his chamber music.

It was a notable concert. This evening Paderewski is to play the superb D minor concerto of Rubinstein at the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn; and to-morrow afternoon he will play the same in Carnegie Hall on this side of the bridge. The third Paderewski recital will be given at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, December 14; the great pianist will spend the holidays in Boston, and after the first of the year starts West, and will not get into the East again until the middle of April. It is possible that he may give a recital in New York just before he sails, but that has not yet been decided.

Zeitung - Newark. 10 Dec.

Newark. A.M. Star Dec. 10.

Newarl, N. J., Dienstag, den 10

Ein seltener Genuß.

Das Boston Symphonie Orchester debutirt hier im Krueger Aditorium.

Ein französischer und ein deutscher Componist mustergültig interpretirt. Mme. Samaroff bewährt sich vortreffliche Pianistin.

Den Musikfreunden Newark's wurde gestern Abend ein kurzer Aufenthalt im Paradies gewährt. Ob ihnen je wieder die Gelegenheit geboten wird, hier wieder in einem solchen Kunstgenuß zu schwelgen? Wahrlich um einen solchen musikalischen Körper sind die Bostoner zu beneiden und mit ihnen unsere Nachbarn, die New Yorker, wo ja das Symphonie-Orchester jede Saison einen Cyclus von Concerten giebt. Die reine ungetrübte Schönheit des Klanges, der Töne Zaubermacht, sie werden von diesem Körper offenbart. Es war das erste Concert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters im Staate New Jersey, des besten Orchesters der neuen und wohl auch der alten Welt. Der derzeitige Leiter ist Dr. Carl Muck, der erste Kapellmeister der Königl. Oper in Berlin, welcher mit Ablauf dieser Saison wieder dorthin zurückkehrt. Daß Dr. Muck einer der intelligentesten Orchester-Leiter der Jetztzeit ist, bethätigte er durch die Interpretation der beiden Werke, welche er zur Wiedergabe gewählt hatte. Es waren dies „Wallenstein-Trilogie", von Vincent d'Indy, sowie die „Genoveva" Ouverture, von Robert Schumann.

Das Werk des französischen Componisten ist Programm-Musik, und da der Componist selbst sagt, daß dem Tonwerk Schiller's Wallenstein-Trilogie zu Grunde liegt, so muß zum Verständniß dieser Tonmalerei eine Kenntniß von Schiller's „Wallenstein's Lager", „Die Piccolomini", hier „Max und Thekla" genannt, sowie „Wallenstein's Tod" vorausgesetzt werden In der Voraussetzung, daß wohl nur ein geringer Prozentsak der Concertbesucher überhaupt, nicht nur in Newark allein, die Bekanntschaft mit den genannten drei Dramen gemacht hat, war dem Programm eine kurze Inhalts-Angabe derselben beigegeben Ueber den zweifelhaften Werth eines solchen „Wegweisers" ist schon viel geschrieben worden, es soll daher an dieser Stelle nur erwähnt werden, daß Denen, welche dem Tonwerk mit Hülfe des Programms zu folgen versuchten. viel an dem vollen Kunstgenuß verloren ging Wer Gelegenheit hatte, sich vorher über die Haupt-Vorgänge in drei Dramen zu orientiren, dem mag die Tonmalerei des französischen Componisten verständlich gewesen sein, den Anderen aber kaum. Vincent d'Indy kann die Liszt'sche Schule nicht verleugnen, er liebt grelle Farben und trägt dick auf, seine Gemälde tragen ein starkes Impasto. Zugegeben werden muß jedoch, daß seine Instrumentirung wirksam und characteristisch ist, und er es wohl verstanden hat, der poetischen Anregung, welche ihm Schiller's Dramen gegeben, Ausdruck zu geben Wie originell läßt er z. B. den Kapuziner durch das Fagott seine Predigt halten, wie markant geben die Posaunen das Wallenstein-Leitmotiv — man sieht Herr d'Indy hat auch von Richard Wagner gelernt —, wie characteristisch weiß er das Leben und Treiben der aus aller Herren Länder stammenden Söldner im Lager wiederzugeben. — Der zweite Theil, „Die Piccolomini", schildert die Liebesscene zwischen Max Piccolomini und Thekla. Die Liebenden treffen sich mit dem Bewußtsein, daß sie sich nie angehören werden; über dem Ganzen schwebt daher ein Hauch der Wehmuth. In klagenden Tönen weiß der Componist durch Violine und Cello der Liebe Leid und Wehe zum Ausdruck zu bringen. In das Gespräch der Liebenden ertönt das Schicksals-Motiv, auf das tragische Ende von Max hindeutend, und das Oboe läßt die Klage der Thekla um den Geliebten hören. Düstere trauervolle Stimmung ist es, welche dieser Satz hinterläßt. — Mit dem Wallenstein Leitmotiv verwoben hebt der letzte Satz langsam und schicksalsschwer an. Im Lager herrscht wilde Verwirrung, die Generale verschwören sich gegen den mächtigen Feldherrn und, um sich seiner zu entledigen, beschließt man dessen Tod. Mächtig, wie der erste Satz begonnen, klingt der letzte Satz aus.

Dr. Muck ist ein Meister der Detail-Malerei, nicht den kleinsten Effect läßt er sich entgehen, und wo immer ein solcher aus dem Werk herauszuholen ist, er bringt ihn. Es ist wunderbar, wie der schmächtige Mann diesen Riesenkörper in der Gewalt hat, und wie jedes Glied desselben seinen Intentionen folgt. Jede Instrumenten-Gruppe, ob Streicher oder Bläser oder Schläger, leistet das denkbar vollkommenste, immer ist der Ton vornehm und edel, sodaß die Worte des Herrn Muck, es sei ein Vergnügen, ein solches Orchester zu leiten, nur zu verständlich sind.

Die andere reine Orchester-Nummer brachte Schumann's „Genoveva" Ouvertüre, das einzige, was sich von der einzigen Oper Schumann's als lebensfähig erwiesen hat, welche eine mustergültige Wiedergabe erfuhr.

Madame Olga Samaroff, die Solistin des Abends, spielte Edward Grieg's Klavier-Concert in Amoll. In Mme. Samaroff machte das Publikum die Bekanntschaft einer höchst beachtenswerthen Pianistin, die um so höhere Anerkennung verdient, weil es ihr gelungen ist, sich ohne europäischen Kunststempel hierzulande Anerkennung zu verschaffen. Die Technik der Künstlerin ist eine großartige, und die Grieg'sche Composition interpretirte sie mit viel Verständniß und Liebe für dieselbe. Das Concert verleugnet seinen Vater nicht, es zeigt alle die characteristischen Eigenheiten, welche alle Werke des großen norwegischen Tonkünstlers haben; es hat in seiner Hauptfactur jene düster-elegische Färbung, welcher wir auch im „Peer Gynt" begegnen.

Wie bereits Eingangs erwähnt, bot das Concert einen Kunstgenuß, wie wir ihn hier in Newark nur ahnen konnten. Die Musikfreunde sind daher Herrn Fred. N. Sommer zu besonderem Dank dafür verpflichtet, daß es ihm gelang, das berühmte Orchester zu einem Concert in Newark zu veranlassen. Zu hoffen steht nur, daß es nicht auch das letzte war.

NEWS
NEWARK, N.J.
DEC - 1907

The Boston Symphony.

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium next Monday night will be a red letter event in the musical life of this city. It will be the first appearance of the great organization here, and if the financial results of the experiment of trying to interest the local public in performances by the famous band are satisfactory, it may not be the last. Residents in the Oranges, Montclair and other suburbs have shown a keener appreciation of hearing the orchestra on this occasion than is apparent on the part of Newarkers. The many regular subscribers to the orchestra's concerts in New York every season make it almost impossible for many out-of-town music lovers to obtain desirable seats for single concerts in Carnegie Hall. Others find it inconvenient to go to New York for the concerts and they prize the unusual privilege of being able to enjoy here just as fine performances as are given by the noted organization in Boston or New York.

The orchestra gives a concert in Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon, and is staying over Sunday in Manhattan purposely for its appearance here Monday night, when all its members will take part in interpreting the program, which will include Schumann's overture to his almost forgotten opera, "Genoveva," and Vincent D'Indy's "Wallenstein."

The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, a talented pianist, who will make her first appearance here on this occasion, and will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. Dr. Karl Muck, one of the greatest of living conductors, will direct all the performances.

FINE CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Greeted by Large and Fashionable Audience.

TALENTED PIANIST ASSISTS

Program Consists of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, and Grieg's Concerto in A Minor for Piano—Orchestra's Playing Best Ever Heard Here.

A large audience, representative of Newark's society and musical culture, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon its first visit to this State, at the Krueger Auditorium, last night. The concert was a delight throughout to those with appreciative and understanding ears. No such playing has been heard in a long time, if ever. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, made the same good impression that he has in other big cities where the orchestra has played, showing himself by the results achieved a fully equipped leader and a musician of the highest rank.

The famous band numbered about seventy, a little less than its full quota, but very little difference was noticed. It had all that goes to make up accomplished playing, all those excellent qualities which it has attained by long years of practise and in which no other orchestra in the country can excel it. Its principal task was D'Indy's "Wallenstein," Triology, op 12, based upon the dramatic poem of Schiller, given in three parts, "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla" ("The Piccolomini"), and "The Death of Wallenstein." This took three-quarters of an hour to play. Its lesser offering was the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," op 81.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has played with the orchestra often, was the assisting soloist. She played with the orchestra Grieg's Concerto in A minor, op. 16. Her achievement was something of a personal triumph, for she was most heartily applauded. She bowed her acknowledgments three times, but gave nothing extra.

The trilogy is not one of the Frenchman's late works, but it is, nevertheless, as full of forcible truth, vividness and vigor as any of his symphonic music. The work was begun in 1873 and not completed until 1881 and an interesting fact is that the "Ouverture des Piccolomini," forming the second part of the trilogy, was the first work of the composer's to be produced in Paris, being given at a Pasdelough concert on January 25, 1874. The first and third movements were first performed in Paris in 1880. First played in this country at one of the Anton Seidl's concerts in New York in 1888, it has since been given in Chicago and Cincinnati. It may be interesting to recall, in passing, that D'Indy was himself in this country two years ago and the Boston symphony did much to make his works better known by playing a series of concerts under his baton.

The first part of the work is splendidly descriptive, showing the motley horde of adventurers who surrounded Wallenstein, leader of Ferdinand's imperial forces during the later period of the Thirty Years' War (1618-1648) which plunged Germany into a generation of religious and political strife. Heading the Catholic army the great general, who held his forces together by his wonderful personality, waged war first against the Denmark invaders and then against Agustavus Adolphus, of Sweden. The life of the camp, with the coming of the Capuchin monk and the mocking greeting from the dissolute soldiers, is depicted with all the tumult of the full orchestra, lulled or fanned into fire, as the various themes are worked out. It is mostly in the nature of a sherzo. Of the various motives that of Wallenstein is the most striking, overshadowing the others through the blare of the brasses.

The second movement represents the love of Max and Thekla and its effectively mournful ending, as the oboe sighs out Thekla's lament, is in striking contrast to the orchestral storm of the camp finale.

The third part tells of the general's assassination, ordered, so history tells us, by Emperor Ferdinand. There is a slow and ominous introduction, with the reappearance of the theme of Wallenstein. The opening measures of the allegro portray the conspiracy and the overthrow of the leader. Then again is heard the confusion of the camp. The Wallenstein theme is distorted. Death is upon him.

Dr. Muck's reading was a thoroughly musicianly achievement. The orchestra's earnest, spirited response was both efficient and stirring.

Of the "Genoveva" overture it is not necessary to say much, except that it is practically all that is heard now of that ill-fated opera. It first met the light in this country in Boston in 1866, sixteen years after the opera met with failure in Leipsic because of its dull libretto. It does not show Schumann at his best, melodious and beautiful in parts as it is.

The late Norwegian's concerto, which he is said to have written in 1868, and which was first played at Leipsic in 1872, has borne the brunt of much adverse and some favorable criticism. As a work to exhibit a pianist's virtuosity it cannot be ranked high. Mme. Samaroff made the most of it, however, and did the cadenza beautifully. She ran the second and third movements together, and accomplished the technical difficulties of the varying themes of the rondo with a proficiency which stamped her as a player of first quality. The concert lasted one hour and thirty-five minutes, and was a genuine pleasure throughout.

From INDIANAPOLIS, IND
Address
DEC 1- 1907
Date

Passing of Concerto and Kindred Topics

By Charles Anthony.

There has been widespread discussion the past week in Boston concerning Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra, in which the piano is treated purely as an orchestral instrument. By this, let it not be misunderstood, the piano is not ignored or handled instrumentally as a harp would be, but it receives full consideration for its intrinsically sonorous and crystal qualities of tone, and its future as a part of the modern orchestra is a much-mooted subject. Its desirability as a permanent member of such is dubious, but it does respond nobly to the master hand who understands, as Mr. Loeffler does, how to blend his colors and construct his tonal edifice. Therefore we may expect to find compositions for orchestra, with piano, more the rule than the exception, and the piano pyrotechnical and fragmentary solo, with an orchestral background of more or less pleasing design (i. e. the old-fashioned concert), slowly taking a less prominent position in the musical foreground.

The tone poem for piano and orchestra is, indeed, a much more artistic treatment of the question than was the formerly favored idea of a string of disjointed passages and cadenzas for the piano, connected and occasionally reinforced by a subservient and necessarily suppressed orchestra. It gave the soloist his opportunity of displaying his technical proficiency, and, perhaps, some of the emotional side of his nature, but rarely a chance to show a large grasp of a large thought. The temptation to show what he could do against the surf-like roar of a full orchestral accompaniment—to give undue prominence to brilliancy of execution—could hardly create an atmosphere conducive to results of coherence and continuity. In other words the piano did not blend.

It is this fault that has given such impetus to Dr. Muck's fad that soloists are out of place in an orchestral concert. We agree with this to a certain extent. The introduction of certain works for piano and orchestra, or of vocal or piano solos, that have nothing to do with the orchestra, does destroy the continuity and lower the dignity of the concert as a whole. But the attraction of a soloist to the public is legitimate, and undeniable, and the best of the concerti for piano or violin, and the performance of operatic arias and scenes with orchestra, will continue in popular favor, and maintain their accustomed place on the well-devised program, as they always have in spite of Dr. Muck and his disciples.

But especially the piano! Why, one might ask, more than the voice or violin, and do you also forget the violoncello? It is quite obvious that a full orchestra of, let us say, of sixty to one hundred men, is not an easy background against which to assert, with individual and striking force, the tonal resources of a single instrument. The violin is lacking in the fundity and requisite body of sound to show its beauty and mellow richness of tonal quality to receive the most felicitous treatment in the concerto with orchestral accompaniment. It has, of necessity, to resort to artificial means for striking the properly dramatic and spectacular note. Too often it must indulge in pyrotechnics, pure and simple, which are not effective in the large concert hall, or when deluged by an accompaniment that must, from its very intrumental proportions, be overwhelming.

One often feels the violin concerto to enjoy a more spontaneous interpretation when accompanied merely by the piano. The ideal arrangement would, of course, be a judicious diminution of orchestral forces and the smaller hall. The violin is, indeed, the king of the little army of instruments, and far surpasses the piano in its powers of emotional expressiveness, just as its subtlety, as a sort of orchestral soprano, far outstrips that of the human voice. The difference between the violin and the voice is that the art of tone production for the voice may be acquired by whoever possesses the organ, and its owner still live outside the sphere of sincere artistry, and, worse still, not realize it. The violinist must be a musician before he is an artist.

For this very reason the prima donna is out of place at an orchestral concert, unless there be a sufficiently operatic excuse for her appearing, and even then the performance has more personal and spectacular interest than, let us say, Dr. Muck would sanction or approve. But "live and let live," and who would for a moment discourage the dear souls? We love to see them and hear them both, and may they live forever, in which vastly prophetic wish there seems to be actually more truth than poetry in some cases.

The violoncellist misses fire when he straddles his instrument between the public and the orchestra. This instrument, in itself possessed of such noble qualities, and the essence of whose tone is both melting and luscious and purely musical (or should be, if properly played and not sawed) is ineffective on the whole in the concerto. It responds sluggishly to pyrotechnical display, and its grave and meditative melodies do not attain the proper high lights for a solo instrument with the volume and brilliancy of orchestral setting.

Therefore, we return to the piano which possesses a range of tone equal to that of the full orchestra, and whose sonority and breadth of tone qualify it to be placed in conjunction with almost any number of other instruments. And in such work as Mr. Loeffler has done and others with him, such as Cesar Franck, Debussy and others, we find a pleasant outlook for the future of this instrument viewed from the orchestral standpoint. It can be achieved with increase of dignity to piano and pianist who, if he deplores, momentarily, the former sensational eclat of being distinct from his surroundings, will, nevertheless, come to appreciate in time the exaltation of feeling himself part of a more perfect whole, one fiber of a woven texture of curious and new beauty, with much of the old poetic glamour, and a still older order of classic merit, that breathes a pagan joyousness and symmetry into the forms it creates.

We herewith give the words in which the critic of the Boston Transcript sets forth his opinion of this work He writes: "In the very summoning of atmosphere [illegible] and pastoral. Sunless it is, and gray and cold, for Daphnis, the lover, is gone out of it. Sick of desire is she that wells in it, for Daphnis comes not. Grave are the spells that shall bring him again. Anxious is the foreboding. But it is still a human world that presently shall stir with the joy of his step. For this new passion, and new humanity, Mr. Loeffler seeks again, as it seemed to us, a larger, intenser and vivider utterance than he has ever sought before. His melodies have a substance that heightens their intensity; fuller-voiced but no less significant is the development of them; his rhythms have a new propulsive power, richer and warmer, but no less felicitous and imaginative, is the instrumental coloring. Hitherto Mr. Loeffler's music has had the voice of a kind of poetic magic. There was a subtle spell in it. The music is poetic still, but now the voice is human and of clear passion.

The listener may hear a "Pagan Poem," if he will, as so much "absolute" music. He may know nothing of Virgil's verse. He may be perversely deaf to all the passionate or magical suggestion of the piece, to all the dramatic illusion to it. He may test it by no more than symphonic tests, and he will find it no music of fragmentary and comparatively unrelated phrases, insignificant without the detailed suggestion of a program, no music of ragged and straying polyphony, or of surface without frame and flesh. He will find it, rather, as closely knit, in all its transformations, as ordered in its structure and progress, as truly symphonic in every respect as though Mr. Loeffler had called it no more than a "Fantasia" and set no verses from Virgil on the fly-leaf of his score. Yet this music, answering all these symphonic tests, has in equal degree every expressive, poetic, delineative and dramatic quality that Mr. Loeffler seemingly would impart to it. It has them the more because by this very symphonic quality he is respectful of form and structure, or orderly progress, of the inherent nature of music and of its limitations on its expressive side. Mr. Loeffler does not wrench or shatter music to his purposes. He moulds it and persuades it to them with a patience and a pains and an ultimate achievement that have the quality of genius in them.

From STAR,
INDIANAPOLIS, IND
Address
DEC 1- 1907
Date

Max Zach and the St. Louis Orchestra

When Max Zach, long the viola player and pianist of the Symphony Orchestra, appeared for the first time as the conductor of the Symphony Society in St. Louis the newspapers of that city gave no clear account of the impression he then made. Now, the current issue of Musical America provides one and hints at the difficult circumstances under which Mr. Zach is beginning his work. He succeeds, as it happens, a conductor whom a part of the public of the Symphony Society liked warmly and whose memory it still cherishes—for comparisons. Says the correspondent of Musical America:

"The Symphony Society brought out its new director, Max Zach, at the first concert last week, and satisfied both the lay and professional element that a very capable man had been secured to give St. Louis a metropolitan orchestra in the not too far distant future. The audience was critical and a bit offish in spots, for there are still those who cling to the name of Ernst (the retiring conductor), and there was courteous rather than spontaneous applause for every number.

"The overture to 'Oberon,' with which everybody is familiar, pleased, mightily, the professional connoisseurs, who were out in full force. The orchestra had been thoroughly worked out and did admirably. The first suite from Bizet's music to 'L'Arlesienne' furnished a fruitful theme for discussion. The professionals said it was played exactly as Paur does it, and why not? The new conductor is bound to reflect something of his former leader in the Boston Orchestra. Admirably done, too, was Schumann's first symphony, and the performance centainly indicated that the new conductor and his musicians understood each other thoroughly, and that is a mighty important point gained right at the start."

It seems settled that Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, is to play in Europe next season, and she has already been engaged for Mr. Colonne's concerts in Paris and those of the London Symphony Orchestra in that city. She is one of the few pianists to win a public in America before she had gained reputation in Europe.

NEW YORK HERALD
DEC 8- 1907

APPLAUD PLAYING OF MR. PADEREWSKI

There was little suggestion of life's afterglow in Mr. Ignace Paderewski's playing yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall. He had chosen as a vehicle for his digital skill the Rubinstein D minor concerto, that oft-ridden battle horse of a battalion of pianists; and he played it, charged full of the din and stress of battle. He proved, at least for the moment, that its lush melodies were not composed for conservatory maidens, and his interpretation showed that the sentiment of Rubinstein could be made to sound heroic.

Then there was the orchestra, with Dr. Muck leading. The orchestra played a wonderful accompaniment to the Rubinstein concerto, and in addition Chabrier's brilliant "Espana" rhapsody, Reznicek's adagio and scherzo-finale and Boehe's "Taormina."

The works of the latter two composers were novelties. Boehe's composition is a mood picture in tones of the famous Sicilian town. It is interesting, and it employs a huge orchestra, but it might easily represent some other place and still sound as interesting. Of the two movements from the Reznicek suite the scherzo-finale was decidedly the better. Here, as throughout the afternoon, the playing of the orchestra and the conducting of Dr. Muck were perfection. The tone of the orchestra, the beauty of the solo playing and the precision all call for high praise. It was a great concert, and it was witnessed by a big audience that evidently thought it was great, for it said so with both hands.

From N. Y. EV'G SUN
Address
DEC 8- 1907
Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

AS 100 ANTI-IMPERIALISTS HAIL THEIR "EMPEROR"

And the Boston Symphony Orchestra Look Like a Hundred Very Good Listeners on the Stage When Dr. Muck Asks Paderewski to Play That "Song Without Words" Encore—Now Look Again for Encores in Brooklyn To-night—Boehe's "Taormina" To-morrow to Break Another Record—"La Boheme" Sergeant Puts a Lantern Out.

When Mr. Paderewski, at the ordinary closing hour of Boston Symphony concerts in New York, had taken his tenth recall in Carnegie Hall last night, and then, suddenly, Dr. Karl Muck flew off the stage to fetch the pianist back again, a most solid and conservative audience began to sit up and take notice. What's this? An encore! And it wasn't only the poor standees and the speculators' cheerful victims who listened presently to that simple Mendelssohn "Song Without Words" in F. One hundred men, or nearly that number, sat back on the stage and listened with the interest of expert artists. They, at least, knew that here was a sort of music which earns in two hours as much as the pianist with orchestra would expect to receive in a week.

That an exceptional week of music, from the Hub of anti-imperialism down to Washington and back, should be crowned with Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto here in New York, was an artistic plan. It was worthy of the Bostonian subtlety of self-effacing joint managers, and the event justified their ample means. Paderewski played the one show-piece of hackneyed music which began the history of the modern pianoforte as if Liszt never lived, nor Chopin ever sang. It was old Beethoven, and not less truth than poetry to the master's every phrase. Then, in the rondo finale, the Polish spirit simply had to crop out and set your imagination dancing. The pianist watched Muck and his men with a leonine gaze that has been called mesmeric before now. Even Beethoven he played with fire.

Dr. Muck, in chastened mood, not only cast the "anti-soloist" and "no-encore" rules to the winds of heaven, but he also made atonement to the people that walked away from Bruckner at this season's start. He invited them back with the Second Symphony of Brahms. The Vienna of the Three B's was its cheerful self again.

After Brahms's scherzo, "one of the most delightful caprices, its rapid movement only lightened and flung at full speed," the audience gave the conductor an ovation and all his men stood up with him. Later, after the solos, they finished late with Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. And as Mr. Hale remarked in the programme notes, now distributed in outer darkness, not to say on ice, in Fifty-seventh street, "The only successful opera on 'Genevieve of Brabant' was not Schumann's, but an impudent burlesque by Offenbach."

There was no rush for a train. The men go to-night to Brooklyn, where again either Paderewski or the Boston orchestra, alone and unaided, could sell out the house. Prof. Hooper says there hasn't been a ticket sent back this month. The symphony is Beethoven's "Pastoral," the classic of our tone-poets, along with Rubinstein's piano concerto No. 4, in D minor, and the "Spanish Rhapsody" of Chafrier.

Two novelties and no symphony will reward to-morrow's matinée house at Carnegie Hall, where last month Dr. Muck made a holiday of two symphonies.

For Boehe's "Taormina," another Boston record is broken. The actual number of men required to play that score is ninety-three. As the orchestra always carries an extra quartet of horns, and as Dr. Muck, Mr. Paderewski and Manager Comee are not yet travelling by airship, they are paying railroad fares for exactly one hundred men this week. The usual number is around ninety, or never less than eighty-five.

Though Caruso, Ancona, Alfred Hertz and Mr. Paderewski's young fellow countryman, Adamo Didur, of the rival operas, took a night off to appear among the boxholders at Carnegie Hall, there was one opera last night, "La Bohème" again, at the Metropolitan, with Sembrich and Bonci. There was again a thrill through the opera house when a stage lantern in the Café Momus scene took fire. A Paris sergeant pulled it down and stamped out the blaze, while Mimi and Rodolfo sang on in their duet and the audience never even moved.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAM
Address NEW YORK CITY
DEC 8- 1907

TWO CONCERT PROGRAMMES.

Noted Piano Soloists Aid New York and Boston Symphonies.

Yesterday's concerts included a good orchestral programme by the New York Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall. Josef Hofmann was the soloist.

In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] Dr. Carl Muck, gave a programme which contained some

From TRUTH
BUFFALO, N. Y.
Address
DEC 7- 1907

EMIL PAUR—A SKETCH

Mr. Paur is fifty years old, and was born at Czernoviyz, Austria. He entered the Vienna Conservatory of Music when a young man, and there became a pupil of Hellmsberger, Dessoff and Anton Bruckner. After several years as a member of the Imperial Opera House orchestra at Vienna, he went to Berlin to conduct an orchestra. At Berlin, Hans von Bulow took a deep interest in him. From his early days, Mr. Paur was a violin player, but under the direction of von Bulow, he studied the piano-forte, ultimately going with him to Hanover in the capacity of a second leader of the famed von Bulow orchestra. After a period of short activity at Konigsberg, Mr. Paur went to the Court Theatre at Mannheim, where he made successful propaganda for Liszt and Wagner.

In the fall of 1899, when Arthur Nikisch was called from the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipsic to take the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Paur succeeded him. When Arthur Nikisch severed his contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1893, Mr. Paur followed him and remained in that position for five years, or until the end of his fixed contract. He went from Boston to New York, and took up the work and orchestra left by Anton Seidl. Mr. Paur was also elected conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society, succeeding Anton Seidl, and it was during this period that his interpretation of the works of Richard Wagner first compelled admiration. During this time Mr. Paur conducted all the Wagner works and the German operas given by the Maurice Grau Opera Company in New York and the leading cities of the country. For two years Mr. Paur acted as "guest conductor" in London, Madrid, Berlin, St. Petersburg and Vienna. Mr. Paur has also conducted by special invitation the German operas given at Covent Garden, London.

From Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
DEC 7 1907
Date

There is promise of fullness of enjoyment in the programme for the second afternoon concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple next Saturday. Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist and the orchestra under Walter Damrosch's direction, will play the Symphonie Fantastique by Berlioz; piano concerts by Tschaikowsky; Gounod's "Little Symphony for Wind Instruments" and Elgar's march "With Pomp and Circumstance." Mme. Carreno has an international repute that is based upon achievements of the highest order and has been before the public

MME. CARRENO.

so long that her status as an artist is thoroughly established. Her last appearance in Brooklyn was at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on March 25, 1899, when she was heard in MacDowell's Concerto in D minor, No. 2.

1884

93

Newspaper Cutting prepared by

From INDIANAPOLIS, IND

Address DEC 1- 1907

Date

Passing of Concerto and Kindred Topics

By Charles Anthony.

There has been widespread discussion the past week in Boston concerning Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" for piano and orchestra, in which the piano is treated purely as an orchestral instrument. By this, let it not be misunderstood, the piano is not ignored or handled instrumentally as a harp would be, but it receives full consideration for its intrinsically sonorous and crystal qualities of tone, and its future as a part of the modern orchestra is a much-mooted subject. Its desirability as a permanent member of such is dubious, but it does respond nobly to the master hand who understands, as Mr. Loeffler does, how to blend his colors and construct his tonal edifice. Therefore we may expect to find compositions for orchestra, with piano, more the rule than the exception, and the piano pyrotechnical and fragmentary solo, with an orchestral background of more or less pleasing design (i. e. the old-fashioned concert), slowly taking a less prominent position in the musical foreground.

The tone poem for piano and orchestra is, indeed, a much more artistic treatment of the question than was the formerly favored idea of a string of disjointed passages and cadenzas for the piano, connected and occasionally reenforced by a subservient and necessarily suppressed orchestra. It gave the soloist his opportunity of displaying his technical proficiency, and, perhaps, some of the emotional side of his nature, but rarely a chance to show a large grasp of a large thought. The temptation to show what he could do against the surf-like roar of a full orchestral accompaniment—to give undue prominence to brilliancy of execution—could hardly create an atmosphere conducive to results of coherence and continuity. In other words the piano did not blend.

It is this fault that has given such impetus to Dr. Muck's fad that soloists are out of place in an orchestral concert. We agree with this to a certain extent. The introduction of certain works for piano and orchestra, or of vocal or piano solos, that have nothing to do with the orchestra, does destroy the continuity and lower the dignity of the concert as a whole. But the attraction of a soloist to the public is legitimate, and undeniable, and the best of the concerti for piano or violin, and the performance of operatic arias and scenes with orchestra, will continue in popular favor, and maintain their accustomed place on the well-devised program, as they always have in spite of Dr. Muck and his disciples.

But especially the piano! Why, one might ask, more than the voice or violin, and do you also forget the violoncello? It is quite obvious that a full orchestra of, let us say, of sixty to one hundred men, is not an easy background against which to assert, with individual and striking force, the tonal resources of a single instrument. The violin is lacking in the profundity and requisite body of sound to allow its beauty and mellow richness of tonal quality to receive the most felicitous treatment in the concerto with orchestral accompaniment. It has, of necessity, to resort to artificial means for striking the properly dramatic and spectacular note. Too often it must indulge in pyrotechnics, pure and simple, which are not effective in the large concert hall, or when deluged by an accompaniment that must, from its very intrumental proportions, be overwhelming.

One often feels the violin concerto to enjoy a more spontaneous interpretation when accompanied merely by the piano. The ideal arrangement would, of course, be a judicious diminution of orchestral forces and the smaller hall. The violin is, indeed, the king of the little army of instruments, and far surpasses the piano in its powers of emotional expressiveness, just as its subtlety, as a sort of orchestral soprano, far outstrips that of the human voice. The difference between the violin and the voice is that the art of tone production for the voice may be acquired by whoever possesses the organ, and its owner still live outside the sphere of sincere artistry, and, worse still, not realize it. The violinist must be a musician before he is an artist.

For this very reason the prima donna is out of place at an orchestral concert, unless there be a sufficiently operatic excuse for her appearing, and even then the performance has more personal and spectacular interest than, let us say, Dr. Muck would sanction or approve. But "live and let live," and who would for a moment discourage the dear souls? We love to see them and hear them both, and may they live forever, in which vastly prophetic wish there seems to be actually more truth than poetry in some cases.

The violoncellist misses fire when he straddles his instrument between the public and the orchestra. This instrument, in itself possessed of such noble qualities, and the essence of whose tone is both melting and luscious and purely musical (or should be, if properly played and not sawed) is ineffective on the whole in the concerto. It responds sluggishly to pyrotechnical display, and its grave and meditative melodies do not attain the proper high lights for a solo instrument with the volume and brilliancy of orchestral setting.

Therefore, we return to the piano, which possesses a range of tone equal to that of the full orchestra, and whose sonority and breadth of tone qualify it to be placed in conjunction with almost any number of other instruments. And in such work as Mr. Loeffler has done and others with him, such as Cesar Franck, Debussy and others, we find a pleasant outlook for the future of this instrument viewed from the orchestral standpoint. It can be achieved with increase of dignity to piano and pianist, who, if he deplores, momentarily, the former sensational eclat of being distinct from his surroundings, will, nevertheless, come to appreciate in time the exaltation of feeling himself part of a more perfect whole, one fiber of a woven texture of curious and new beauty, with much of the old poetic glamour, and a still older order of classic merit, that breathes a pagan joyousness and symmetry into the forms it creates.

We herewith give the words in which the critic of the Boston Transcript sets forth his opinion of this work He writes:

In the very summoning of atmosphere Loeffler leads his hearers into no world of mist, shadow and phantoms. Sunless it is and gray and cold, for Daphnis, the lover, is gone out of it. Sick of desire is she that dwells in it, for Daphnis comes not. Grave are the spells that shall bring him again. Anxious is the foreboding. But it is still a human world that presently shall stir with the joy of his step. For this new passion, and new humanity, Mr. Loeffler seeks again, as it seemed to us, a larger, intenser and vivider utterance than he has ever sought before. His melodies have a substance that heightens their intensity; fuller-voiced but no less significant is the development of them; his rhythms have a new propulsive power, richer and warmer, but no less felicitous and imaginative, is the instrumental coloring. Hitherto Mr. Loeffler's music has had the voice of a kind of poetic magic. There was a subtle spell in it. The music is poetic still, but now the voice is human and of clear passion.

The listener may hear a "Pagan Poem," if he will, as so much "absolute" music. He may know nothing of Virgil's verse. He may be perversely deaf to all the passionate or magical suggestion of the piece, to all the dramatic illusion to it. He may test it by no more than symphonic tests, and he will find it no music of fragmentary and comparatively unrelated phrases, insignificant without the detailed suggestion of a program, no music of ragged and straying polyphony, or of surface without frame and flesh. He will find it, rather, as closely knit, in all its transformations, as ordered in its structure and progress, as truly symphonic in every respect as though Mr. Loeffler had called it no more than a "Fantasia" and set no verses from Virgil on the fly-leaf of his score. Yet this music, answering all these symphonic tests, has in equal degree every expressive, poetic, delineative and dramatic quality that Mr. Loeffler seemingly would impart to it. It has them the more because by this very symphonic quality he is respectful of form and structure, or orderly progress, of the inherent nature of music and of its limitations on its expressive side. Mr. Loeffler does not wrench or shatter music to his purposes. He moulds it and persuades it to them with a patience and a pains and an ultimate achievement that have the quality of genius in them.

From STAR,

INDIANAPOLIS, IND

Address

Date

Max Zach and the St. Louis Orchestra

When Max Zach, long the viola player and pianist of the Symphony Orchestra, appeared for the first time as the conductor of the Symphony Society in St. Louis the newspapers of that city gave no clear account of the impression he then made. Now, the current issue of Musical America provides one and hints at the difficult circumstances under which Mr. Zach is beginning his work. He succeeds, as it happens, a conductor whom a part of the public of the Symphony Society liked warmly and whose memory it still cherishes—for comparisons. Says the correspondent of Musical America:

"The Symphony Society brought out its new director, Max Zach, at the first concert last week, and satisfied both the lay and professional element that a very capable man had been secured to give St. Louis a metropolitan orchestra in the not too far distant future. The audience was critical and a bit offish in spots, for there are still those who cling to the name of Ernst (the retiring conductor), and there was courteous rather than spontaneous applause for every number.

"The overture to 'Oberon,' with which everybody is familiar, pleased, mightily, the professional conoisseurs, who were out in full force. The orchestra had been thoroughly worked out and did admirably. The first suite from Bizet's music to 'L'Arlesienne' furnished a fruitful theme for discussion. The profesionals said it was played exactly as Paur does it, and why not? The new conductor is bound to reflect something of his former leader in the Boston Orchestra. Admirably done, too, was Schumann's first symphony, and the performance centainly indicated that the new conductor and his musicians understood each other thoroughly, and that is a mighty important point gained right at the start."

It seems settled that Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, is to play in Europe next season, and she has already been engaged for Mr. Colonne's concerts in Paris and those of the London Symphony Orchestra in that city. She is one of the few pianists to win a public in America before she had gained reputation in Europe.

NEW YORK HERALD

DEC 8 1907

APPLAUD PLAYING OF MR. PADEREWSKI

There was little suggestion of life's afterglow in Mr. Ignace Paderewski's playing yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall. He had chosen as a vehicle for his digital skill the Rubinstein D minor concerto, that oft-ridden battle horse of a battalion of pianists; and he played it, charged full of the din and stress of battle. He proved, at least for the moment, that its lush melodies were not composed for conservatory maidens, and his interpretation showed that the sentiment of Rubinstein could be made to sound heroic.

Then there was the orchestra, with Dr. Muck leading. The orchestra played a wonderful accompaniment to the Rubinstein concerto, and in addition Chabrier's brilliant "Espana" rhapsody, Reznicek's adagio and scherzo-finale and Boehe's "Taormina."

The works of the latter two composers were novelties. Boehe's composition is a mood picture in tones of the famous Sicilian town. It is interesting, and it employs a huge orchestra, but it might easily represent some other place and still sound as interesting. Of the two movements from the Reznicek suite the scherzo-finale was decidedly the better. Here, as throughout the afternoon, the playing of the orchestra and the conducting of Dr. Muck were perfection. The tone of the orchestra, the beauty of the solo playing and the precision all call for high praise. It was a great concert, and it was witnessed by a big audience that evidently thought it was great, for it said so with both hands.

From N. Y. EV'G SUN

Address DEC 6- 1907

Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

AS 100 ANTI-IMPERIALISTS HAIL THEIR "EMPEROR."

And the Boston Symphony Orchestra Look Like a Hundred Very Good Listeners on the Stage When Dr. Muck Asks Paderewski to Play That "Song Without Words" Encore—Now Look Again for Encores in Brooklyn To-night—Boehe's "Taormina" To-morrow to Break Another Record—"La Boheme" Sergeant Puts a Lantern Out.

When Mr. Paderewski, at the ordinary closing hour of Boston Symphony concerts in New York, had taken his tenth recall in Carnegie Hall last night, and then, suddenly, Dr. Karl Muck flew off the stage to fetch the pianist back again, a most solid and conservative audience began to sit up and take notice. What's this? An encore! And it wasn't only the poor standees and the speculators' cheerful victims who listened presently to that simple Mendelssohn "Song Without Words" in F. One hundred men, or nearly that number, sat back on the stage and listened with the interest of expert artists. They, at least, knew that here was a sort of music which earns in two hours as much as the pianist with orchestra would expect to receive in a week.

That an exceptional week of music, from the Hub of anti-imperialism down to Washington and back, should be crowned with Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto here in New York, was an artistic plan. It was worthy of the Bostonian subtlety of self-effacing joint managers, and the event justified their ample means. Paderewski played the one show-piece of hackneyed music which began the history of the modern pianoforte as if Liszt never lived, nor Chopin ever sang. It was old Beethoven, and not less truth than poetry to the master's every phrase. Then, in the rondo finale, the Polish spirit simply had to crop out and set your imagination dancing. The pianist watched Muck and his men with a leonine gaze that has been called mesmeric before now. Even Beethoven he played with fire.

Dr. Muck, in chastened mood, not only cast the "anti-soloist" and "no-encore" rules to the winds of heaven, but he also made atonement to the people that walked away from Bruckner at this season's start. He invited them back with the Second Symphony of Brahms. The Vienna of the Three B's was its cheerful self again.

After Brahms's scherzo, "one of the most delightful caprices, its rapid movement only lightened and flung at full speed," the audience gave the conductor an ovation and all his men stood up with him. Later, after the solos, they finished late with Schumann's "Genoveva" overture. And as Mr. Hale remarked in the programme notes, now distributed in outer darkness, not to say on ice, in Fifty-seventh street, "The only successful opera on 'Genevieve of Brabant' was not Schumann's, but an impudent burlesque by Offenbach."

There was no rush for a train. The men go to-night to Brooklyn, where again either Paderewski or the Boston orchestra, alone and unaided, could sell out the house. Prof. Hooper says there hasn't been a ticket sent back this month. The symphony is Beethoven's "Pastoral," the classic of our tone-poets, along with Rubinstein's piano concerto No. 4, in D minor, and the "Spanish Rhapsody" of Chafrier.

Two novelties and no symphony will reward to-morrow's matinée house at Carnegie Hall, where last month Dr. Muck made a holiday of two symphonies.

For Boehe's "Taormina," another Boston record is broken. The actual number of men required to play that score is ninety-three. As the orchestra always carries an extra quartet of horns, and as Dr. Muck, Mr. Paderewski and Manager Comee are not yet travelling by airship, they are paying railroad fares for exactly one hundred men this week. The usual number is around ninety, or never less than eighty-five.

Though Caruso, Ancona, Alfred Hertz and Mr. Paderewski's young fellow countryman, Adamo Didur, of the rival operas, took a night off to appear among the boxholders at Carnegie Hall, there was one opera last night, "La Bohème" again, at the Metropolitan, with Sembrich and Bonci. There was again a thrill through the opera house when a stage lantern in the Café Momus scene took fire. A Paris sergeant pulled it down and stamped out the blaze, while Mimi and Rodolfo sang on in their duet and the audience never even moved.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAM

Address NEW YORK CITY DEC 8- 1907

TWO CONCERT PROGRAMMES.

Noted Piano Soloists Aid New York and Boston Symphonies.

Yesterday's concerts included a good orchestral programme by the New York Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall. Josef Hofmann was the soloist.

In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr. Carl Muck, gave a programme which contained some unattractive novelties.

[illegible] was the soloist.

[93]

From TRUTH

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.

DEC 7- 1907

EMIL PAUR—A SKETCH

Mr. Paur is fifty years old, and was born at Czernoviyz, Austria. He entered the Vienna Conservatory of Music when a young man, and there became a pupil of Hellmsberger, Dessoff and Anton Bruckner. After several years as a member of the Imperial Opera House orchestra at Vienna, he went to Berlin to conduct an orchestra. At Berlin, Hans von Bulow took a deep interest in him. From his early days, Mr. Paur was a violin player, but under the direction of von Bulow, he studied the piano-forte, ultimately going with him to Hanover in the capacity of a second leader of the famed von Bulow orchestra. After a period of short activity at Konigsberg, Mr. Paur went to the Court Theatre at Mannheim, where he made successful propaganda for Liszt and Wagner.

In the fall of 1899, when Arthur Nikisch was called from the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipsic to take the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Paur succeeded him. When Arthur Nikisch severed his contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1893, Mr. Paur followed him and remained in that position for five years, or until the end of his fixed contract. He went from Boston to New York, and took up the work and orchestra left by Anton Seidl. Mr. Paur was also elected conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society, succeeding Anton Seidl, and it was during this period that his interpretation of the works of Richard Wagner first compelled admiration. During this time Mr. Paur conducted all the Wagner works and the German operas given by the Maurice Grau Opera Company in New York and the leading cities of the country. For two years Mr. Paur acted as 'guest conductor" in London, Madrid, Berlin, St. Petersburg and Vienna. Mr. Paur has also conducted by special invitation the German operas given at Covent Garden, London.

From Daily [illegible]

Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date DEC 7 1907

There is promise of fullness of enjoyment in the programme for the second afternoon concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple next Saturday. Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist and the orchestra under Walter Damrosch's direction, will play the Symphonic Fantastique by Berlioz; piano concerts by Tschaikowsky; Gounod's "Little Symphony for Wind Instruments" and Elgar's march "With Pomp and Circumstance." Mme. Carreno has an international repute that is based upon achievements of the highest order and has been before the public

1884

MME. CARRENO.

so long that her status as an artist is thoroughly established. Her last appearance in Brooklyn was at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on March 25, 1899, when she was heard in MacDowell's Concerto in D minor, No. 2.

NEW YORK MAIL
DEC 6- 1907

PADEREWSKI WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE CONCERT

Few concerts reach the degree of perfection achieved by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night at Carnegie hall, with Paderewski as soloist. This was the second visit of the orchestra, almost reorganized this season by Dr. Muck, and the noticeable gain in ensemble was not least among the evening's delights. The programme, too, went straight home, even to an audience presumed to be not especially fond of Brahms.

The volleys of applause between each movement were as spontaneous as was the presentation, and really astonished the great conductor, who said after the concert, "Why do they tell me that New York does not like Brahms?"

Such a reading of the second symphony in D major as was given by Dr. Muck would convince the most uncompromising, although this Brahms work stands strongly upon its merits as a thing of beauty and of free, easy, melodious expression. For the second time this week Brahms, the musical Brahms, was heard. The Kneisels and Mr. Ganz furnished another splendid proof that the great German master is not as somber as he is painted.

The juxtaposition of the Brahms symphony and the Beethoven piano concerto in E flat major was in good taste. Paderewski played the concerto with utmost reverence, and invested it with purity and directness, overpowering through sheer simplicity; in a word, it was a noble message carried by a worthy messenger. The orchestral support was equally remarkable, and to this was due the freedom and the evenness of the performance.

The Boston symphony rule of "no encores" was broken, and Paderewski played with similar respect for art Mendelssohn's F major song without words, which did not seem out of keeping with the occasion.

The programme closed with Schumann's Genova overture, which rounded out one of the finest programmes ever made for and presented before a New York assemblage of music lovers.

* * *

Address ..... Brooklyn, N. Y

Date .....

DEC 7 190

MME. CARRENO WILL PLAY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Second of Saturday Matinees at Baptist Temple.

PADEREWSKI'S RECITAL.

Other Concert and Recital Programmes in Brooklyn and Manhattan.

Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the second Saturday matinee concert by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at the Baptist Temple on Saturday. Her last appearance here was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 25, 1899. At the concert next Saturday Mme. Carreno will be heard in the "Concerto for Piano with Orchestra" (Tschaikowsky), the programme as a whole including "Symphonic Fantastique" (Berlioz), "Concerto for Piano with Orchestra" (Tschaikowsky), "Little Symphony for Wind Instruments" (Gounod); march, "With Pomp and Circumstance" (Elgar).

In the Chopin number which is to close his piano recital of Dec. 16 at the Baptist Temple Paderewski has grouped the Nocturne in G major, Op. 37; six Etudes, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6 9, 11, Op. 25; Berceuse, Polonaise in F sharp minor, Op. 44, and the Valse in A flat major, Op. 34.

Jan Kubelik, who was expected to give a violin recital on Thursday evening, Dec. 26, has decided to take the entire Christmas week for rest, previous to the commencement of his Western tour at the beginning of January. His recital in Brooklyn is therefore postponed until [illegible] in the latter part of February [illegible]

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y
DEC 7 1907

OVATION FOR PADEREWSKI.

Pianist Gives Wonderful Performance with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The possibility of swelling the receipts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn and extending their patronage beyond a charmed circle of music patrons and fashionable folk was demonstrated by the programme with Paderewski as the soloist which drew a great crowd to the Baptist Temple last evening.

It was the second of this season's concerts by the Boston orchestra, with Karl Muck conducting. Though the celebrated pianist was undoubtedly the greatest attraction, and deservedly so, the unequaled orchestra of American has capability of arousing enthusiasm, even in Brooklyn, when it elects to play programmes that the concert-goers in general want to hear. Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony was the first number on the concert programme, and frequently as it has been heard, its interpretation under Dr. Muck's baton was illuminating and exquisite. It was the next number when Paderewski appeared in which the interest of the night centered. The artist came forward with his wonted air of modesty, with his shock of hair not as long as usual, but looking some years older than when he was in Brooklyn the last time. The lapse of time has, however, matured the artist and before he had struck a note his repose of manner was felt. His selection was Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, opus 70. Adjectives of praise in the superlative degree could not be used too profusely in commenting upon his performance last evening. First of all one felt that his mastery of the technique of his art was greater even than the difficult composition demanded. There was no freakish ostentation at any time, such as he displayed on one or two occasions in his last recitals here. His playing of the concerto was electric in its effect, with consummate brilliancy. The purity and bell-like clearness of every note struck with his musical intelligence made his listeners marvel, while the rapid passages were taken in a tempo that kept the orchestra busy. Its support of the soloist was admirable.

At the close of the number, much to the surprise of the audience, the hard the fast rule of no encores at the symphony concerts was broken and Paderewski played Schumann's "Nachtstuck" so impressively that the audience seemed to be holding its breath. The delicate, sonorous quality of his tone was finer than ever, but another instrument than that on which commercial return leads the artist to play would have responded in more telling fashion.

People who had bought only admission and some of whom sat on the floor back of the pews because no seats could be had were on their feet through the performance of the concerto, and stood through the last brilliant number of the programme, Chabrier's "Spanish Rhapsody."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ..... Standard Union,
Address ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ..... DEC 8 1907

Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the second Saturday matinee concert by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at the Baptist Temple, on Saturday (Brooklyn Institute). Her last appearance here was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on March 25, 1899, when she played the Concerto for Pianoforte, D minor, No. 2, Op. 23, MacDowell, as second number in a programme made up of the "Sakuntala" overture, Goldmark; "Bourre-Fantastique," Chabrier, whose "Espana" Rhapsody was played last Friday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and the Symphony No. 2, Brahms. At the concert next Saturday Mme. Carreno will be heard in the "Concerto for Piano with Orchestra," Tschaikowsky, the programme as a whole including:

Symphonic fantastique.....Berlioz
Concerto for piano with orchestra
Tschaikowsky
Little symphony for wind instruments..Gounod
March, "With Pomp and Circumstance"..Elgar

N. Y. Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 7 1907

MUSICAL.

Notable Concert by Boston Orchestra With Paderewski as Soloist.

It was anticipated that Brooklyn would find the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple last night an occasion to make exceedingly glad the heart of music lovers, and there was no disappointment. It was an extraordinary concert in a series always notable for the highest excellence. Unusual expectancy was apparent in the sale of every seat for this concert long before the date of its occurrence, and the reason for this extra show of interest was apparent in the announcement that Mr. Paderewski was to be the soloist. Brooklyn has learned to rejoice in the work of this orchestra for itself alone, and it has also learned with the rest of the world to find particular fascination in the playing of the great Polish pianist, so that the co-operation of the two was something like a superlative attraction.

Paderewski's part in the concert was the performance with the orchestra of the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor, No. 4, a work of substantial vitality among the standard compositions of its class. This concerto is uncommonly exacting in its call upon the interpretative resourcefulness of the pianist, affording a good opportunity to show what is his stature as a virtuoso. Paderewski's playing was a rare disclosure of the undiminished potency of that peculiarly personal and extraordinary quality of his art, which has taken such a hold of the public. There was a great show of enthusiasm which the pianist acknowledged by coming out twice and bowing to the tribute of appreciation. And there was a still greater demonstration when he came out and took his seat at the piano for an encore. He waited for the hushed stillness necessary for the proper hearing of what was to follow and then gave an exquisite rendering to Schumann's Nachtied.

There could be no doubt of the profound impression upon the audience which was limited only by the capacity of the auditorium, and the effect of the orchestral renderings was hardly less notable. The principal number was Beethoven's Sixth Symphony in F major, the so-called "Pastoral," and the closing piece, following the concerto, was Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody. There was abounding charm in Dr. Muck's interpretation of the symphony, which, of course, is an old favorite. This work is perhaps Beethoven's nearest approach to an exposition of what has come to be called programme music, because of its definite connection with the expression of a given series of incidents. But Mr. Beethoven was wise in his generation. He knew how to write lovely music without expecting to suggest or express more than music should be expected to express. And in view of the vagaries of modern composers in this respect, as for instance, the attempt of Mr. Strauss in his absurd and egotistic Symphonia Domestica, there is renewed pleasure in reverting to Mr. Beethoven's method of indicating tone pictures.

Loving care was manifest in the rendering of the symphony last night, and it afforded great enjoyment. The Spanish rhapsody, given here a week ago by the New York Symphony players, is an admirably characteristic and thoroughly meritorious work of its class, and its rhythmic and melodic charm are ever grateful.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ..... Standard Union,
Address ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ..... DEC 8 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is away on its regular December trip giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, and two in New York, and before its return home it will give a concert in Newark, N. J., for the first time it has ever appeared in that city. In the larger cities the soloist in all the concerts of this trip is Paderewski, who plays with the orchestra every day. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only one in the East with which he appears, although in the West he plays with the Pittsburg, Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras.

From ..... Standard Union,
Address ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date ..... DEC 7 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as conductor, was given last evening at the Baptist Temple, under the combined auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society. The soloist last evening was the incomparable Paderewski, and this fact brought out one of the largest audiences ever gathered in the Temple. The programme included Beethoven's Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68; Rubinstein's Concerto in G minor, No. 4, for piano forte and orchestra, op. 70, and Chabrier's "Espana," Rhapsody for orchestra.

The Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven is one of the most entrancing works of the great master, and was composed in the country round about Herligenstadt in the summer of 1808, and is an impression and recollection of country life, a life Beethoven loved, as is evident by the delightful collection of harmonies expressed in this work. The orchestra last evening did full justice to the work, and was especially effective in the third movement, where from the jollity of the country folks to the thunderstorm and tempest, a wonderful range of orchestral work was had, which was performed with the most absolute precision. Paderewski appeared as soloist in the Rubinstein Concerto. In this work the opportunities for the pianist are legion, and Paderewski certainly availed himself of every one. There are certainly pianists and great ones, besides the soloist of last evening, but there is something indescribable about Paderewski that makes him far and above all others, and it is evidently his combination of power, mastery and expression that enthralls his auditors and holds them spellbound during all his wonderful playing, and then compels them to break forth into a wildness of applause. So great was the applause last evening he was compelled to appear time after time, and finally oblige with an encore. The concerted work of the orchestra in this number was exceptionally good, and well timed. The concert closed with the Espana Rhapsody of Chabrier. The next concert is on Jan. 10.

NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.
DEC 7- 1907

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium next Monday night will be the occasion of that great organization's first appearance in this city. For twenty years it has ranked as the foremost orchestral body in this country, and it has no superior, if indeed an equal, among those abroad. Its membership comprises the best obtainable musicians for the work entrusted to them, and it has had the benefit of years of training in ensemble work by such fine conductors as William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur and Dr. Karl Muck, the last of whom was brought from the Berlin Royal Opera to this country last season and is its present musical director. Each has left the imprint of his knowledge and talent on the band, which shows, in its performance, the splendid results of more than a score of years of work under the guidance and inspiration of great authorities. It has acquired a technical finish that is marvelous, and it possesses the ability to enter so fully into the moods of the compositions played that their contents are set forth not only with perfect art on the executive side of the work, but with an affluence of feeling and a tonal coloring that are deeply moving. The entire orchestra, numbering nearly one hundred musicians, will take part in the concert, and because of that fact the performances will be unique in the musical history of Newark.

The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, and in hearing her the audience will hearken to one of the most gifted of the younger pianists before the public to-day. In speaking of a recital given by her in New York last season, E. H. Krehbiel, the learned and reliable critic of the New York Tribune, said: "All the gradations of dynamic utterance, from a whispered to a thundered tone, are at her command. She has mastered the rhythmical as well as the dynamic effects which are the product of intellectual use of keyboard and damper pedal in a degree which must challenge admiration from the greatest of the virtuosi with whom pianoforte lovers are familiar."

* * *

[84]

NEW YORK
DEC 6- 1907

PADEREWSKI WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE CONCERT

Few concerts reach the degree of perfection achieved by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night at Carnegie hall, with Paderewski as soloist. This was the second visit of the orchestra, almost reorganized this season by Dr. Muck, and the noticeable gain in ensemble was not least among the evening's delights. The programme, too, went straight home, even to an audience presumed to be not especially fond of Brahms.

The volleys of applause between each movement were as spontaneous as was the presentation, and really astonished the great conductor, who said after the concert, "Why do they tell me that New York does not like Brahms?"

Such a reading of the second symphony in D major as was given by Dr. Muck would convince the most uncompromising, although this Brahms work stands strongly upon its merits as a thing of beauty and of free, easy, melodious expression. For the second time this week Brahms, the musical Brahms, was heard. The Kneisels and Mr. Ganz furnished another splendid proof that the great German master is not as somber as he is painted.

The juxtaposition of the Brahms symphony and the Beethoven piano concerto in E flat major was in good taste. Paderewski played the concerto with utmost reverence, and invested it with purity and directness, overpowering through sheer simplicity; in a word, it was a noble message carried by a worthy messenger. The orchestral support was equally remarkable, and to this was due the freedom and the evenness of the performance.

The Boston symphony rule of "no encores" was broken, and Paderewski played with similar respect for art Mendelssohn's F major song without words, which did not seem out of keeping with the occasion.

The programme closed with Schumann's Genova overture, which rounded out one of the finest programmes ever made for and presented before a New York assemblage of music lovers.

* * *

Address ...ren,
Date Brooklyn, N. Y

DEC 7 1907

MME. CARRENO WILL PLAY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Second of Saturday Matinees at Baptist Temple.

PADEREWSKI'S RECITAL.

Other Concert and Recital Programmes in Brooklyn and Manhattan.

Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the second Saturday matinee concert by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at the Baptist Temple on Saturday. Her last appearance here was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on March 25, 1899. At the concert next Saturday Mme. Carreno will be heard in the "Concerto for Piano with Orchestra" (Tschaikowsky) the programme as a whole including "Symphonie Fantastique" (Berlioz), "Concerto for Piano with Orchestra" (Tschaikowsky), "Little Symphony for Wind Instruments" (Gounod); march "With Pomp and Circumstance" (Elgar).

In the Chopin number which is to close his piano recital of Dec. 16 at the Baptist Temple Paderewski has grouped the Nocturne in G major, Op. 37; six Etudes, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6 9, 11, Op. 25; Berceuse, Polonaise in F sharp minor, Op. 44, and the Valse in A flat major, Op. 34.

Jan Kubelik, who was expected to give a violin recital on Thursday evening, Dec. 26, has decided to take the entire Christmas week for rest, previous to the commencement of his Western tour at the beginning of January. His recital in Brooklyn is therefore postponed until a date in the latter part of February or in March, which is yet to be selected.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y
DEC 7 1907

OVATION FOR PADEREWSKI.

Pianist Gives Wonderful Performance with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The possibility of swelling the receipts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Brooklyn and extending their patronage beyond a charmed circle of music patrons and fashionable folk was demonstrated by the programme with Paderewski as the soloist which drew a great crowd to the Baptist Temple last evening.

It was the second of this season's concerts by the Boston orchestra, with Karl Muck conducting. Though the celebrated pianist was undoubtedly the greatest attraction, and deservedly so, the unequaled orchestra of American has capability of arousing enthusiasm, even in Brooklyn, when it elects to play programmes that the concert-goers in general want to hear. Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony was the first number on the concert programme, and frequently as it has been heard, its interpretation under Dr. Muck's baton was illuminating and exquisite. It was the next number when Paderewski appeared in which the interest of the night centered. The artist came forward with his wonted air of modesty, with his shock of hair not as long as usual, but looking some years older than when he was in Brooklyn the last time. The lapse of time has, however, matured the artist and before he had struck a note his repose of manner was felt. His selection was Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, opus 70. Adjectives of praise in the superlative degree could not be used too profusely in commenting upon his performance last evening. First of all one felt that his mastery of the technique of his art was greater even than the difficult composition demanded. There was no freakish ostentation at any time, such as he displayed on one or two occasions in his last recitals here. His playing of the concerto was electric in its effect, with consummate brilliancy. The purity and bell-like clearness of every note struck with his musical intelligence made his listeners marvel, while the rapid passages were taken in a tempo that kept the orchestra busy. Its support of the soloist was admirable.

At the close of the number, much to the surprise of the audience, the hard the fast rule of no encores at the symphony concerts was broken and Paderewski played Schumann's "Nachtstuck" so impressively that the audience seemed to be holding its breath. The delicate, sonorous quality of his tone was finer than ever, but another instrument than that on which commercial return leads the artist to play would have responded in more telling fashion.

People who had bought only admission and some of whom sat on the floor back of the pews because no seats could be had were on their feet through the performance of the concerto, and stood through the last brilliant number of the programme, Chabrier's "Spanish Rhapsody."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From ...Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date DEC 8 1907

Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the second Saturday matinee concert by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at the Baptist Temple, on Saturday (Brooklyn Institute). Her last appearance here was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on March 25, 1899, when she played the Concerto for Pianoforte, D minor, No. 2, Op. 23, MacDowell, as second number in a programme made up of the "Sakuntala" overture, Goldmark; "Bourre-Fantastique," Chabrier, whose "Espana" Rhapsody was played last Friday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and the Symphony No. 2, Brahms. At the concert next Saturday Mme. Carreno will be heard in the "Concerto for Piano with Orchestra," Tschaikowsky, the programme as a whole including:

Symphonie fantastique.....Berlioz
Concerto for piano with orchestra
Tschaikowsky
Little symphony for wind instruments..Gounod
March, "With Pomp and Circumstance"..Elgar

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 7 1907

up.

MUSICAL.

Notable Concert by Boston Orchestra With Paderewski as Soloist.

It was anticipated that Brooklyn would find the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple last night an occasion to make exceedingly glad the heart of music lovers, and there was no disappointment. It was an extraordinary concert in a series always notable for the highest excellence. Unusual expectancy was apparent in the sale of every seat for this concert long before the date of its occurrence, and the reason for this extra show of interest was apparent in the announcement that Mr. Paderewski was to be the soloist. Brooklyn has learned to rejoice in the work of this orchestra for itself alone, and it has also learned with the rest of the world to find particular fascination in the playing of the great Polish pianist, so that the co-operation of the two was something like a superlative attraction.

Paderewski's part in the concert was the performance with the orchestra of the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor, No. 4, a work of substantial vitality among the standard compositions of its class. This concerto is uncommonly exacting in its call upon the interpretative resourcefulness of the pianist, affording a good opportunity to show what is his stature as a virtuoso. Paderewski's playing was a rare disclosure of the undiminished potency of that peculiarly personal and extraordinary quality of his art, which has taken such a hold of the public. There was a great show of enthusiasm which the pianist acknowledged by coming out twice and bowing to the tribute of appreciation. And there was a still greater demonstration when he came out and took his seat at the piano for an encore. He waited for the hushed stillness necessary for the proper hearing of what was to follow and then gave an exquisite rendering to Schumann's Nachtied.

There could be no doubt of the profound impression upon the audience which was limited only by the capacity of the auditorium, and the effect of the orchestral renderings was hardly less notable. The principal number was Beethoven's Sixth Symphony in F major, the so-called "Pastoral," and the closing piece, following the concerto, was Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody. There was abounding charm in Dr. Muck's interpretation of the symphony, which, of course, is an old favorite. This work is perhaps Beethoven's nearest approach to an exposition of what has come to be called programme music, because of its definite connection with the expression of a given series of incidents. But Mr. Beethoven was wise in his generation. He knew how to write lovely music without expecting to suggest or express more than music should be expected to express. And in view of the vagaries of modern composers in this respect, as for instance, the attempt of Mr. Strauss in his absurd and egotistic Symphonia Domestica, there is renewed pleasure in reverting to Mr. Beethoven's method of indicating tone pictures.

Loving care was manifest in the rendering of the symphony last night, and it afforded great enjoyment. The Spanish rhapsody, given here a week ago by the New York Symphony players, is an admirably characteristic and thoroughly meritorious work of its class, and its rhythmic and melodic charm are ever grateful.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m ...Brooklyn, N. Y.
ress
te DEC 8 1907

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is away on its regular December trip giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, and two in New York, and before its return home it will give a concert in Newark, N. J., for the first time it has ever appeared in that city. In the larger cities the soloist in all the concerts of this trip is Paderewski, who plays with the orchestra every day. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only one in the East with which he appears, although in the West he plays with the Pittsburg, Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras.

rom ...Standard Union, ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate DEC 7 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Carl Muck as conductor, was given last evening at the Baptist Temple, under the combined auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society. The soloist last evening was the incomparable Paderewski, and this fact brought out one of the largest audiences ever gathered in the Temple. The programme included Beethoven's Symphony in F major, No. 6, "Pastoral," op. 68; Rubinstein's Concerto in L minor, No. 4, for piano forte and orchestra, op. 70, and Chabrier's "Espana," Rhapsody for orchestra.

The Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven is one of the most entrancing works of the great master, and was composed in the country round about Herligenstadt in the summer of 1808, and is an impression and recollection of country life, a life Beethoven loved, as is evident by the delightful collection of harmonies expressed in this work. The orchestra last evening did full justice to the work, and was especially effective in the third movement, when, from the jollity of the country folks to the thunderstorm and tempest, a wonderful range of orchestral work was had, which was performed with the most absolute precision. Paderewski appeared as soloist in the Rubinstein Concerto. In this work the opportunities for the pianist are legion, and Paderewski certainly availed himself of every one. There are certainly pianists and great ones, besides the soloist of last evening, but there is something indescribable about Paderewski that makes him far and above all others, and it is evidently his combination of power, mastery and expression that enthralls his auditors and holds them spellbound during all his wonderful playing, and then compels them to break forth into a wildness of applause. So great was the applause last evening he was compelled to appear time after time, and finally oblige with an encore. The concerted work of the orchestra in this number was exceptionally good, and well timed. The concert closed with the Espana Rhapsody of Chabrier. The next concert is on Jan. 10.

NEWS
NEWARK, N.J.
DEC 7- 1907

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium next Monday night will be the occasion of that great organization's first appearance in this city. For twenty years it has ranked as the foremost orchestral body in this country, and it has no superior, if indeed an equal, among those abroad. Its membership comprises the best obtainable musicians for the work entrusted to them, and it has had the benefit of years of training in ensemble work by such fine conductors as William Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur and Dr. Karl Muck, the last of whom was brought from the Berlin Royal Opera to this country last season and is its present musical director. Each has left the imprint of his knowledge and talent on the band, which shows, in its performance, the splendid results of more than a score of years of work under the guidance and inspiration of great authorities. It has acquired a technical finish that is marvelous, and it possesses the ability to enter so fully into the moods of the compositions played that their contents are set forth not only with perfect art on the executive side of the work, but with an affluence of feeling and a tonal coloring that are deeply moving. The entire orchestra, numbering nearly one hundred musicians, will take part in the concert, and because of that fact the performances will be unique in the musical history of Newark.

The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, and in hearing her the audience will hearken to one of the most gifted of the younger pianists before the public to-day. In speaking of a recital given by her in New York last season, E. H. Krehbiel, the learned and reliable critic of the New York Tribune, said: "All the gradations of dynamic utterance, from a whispered to a thundered tone, are at her command. She has mastered the rhythmical as well as the dynamic effects which are the product of intellectual use of keyboard and damper pedal in a degree which must challenge admiration from the greatest of the virtuosi with whom pianoforte lovers are familiar."

* * *

[84]

FADED TEXT

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date DEC 7 1907

PADEREWSKI AND ORCHESTRA

With Paderewski and the Boston Symphony orchestra on one programme it might have been expected that the Baptist Temple, at Schermerhorn street and Third avenue, would be filled to overflowing. It was, last evening, when the second symphony concert was given under Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society auspices. It was a brilliant assemblage of music loving Brooklynites; and not only were all the seats taken, but there was a quadruple row of people standing around the rear and sides of the auditorium.

The chief number for the orchestra alone was the now familiar Beethoven's symphony in F major, No. 6, Opus 68, termed popularly the Pastoral Symphony, a strictly programme-music piece. Since it was first played at Vienna in 1808, a mild musical wrangle has been waged over the question whether it was meant to be ideal, or real; whether every listener should interpret it subjectively, or on the other brand, find in it objective descriptions of nature and a record of Beethoven's impressions. Dr. Muck took the only course possible for a popular conductor, last evening. He read it faithfully, as an interpreter of Beethoven. He gave to it elasticity and a remarkable freedom of expression. Every phrase was carefully considerd and every movement was given with beautiful unity and mass, while the shading was simply delightful. Nowhere was this more notable than in the third movement, where the orchestra, after playing the lively country dance, was hushed, so that the double basses might roll up their thunder, in indicating with striking realism the approach of the coming storm. Then one could hear in the shimmering strings the patter of rain drops and the rush of the wind.

In the last number, where rejoicing breaks forth at the passing of the storm, there was mobility and tone color that approached grandeur. The symphony has never been played here in a more warm, forceful and yet polished manner. Dr. Muck was called out again and again to respond to recalls.

Paderewski was greeted with a storm of applause as his rather pale and expressive face, surrounded by his historic fluffy hair, appeared in the doorway to the stage. He seems to have aged since his last appearance here, but only in appearance, for, when his magical fingers touched the keys in Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, opus 70, for piano and orchestra, it was perceived that his vigorous personality is intact. The piece has three movements, the first being a good example of the compact, concise form of writing, the piano coming in for a development of the secondary theme.

The playing of Paderewski differs from most pianists in such concerted numbers. The work of others is often drowned by the orchestra, but Paderewski is never submerged for an instant. He plays as though he were conducting an orchestra, harmonizing with the other musicians. And, in his long cadenzas, or, in taking the leading motive, as in the second movement, he was truly an orchestra, taking the lead while the other players were mute.

The concerto gives great opportunities to the pianist and nobly did Paderewski meet the requirements. His interpretation was so artistic that it was impossible to determine whether a note, or phrase, was a result of those that had preceded, or a preparation for those to follow. The pianist shook Dr. Muck by the hand at the close and amid the applause.

But Paderewski was not to retire without an encore. He played, as has been his wont at other concerts, "Nachtstuecke," by Schumann, in the poignantly tender way that this artist only can play.

Last on the programme was a number seldom heard here. It was Emmanuel Chabrier's "Espana," a rhapsody, for the orchestra. It is in fact a free fantasy based on original Spanish dance tunes, especially on the "jota," popular in the north of Spain. The skill of the composer was shown in the sounding of the motives, tossing them from one part of the orchestra to another. Those airs are very old and besides the "jota" there were the malaquena and, of course, the fandango. The piece was played here recently and it was noted that last evening Dr. Muck's baton brought out a finer, more delicate effect with the strings than the previous conductor.

It was a dash from beginning to end, full of life and action, and it might have been chosen in order to relieve the so-called heavier classic music that preceded it; but if that was the reason for its presence on the programme, it was not needed in Brooklyn. It is fair to say that a Tschaikowsky or a Schumann or another Beethoven work would have been a more satisfactory close for the many Brooklyn music lovers in the audience. The next Boston Symphony concert will [illegible] on January 10, 1908.

From Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date DEC 7 1907

NEW YORK SYMPHONY WITH TERESA CARRENO

Will Play Here Saturday the Second Concert in Mr. Damrosch's Series.

APOLLO CLUB ON TUESDAY,

With Much Good Music at the Opera Houses and in Concert Halls.

Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the second Saturday matinee concert by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at the Baptist Temple on Saturday (Brooklyn Institute). Her last appearance here was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on March 25, 1899, when she played the concerto for pianoforte, D minor, No. 2, op. 23, MacDowell, as second number in a programme made up of the "Sakuntala" overture, Goldmark; "Bourre-Fantastique," Chabrier, whose "Espana" Rhapsody was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Symphony No. 2, Brahms. At the concert next Saturday Mme. Carreno will be heard in the concerto for piano with orchestra, by Tschaikowsky, the programme as a whole including:

Symphonie Fanastique ..... Berlioz
Concerto for piano, with orchestra..... Tschaikowsky
Little Symphony for wind instruments.. Gounod
March, With Pomp and Circumstance.... Elgar

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
STAR
NEWARK, N. J.
DEC 7- 1907

Boston Symphony Monday.

Monday night brings Newark the most important musical event so far this year—the concert by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, principal conductor of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and with Madame Olga Samaroff as solo pianist, at Krueger's Auditorium. The sale, which has been going on some time, shows that Newark and its tributary towns are eager enough to hear this orchestra, which has the reputation of being the best in America. It is the first time the orchestra has ever given a concert in New Jersey, and on the success of this one will depend its return in future seasons.

Dr. Muck has chosen a program to appeal to those musically educated. The first work on it is a symphonic trilogy by Vincent d'Indy, one of the greatest of living French composers. The composer has drawn his inspiration from Schiller's three great dramatic poems "Wallenstein's Camp," "I Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and third movements of the work bear the same names as the first and last poems, but the second has been called "Max and Thekla" instead of "I Piccolomini."

The other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture to his dead and gone opera, "Genoveva." It is all that remains of the opera, which, hampered by an impossible libretto, was fated to dust gathering shelves.

Madame Olga Samaroff bears the reputation of being one of the most brilliant of the younger pianists. Moreover, she has the particular distinction of being an American woman whose whole career so far has been spent in America. She will play Grieg's concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor. This is one of the few ventures in the larger forms of music in which the late Norwegian composer was successful, and it is likely to remain forever a favorite work in the repertoire of pianists. It has tunefulness and melodiousness, and at the same time it has the brilliancy necessary to display the virtuosity of the artist. The concert will begin at 8 o'clock.

From [illegible]
Address
Date DEC 8- 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Paderewski Again the Soloist—Two New Compositions Heard.

Dr. Muck prepared another one of his various programmes for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. With him it seems never to rain but it pours. He gave two long new compositions, either one of which would have given his audience enough to reflect upon, and would have been welcome conjoined with an older piece, of familiar beauty. But the giving of "novelties" is a thankless task at best, especially in these days of modern technique of composition, when much sweat and toil are required to master and properly present new works. The compositions that were listened to for the first time in New York yesterday were a symphonic poem, "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, Opus 9, and the adagio and scherzo-finale from Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor. The name of Boehe is not familiar here, though this young composer has attracted attention to himself in Germany by his ambitious attempt at a series of symphonic poems on Ulysses and his wanderings. "Taormina" is a very elaborate and ambitious composition, and though it clearly has a "programme" in the composer's mind, he has given no more hint of it than the title, which refers the listener to the Sicilian city and nothing else. There is a Gregorian motive in it, a dirge, a funeral march; at the close bells are heard. The music is of a kind that makes its own appeal as music; and the structure of it follows the lines of musical, rather than of some preconceived literary, development.

Mr. Boehe's chief title to write for orchestra, so far as this piece shows, is that he knows how very well. It is a fine piece of orchestration, full of all sorts of tone coloring and tonal effects. As to the significance of it all, that is another matter. The themes are long and tortuous, with little force or expressiveness in themselves, and they meander at great length, coming to climaxes now and again—fine and sonorous climaxes—when the music starts off in a new direction. But the listener wonders why the climax and why the new direction; for there is little real issue to it all, and, having heard it, he is conscious of a maximum of agreeable sound and a minimum of musical idea of any sort.

The movements from Reznicek's suite are hardly more satisfying. The composer has his ideas rather better in hand, if he has not the same skill in orchestration. His overture to "Donna Diana," which was heard here a week or so ago, is sparkling, light music, dextrously scored. These movements are very serious; but there is much labor in them and little inspiration. The scherzo interests from the cleverness of its structure, the eccentrically rhythmed first theme, and its combination with the others, and some effective points of orchestration. Dr. Muck had concerned himself to gain a complete mastery of both Boehe's and Reznicek's music on the part of the orchestra, and they were played in a way that evidently set forth all there is in them. The last orchestral number of this curiously assorted programme was Chabrier's brilliant Spanish rhapsody, "Espana," which by a curious chance Mr. Damrosch had also anticipated by a couple of weeks.

Mr. Paderewski was again the soloist. He played Rubinstein's D minor concerto, and played in a very different vein from that which he displayed in Beethoven on Thursday evening. Here were all his bravura, all his heroics, all his boisterous energy and thundrous pealing piled up. They were too much; they were beyond the bounds of the beautiful, we are fain to say. Perhaps they served a purpose in giving a setting to his exquisite singing of the slow movement and of the more delicate portions of the first movement. The dewy freshness of that serene melody was never more beautifully expressed, with such perfection of phrase or clearly etched outline.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
ss
DEC 8 - 1907

PADEREWSKI PLAYS AGAIN WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Paderewski again was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. He played the solo part in Rubenstein's D minor piano concerto like the master he is, with the power and grace and flexibility that the old battle horse demands. Again, too, was the no encore rule not observed, for in response to the insistent demand of an audience that taxed the capacity of the hall, he played the Chopin berceuse with beauty and daintiness and charm indescribable.

Dr. Muck and his expert musicians from the Hub presented two compositions new to New York—Ernest Boehe's tone poem, "Taormina" and two movements from Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor. Both works were excellent examples of skilfulness in orchestral construction, and both disclosed many beauties if neither conveyed any important message. As to the playing of the orchestra in these numbers, as well as in association with Paderewski, it may be called superb without a quibble.

From NEW YORK TIMES
Address
Date DEC 8- 1907

TO TRAIN ORCHESTRA ASSISTANTS.

IN order to train American musicians for places in the symphony orchestras and so relieve leaders of these organizations from the necessity of seeking musicians in Europe, the trustees of the Institute of Musical Art have determined to devote, if necessary, $10,000 a year of its endowed income to giving orchestral training at nominal tuition. The only requirement to be made by the institute is that those who are to benefit by this expenditure shall give promise of real musical achievement and earnestness. An examination for admission to these classes, therefore, will be required, and those accepted must take the full course of ear training and harmony and musical theory as well as instruction in the individual instrument. For this complete course of private lessons and lectures, the institute will ask but $50 per year.

The scarcity of American performers of real ability is evidenced, it is pointed out, by the disbanding of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, because of the inability of the leaders to secure enough satisfactory performers in this country. At the same time there is a growing demand for symphony organizations in the larger cities and great difficulty in recruiting performers for new organizations. In Germany, almost every village has its small orchestra, which acts as a feeder to the great symphony societies of the capitals, but in this country, save at the musical centres, the little orchestra is unknown and its place is taken by the village brass band, which does not attempt the classics, and is generally very weak in woodwind and trumpet and horn as played in the symphony concerts. The amateur theatre orchestra is commonly the nearest approach in the small towns to an organization of string and wind instruments. At the same time the number of symphony orchestras is growing. New York now supports seven; Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Pittsburg, and Cleveland have their organizations. Recently Denver has organized a successful orchestra, and its concerts are rapidly becoming the pride of that city, which is giving them excellent support.

To meet this demand for accomplished musicians, the institute has arranged to give instruction in bassoon, clarinet, double bass, flute, horn, oboe, trombone, trumpet, and other wind instruments and percussion instruments. In the stringed instrument department, which, however, is not classed as part of the orchestra course, there is training in violin, viola, violoncello, and harp. A faculty of nine members attends to string instruction, while eight specialists from the leading orchestras give the individual instruction in wood and brass. Among those secured to train performers for the symphony orchestras are: Oboe, Cesare Addimando, New York Symphony; flute, George Barrere, solo flute, Paris Opéra and Société des Instruments à Vent; trumpet, Adolphe Dubois, Théâtre de la Monnaire, Brussels; horn, Hermand Hand, New York Symphony; clarinet, Henry Leon Leroy, premier prix, Paris Conservatory; bassoon, Auguste Mesnard, Lamoureux Concerts; timpani, J. Fred Sietz; trombone, Sam Tilkin, and others. In addition, the orchestral students will receive instruction in theory under Percy Goetschius, Forrest J. Cressman, and Daniel G. Mason, and in ear training under the supervision of Dr. Frank Damrosch, Director of the Institute. The student in the course, on payment of the nominal fees, will receive private lessons in one instrument, and the general instruction and practice in ensemble playing. The string classes, for which somewhat higher fees are charged, though these, too, are given far below actual cost, are under the tuition of Frank Kneisel, Louis Svencenski, William Willeke, Edouard Dethier, Mark Fonaroff, Carlos Hasselbrink, Ludwig Manoly, and Julius Roentgen. Under these men the institute believes, because of the low fees asked and because of its ability to apply a guaranteed income from the James Loeb endowment, the Betty Loeb Musical Fund, and subscriptions, that it will be able, eventually, to supply performers to fill vacancies in existing orchestras and to supply the nucleus of the new organizations.

The orchestra field, it is believed by the trustees, will afford an excellent means of livelihood to many young men of musical ability who are not fitted for business life, and yet would hesitate to undertake the risks of an ordinary musical career. The symphony orchestras, unlike many other musical activities, afford practically permanent and well-paid employment to their members. It takes years to develop such an orchestra and bring it up to perfection, and the leader, if he is to keep competent men for his major Winter concerts, must now guarantee them practically regular salaries for all but six weeks of the entire year. The great organizations, in between their metropolitan concerts and after the season, now make extensive national tours and secure Summer engagements simply to keep their men under constant rehearsal for the Winter season.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)
Address Dec 9, 1907
Date
Established

Listening to the Boston Symphony and the Opera.

"TAORMINIA," a tone poem by Ernest Boehe, was given its first New York hearing on Saturday, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was easily within the comprehension of all.

The piece de resistance was Rubinstein's concerto in D minor for orchestra and piano. It is like mixing wine and milk to combine a pale piano with a rich orchestra. But it was very good wine and excellent milk.

The concerto received full justice at the hands of these two really great persons—Dr. Karl Muck and Paderewski. It was wonderful playing.

Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody España was the last act.

At the Manhattan "The Tales of Hoffmann," with the familiar cast, were heard at the matinee, with "La Gioconda," with Mme. Russ and Mr. Zenatello in the evening. Campanini, the unfailing, conducted at both performances.

Newark Star - Dec 7

Paderewski Sale Heavy.

That the recital to be given by Paderewski in the Krueger Auditorium, December 17, will be largely attended is practically assured. The number of orders for seats by mail for this concert have been far in excess to that of any previous concert. The public sale of seats will open at Lauter's, 657-659 Broad street, next Thursday morning, December 12. The program arranged for his recital here is one of his best, and will appeal to all [illegible] of it.

[85]

FADED TEXT

From Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Address
Date DEC 7 1907

PADEREWSKI AND ORCHESTRA.

With Paderewski and the Boston Symphony orchestra on one programme it might have been expected that the Baptist Temple, at Schermerhorn street and Third avenue, would be filled to overflowing. It was, last evening, when the second symphony concert was given under Institute and Brooklyn Philharmonic Society auspices. It was a brilliant assemblage of music loving Brooklynites; and not only were all the seats taken, but there was a quadruple row of people standing around the rear and sides of the auditorium.

The chief number for the orchestra alone was the now familiar Beethoven's symphony in F major, No. 6, Opus 68, termed popularly the Pastoral Symphony, a strictly programme-music piece. Since it was first played at Vienna in 1808, a mild musical wrangle has been waged over the question whether it was meant to be ideal, or real; whether every listener should interpret it subjectively, or on the other brand, find in it objective descriptions of nature and a record of Beethoven's impressions. Dr. Muck took the only course possible for a popular conductor, last evening. He read it faithfully, as an interpreter of Beethoven. He gave to it elasticity and a remarkable freedom of expression. Every phrase was carefully considerd and every movement was given with beautiful unity and mass, while the shading was simply delightful. Nowhere was this more notable than in the third movement, where the orchestra, after playing the lively country dance, was hushed, so that the double basses might roll up their thunder, in indicating with striking realism the approach of the coming storm. Then one could hear in the shimmering strings the patter of rain drops and the rush of the wind.

In the last number, where rejoicing breaks forth at the passing of the storm, there was mobility and tone color that approached grandeur. The symphony has never been played here in a more warm, forceful and yet polished manner. Dr. Muck was called out again and again to respond to recalls.

Paderewski was greeted with a storm of applause as his rather pale and expressive face, surrounded by his historic fluffy hair, appeared in the doorway to the stage. He seems to have aged since his last appearance here, but only in appearance, for, when his magical fingers touched the keys in Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, opus 70, for piano and orchestra, it was perceived that his vigorous personality is intact. The piece has three movements, the first being a good example of the compact, concise form of writing, the piano coming in for a development of the secondary theme.

The playing of Paderewski differs from most pianists in such concerted numbers. The work of others is often drowned by the orchestra, but Paderewski is never submerged for an instant. He plays as though he were conducting an orchestra, harmonizing with the other musicians. And, in his long cadenzas, or, in taking the leading motive, as in the second movement, he was truly an orchestra, taking the lead while the other players were mute.

The concerto gives great opportunities to the pianist and nobly did Paderewski meet the requirements. His interpretation was so artistic that it was impossible to determine whether a note, or phrase, was a result of those that had preceded, or a preparation for those to follow. The pianist shook Dr. Muck by the hand at the close and amid the applause.

But Paderewski was not to retire without an encore. He played, as has been his wont at other concerts, "Nachtstuecke," by Schumann, in the poignantly tender way that this artist only can play.

Last on the programme was a number seldom heard here. It was Emmanuel Chabrier's "Espana," a rhapsody, for the orchestra. It is in fact a free fantasy based on original Spanish dance tunes, especially on the "jota," popular in the north of Spain. The skill of the composer was shown in the sounding of the motives, tossing them from one part of the orchestra to another. These airs are very old and besides the "jota" there were the malaquena and, of course, the fandango. The piece was played here recently and it was noted that last evening Dr. Muck's baton brought out a finer, more delicate effect with the strings than the previous conductor.

It was a dash from beginning to end, full of life and action, and it might have been chosen in order to relieve the so-called heavier classic music that preceded it; but if that was the reason for its presence on the programme, it was not needed in Brooklyn. It is fair to say that a Tschaikowsky or a Schumann or another Beethoven work would have been a more satisfactory close for the many Brooklyn music lovers in the audience. The next Boston Symphony concert will take place on January 10, 1908.

Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 7 1907

NEW YORK SYMPHONY WITH TERESA CARRENO

Will Play Here Saturday the Second Concert in Mr. Damrosch's Series.

APOLLO CLUB ON TUESDAY,

With Much Good Music at the Opera Houses and in Concert Halls.

Mme. Teresa Carreno will be the soloist at the second Saturday matinee concert by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at the Baptist Temple on Saturday (Brooklyn Institute). Her last appearance here was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on March 25, 1899, when she played the concerto for pianoforte, D minor, No. 2, op. 23, MacDowell, as second number in a programme made up of the "Sakuntala" overture, Goldmark; "Bourre-Fantastique," Chabrier, whose "Espana" Rhapsody was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Symphony No. 2, Brahms. At the concert next Saturday Mme. Carreno will be heard in the concerto for piano with orchestra, by Tschaikowsky, the programme as a whole including:

Symphonie Fanastique .....Berlioz
Concerto for piano, with orchestra.....Tschaikowsky
Little Symphony for wind instruments..Gounod
March, With Pomp and Circumstance....Elgar

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
STAR
NEWARK N.J.
DEC 7 1907

Boston Symphony Monday.

Monday night brings Newark the most important musical event so far this year—the concert by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, principal conductor of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and with Madame Olga Samaroff as solo pianist, at Krueger's Auditorium. The sale, which has been going on some time, shows that Newark and its tributary towns are eager enough to hear this orchestra, which has the reputation of being the best in America. It is the first time the orchestra has ever given a concert in New Jersey, and on the success of this one will depend its return in future seasons.

Dr. Muck has chosen a program to appeal to those musically educated. The first work on it is a symphonic trilogy by Vincent d'Indy, one of the greatest of living French composers. The composer has drawn his inspiration from Schiller's three great dramatic poems "Wallenstein's Camp," "I Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and third movements of the work bear the same names as the first and last poems, but the second has been called "Max and Thekla" instead of "I Piccolomini."

The other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture to his dead and gone opera, "Genoveva." It is all that remains of the opera, which, hampered by an impossible libretto, was fated to dust gathering shelves.

Madame Olga Samaroff bears the reputation of being one of the most brilliant of the younger pianists. Moreover, she has the particular distinction of being an American woman whose whole career so far has been spent in America. She will play Grieg's concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor. This is one of the few ventures in the larger forms of music in which the late Norwegian composer was successful, and it is likely to remain forever a favorite work in the repertoire of pianists. It has tunefulness and melodiousness, and at the same time it has the brilliancy necessary to display the virtuosity of the artist. The concert will begin at 8 o'clock.

From NEW YORK TIMES
Address
Date DEC 8- 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Paderewski Again the Soloist—Two New Compositions Heard.

Dr. Muck prepared another one of his curious programmes for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. With him it seems never to rain but it pours. He gave two long new compositions, either one of which would have given his audience enough to reflect upon, and would have been welcome conjoined with an older piece, of familiar beauty. But the giving of "novelties" is a thankless task at best, especially in these days of modern technique of composition, when much sweat and toil are required to master and properly present new works. The compositions that were listened to for the first time in New York yesterday were a symphonic poem, "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, Opus 9, and the adagio and scherzo-finale from Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor. The name of Boehe is not familiar here, though this young composer has attracted attention to himself in Germany by his ambitious attempt at a series of symphonic poems on Ulysses and his wanderings. "Taormina" is a very elaborate and ambitious composition, and though it clearly has a "programme" in the composer's mind, he has given no more hint of it than the title, which refers the listener to the Sicilian city and nothing else. There is a Gregorian motive in it, a dirge, a funeral march; at the close bells are heard. The music is of a kind that makes its own appeal as music; and the structure of it follows the lines of musical, rather than of some preconceived literary, development.

Mr. Boehe's chief title to write for orchestra, so far as this piece shows, is that he knows how very well. It is a fine piece of orchestration, full of all sorts of tone coloring and tonal effects. As to the significance of it all, that is another matter. The themes are long and tortuous, with little force or expressiveness in themselves, and they meander at great length, coming to climaxes now and again—fine and sonorous climaxes—when the music starts off in a new direction. But the listener wonders why the climax and why the new direction; for there is little real issue to it all, and, having heard it, he is conscious of a maximum of agreeable sound and a minimum of musical idea of any sort.

The movements from Reznicek's suite are hardly more satisfying. The composer has his ideas rather better in hand, if he has not the same skill in orchestration. His overture to "Donna Diana," which was heard here a week or so ago, is sparkling, light music, dextrously scored. These movements are very serious; but there is much labor in them and little inspiration. The scherzo interests from the cleverness of its structure, the eccentrically rhythmed first theme, and its combination with the others, and some effective points of orchestration. Dr. Muck had concerned himself to gain a complete mastery of both Boehe's and Reznicek's music on the part of the orchestra, and they were played in a way that evidently set forth all there is in them. The last orchestral number of this curiously assorted programme was Chabrier's brilliant Spanish rhapsody, "España," which by a curious chance Mr. Damrosch had also anticipated by a couple of weeks.

Mr. Paderewski was again the soloist. He played Rubinstein's D minor concerto, and played in a very different vein from that which he displayed in Beethoven on Thursday evening. Here were all his bravura, all his heroics, all his boisterous energy and thundrous pealing piled up. They were too much; they were beyond the bounds of the beautiful, we are fain to say. Perhaps they served a purpose in giving a setting to his exquisite singing of the slow movement and of the more delicate portions of the first movement. The dewy freshness of that serene melody was never more beautifully expressed, with such perfection of phrase or clearly etched outline.

N. Y. EV'G WORLD
ss
DEC 7 - 1907

PADEREWSKI PLAYS AGAIN WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Paderewski again was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. He played the solo part in Rubenstein's D minor piano concerto like the master he is, with the power and grace and flexibility that the old battle horse demands. Again, too, was the no encore rule not observed, for in response to the insistent demand of an audience that taxed the capacity of the hall, he played the Chopin berceuse with beauty and daintiness and charm indescribable.

Dr. Muck and his expert musicians from the Hub presented two compositions new to New York—Ernest Boehe's tone poem, "Taormina" and two movements from Rezineck's symphonic suite in E minor. Both works were excellent examples of skilfulness in orchestral construction, and both disclosed many beauties if neither conveyed any important message. As to the playing of the orchestra in these numbers, as well as in association with Paderewski, it may be called superb without a quibble.

From NEW YORK TIMES
Address
Date DEC 8- 1907

TO TRAIN ORCHESTRA ASSISTANTS.

IN order to train American musicians for places in the symphony orchestras and so relieve leaders of these organizations from the necessity of seeking musicians in Europe, the trustees of the Institute of Musical Art have determined to devote, if necessary, $10,000 a year of its endowed income to giving orchestral training at nominal tuition. The only requirement to be made by the institute is that those who are to benefit by this expenditure shall give promise of real musical achievement and earnestness. An examination for admission to these classes, therefore, will be required, and those accepted must take the full course of ear training and harmony and musical theory as well as instruction in the individual instrument. For this complete course of private lessons and lectures, the institute will ask but $50 per year.

The scarcity of American performers of real ability is evidenced, it is pointed out, by the disbanding of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, because of the inability of the leaders to secure enough satisfactory performers in this country. At the same time there is a growing demand for symphony organizations in the larger cities and great difficulty in recruiting performers for new organizations. In Germany, almost every village has its small orchestra, which acts as a feeder to the great symphony societies of the capitals, but in this country, save at the musical centres, the little orchestra is unknown and its place is taken by the village brass band, which does not attempt the classics, and is generally very weak in woodwind and trumpet and horn as played in the symphony concerts. The amateur theatre orchestra is commonly the nearest approach in the small towns to an organization of string and wind instruments. At the same time the number of symphony orchestras is growing. New York now supports seven; Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Pittsburg, and Cleveland have their organizations. Recently Denver has organized a successful orchestra, and its concerts are rapidly becoming the pride of that city, which is giving them excellent support.

To meet this demand for accomplished musicians, the institute has arranged to give instruction in bassoon, clarinet, double bass, flute, horn, oboe, trombone, trumpet, and other wind instruments and percussion instruments. In the stringed instrument department, which, however, is not classed as part of the orchestra course, there is training in violin, viola, violoncello, and harp. A faculty of nine members attends to string instruction, while eight specialists from the leading orchestras give the individual instruction in wood and brass. Among those secured to train performers for the symphony orchestras are: Oboe, Cesare Addimando, New York Symphony; flute, George Barrere, solo flute, Paris Opéra and Société des Instruments à Vent; trumpet, Adolphe Dubois, Théâtre de la Monnaire, Brussels; horn, Hermand Hand, New York Symphony; clarinet, Henry Leon Leroy, premier prix, Paris Conservatory; bassoon, Auguste Mesnard, Lamoureux Concerts; timpani, J. Fred Sietz; trombone, Sam Tilkin, and others. In addition, the orchestral students will receive instruction in theory under Percy Goetschius, Forrest J. Cressman, and Daniel G. Mason, and in ear training under the supervision of Dr. Frank Damrosch, Director of the Institute. The student in the course, on payment of the nominal fees, will receive private lessons in one instrument, and the general instruction and practice in ensemble playing. The string classes, for which somewhat higher fees are charged, though these, too, are given far below actual cost, are under the tuition of Frank Kneisel, Louis Svencenski, William Willeke, Edouard Dethier, Mark Fonaroff, Carlos Hasselbrink, Ludwig Manoly, and Julius Roentgen. Under these men the institute believes, because of the low fees asked and because of its ability to apply a guaranteed income from the James Loeb endowment, the Betty Loeb Musical Fund, and subscriptions, that it will be able, eventually, to supply performers to fill vacancies in existing orchestras and to supply the nucleus of the new organizations.

The orchestra field, it is believed by the trustees, will afford an excellent means of livelihood to many young men of musical ability who are not fitted for business life, and yet would hesitate to undertake the risks of an ordinary musical career. The symphony orchestras, unlike many other musical activities, afford practically permanent and well-paid employment to their members. It takes years to develop such an orchestra and bring it up to perfection, and the leader, if he is to keep competent men for his major Winter concerts, must now guarantee them practically regular salaries for all but six weeks of the entire year. The great organizations, in between their metropolitan concerts and after the season, now make extensive national tours and secure Summer engagements simply to keep their men under constant rehearsal for the Winter season.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM

(See other side.)
Address Dec 9, 1907
Date

Established

Listening to the Boston Symphony and the Opera.

"TAORMINIA," a tone poem by Ernest Boehe, was given its first New York hearing on Saturday, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was easily within the comprehension of all.

The piece de resistance was Rubinstein's concerto in D minor for orchestra and piano. It is like mixing wine and milk to combine a pale piano with a rich orchestra. But it was very good wine and excellent milk.

The concerto received full justice at the hands of these two really great persons—Dr. Karl Muck and Paderewski. It was wonderful playing.

Chabrier's brilliant rhapsody España was the last act.

At the Manhattan "The Tales of Hoffmann," with the familiar cast, were heard at the matinee, with "La Gioconda," with Mme. Russ and Mr. Zenatello in the evening. Campanini, the uplifting, conducted at both performances.

Newark Star - Dec 7

Paderewski Sale Heavy.

That the recital to be given by Paderewski in the Krueger Auditorium, December 17, will be largely attended is practically assured. The number of orders for seats by mail for this concert have been far in excess to that of any previous concert. The public sale of seats will open at Lauter's, 657-659 Broad street, next Thursday morning, December 12. The program arranged for his recital here is one of his best and will appeal to all lovers of [illegible] music.

[85]

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
DEC 8- 1907

CHATTERING SCHOOLGIRLS REBUKED BY PADEREWSKI

Pianist Glares at Maids Who Gabble When He Plays.

ODD SCENE IN CARNEGIE HALL

Rubinstein Concerto Falls of Usual Effect—Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Novelties.

Playing once more in the blaze of electric lights at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Ignaz Paderewski added nothing to his reputation as a musician, though he held a vast audience spellbound by force of personality. His performance of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, admirable in conception, was far from beautiful in the hearing, for the simple reason that the pianist did not produce a resonant tone when he struck hard. And instead of tempering his attack to meet this difficulty, he struck out still more furiously, which, of course, did not help things.

Maybe the noise of whispering girls in the first row of the orchestra augmented his anger. He glared at them once, twice, and finally said something that was not heard. Visions of De Pachmann! Every eye in the house was turned on the unfortunate damsels, schoolgirls from up the Hudson, perhaps. After that they behaved. But before the Rubinstein concerto had closed the Paderewski management had dispatched one of its sleuths to the front of the house to investigate the cause of the Pole's peevishness. The sleuth, who proved to be an innocent usher, beat a retreat soon after ascertaining that order in the front row had been restored.

In the slow movement of the concerto Paderewski was heard to best advantage, for he played it softly. He gave a somewhat gushing interpretation, but perhaps that was appropriate. The music itself is sentimental to the point of mawkishness. In the last movement Paderewski sent temperamental sparks in all directions. A pity, though, that his picturesque efforts were not translated into pleasurable sounds. The audience felt the magnetism of the man and applauded hard. In response he gave Chopin's Berceuse as an encore, once more transgressing long-established rules and giving the musicians of the orchestra anxious moments lest they lose their train.

To descend from Paderewskian heights to the level of mere orchestral playing, Dr. Muck presented music new to New York. Though not of epoch-making importance, it certainly was worth hearing. It consisted of a tone poem, "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, and the adagio and scherzo finale from Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor.

Boehe's opus 9, written when the composer was only 26 years old, is named after a Sicilian town, famous for its beauty and its picturesque history. The composer has written no explanatory programme. The score bears merely a picture of Taormina, and that, indeed, suggests the character of the music. The tone-poem seeks to bring into tonal life impressions of atmosphere, of scenic beauty and of such moods as might be aroused by the contemplation of things associated with subtle suggestions of past ages.

That "Taormina" bears witness of unusual gifts, of musical talent nothing less than precocious, cannot be gainsaid. Utilizing an enormous body of players, Boehe, after the manner of the most modern composers of Germany, handles his material with surprising ease, and with results that in general are delicious to the ear. His instrumentation is rich and sonorous, his contrapuntal workmanship brilliant.

Throughout, too, the music sweeps along with the spirit and energy of genuine enthusiasm. But the composer's ideas are hardly strong enough to carry the full weight of his work. There is reiteration of melodic exuberances. What at first makes an impression gradually loses in effect. The opening melody is of rare beauty, but it is not Boehe's. It is the tune of the ancient hymn, "Ave, Maris Stella." The other thematic material shows no particular originality.

Of the two movements from Reznicek's suite a composition that dates back more than twenty years to a time when the author had just passed into manhood, the scherzo left the stronger impression. There is no attempt at poetic delineation here; merely a clever application of musical skill. Exceedingly brilliant is the workmanship displayed, particularly on the rhythmical side. But the result seems more a feat in intertwining and combining themes rhythmically at war with one another than a spontaneous expression of inspiration. The performance of the orchestra under Muck was extraordinary. Indeed, the Reznicek's scherzo was welcome more for the opportunity it gave for the display of the conductor's and orchestra's virtuosity than for its intrinsic quality. A word also is due to the accompaniment of the orchestra in the Rubinstein concerto. It was remarkably fine. The concert closed with Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

The concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra in the evening also brought a novelty in the shape of a piano concerto by Lizpunouw, which Josef Hofmann presented with the assistance of Walter Damrosch and his men. But in listening to this concerto played without stop, in the manner of Liszt, one could not help wondering what feeling, save friendship for the composer, could have prompted the pianist to put it in his repertory. A weak imitation of Liszt, with an infusion of Russian melody, it is not only insignificant musically, but thankless from a pianist's point of view. Of course, Hofmann played it superbly. But there was more opportunity for revealing his art to advantage in a group of solo pieces afterward. Liszt's "Funerailles" is not one of the composer's most inspired creations, but in it Hofmann gave a wonderful exhibition of the power and strength of his left hand. In marked contrast to Paderewski, he never forced the tone of his instrument. Tremendous torrents of sound he awakened, but never noise. In Liszt's "Lorelei" the pianist showed his limitations. Sentimental music is not in his line. In the same composer's "Gnomenreigen" he again was at his best. The programme opened with Schubert's symphony in C major and closed with Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture. After the concerto Damrosch and his orchestra gave a delightful performance of a de[light]ful work, Hugo Wolf's "Italian Ser[enade]."

From N. Y. [illegible]
Address
Date DEC 8- 1907

TWO SYMPHONIC CONCERTS

Rubinstein's piano concerto is not often called upon to stand as the nearest representative of the musical classics, but it occupied that position yesterday in the scheme prepared by Dr. Muck for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee. Not only in seniority but in its devotion to older ideals did the familiar Rubinstein piece live up to the task designed for it by the programme maker, for the three other composers drawn upon were men using the richer musical vocabulary of to-day without having any very considerable ideas to disclose therewith. Chabrier, indeed, whose well known rhapsody, "España," had already had a hearing this season before its performance yesterday by the Boston men, was not only a master of orchestral color, but a composer of distinctive character and expression. But both Ernest Boehe in his tone poem, "Taormina," and Emil von Reznicek, in the adagio and scherzo from his E minor suite, gave evidence not only of belonging to the post-Wagner school, but of having been haunted too insistently by memories of "Parsifal" and "Tristan" respectively. Putting aside for the moment, however, this trio of modern compositions, it was doubtless not the excellent Rubinstein concerto so much as the fact that Mr. Paderewski was to play it that helped to swell the audience to a number beyond the seating capacity of Carnegie Hall. The Polish pianist has been heard here when he gave deeper and more general pleasure than he did yesterday, but he received the ovations with which his public appearances are always accompanied, and the demonstrations continued until he added as an extra piece the Chopin berceuse. The contrast between his playing in the concerto and in the solo number illustrated once again why his audiences would in general prefer to hear Mr. Paderewski in recital rather than with orchestra. The musician's own rare personality shone through every bar of the tender little Chopin cradle song, while in the concerto, the slow movement was the only one that did not seem a rather reluctant medium for the transmission of Mr. Paderewski's best powers. Here, truly, there was refined and lovely color, vitalized and attuned to expressive beauty, to which both composer and pianist contributed. But in the first movement there was forcing of the tone, and in the final allegro some of the melodic contours were of perhaps too sharp an outline. There were not lacking, of course, the pianist's unfailing distinction and brilliancy of style, his bold and vigorous climaxes and the other admirable qualities of his playing, which are too familiar to be dwelt upon. Dr. Muck and the orchestra provided a most artistic accompaniment for the Rubinstein work.

The Boehe tone poem and the symphonic suite by von Reznicek were both new to this city. Ernest Boehe is a young Munich composer, and his "Taormina," with its sumptuous scoring and subdued chiming of deep voiced bells, may be taken as the reflex upon a Northern temperament of the clear deep skies and smiling shores of Sicily. German art for four hundred years past has intermittently refreshed and clarified itself through the pilgrimages of its creative workers to the Mediterranean, and the stimulus has lost little of its potency to-day. In Boehe's case it has helped to produce a tone poem full of lovely color and not devoid of originality, notwithstanding the "Parsifal" reminiscences before mentioned and the overworking of certain rhythmic figures. The composer ought to be heard from again, as this tone poem is only his Opus 9, and his years have not yet reached thirty. Von Reznicek's adagio and scherzo were written twenty years ago, when that composer was even younger than Boehe, but they hint plainly at the clarity of thought and skill of treatment noted by Continental critics in his later opera, "Donna Diana," and in his several large orchestral works. The Boston orchestra's presentation of this modern music was all that could be asked.

[illegible] spread on the morn
NEWS
NEWARK, N. J.
DEC 9- 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO-NIGHT

The Great Organization to Give a Concert in Krueger Auditorium.

The finest orchestral concert in the musical history of Newark will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium to-night. The great organization, which has no superior in the world and is the foremost in this country, will make its first appearance here on this occasion, and should be greeted, as it is wherever it plays, by an audience limited only by the capacity of the hall. Its performances under Conductor Karl Muck will set a standard here by which all future orchestral efforts must be measured. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, a talented pianist, who in herself should be a potent attraction. Every seat in the house is good vantage ground from which to hear the concert, and plenty of good seats can be had up to 6 o'clock this evening at the Lauter Company's music warerooms, and after that hour at the boxoffice in Krueger's Auditorium.

[86]

From NEW YORK SU[illegible]
Address
Date DEC 8- 1907

ONE MORE IDYL OF SICILY

TAORMINA EMBODIED IN ERNST BOCHE'S MUSIC.

Mr. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Draw People to Hear a Long Winded Tone Poem—Rubinstein's D Minor Concerto Sounds Very Good to Them After Mr. Boche Gets Through.

Taormina, a town on the east coast of Sicily, on a lofty rock 900 feet above the sea, thirty-five miles southwest of Messina by rail. Has numerous relics of antiquity, including an aqueduct, tessellated pavements and the remains of a theatre, regarded as one of the finest ruins in Sicily. Has a view of remarkable beauty. Population, 2,390. Thus the salient facts recorded in Chambers's Encyclopedia.

Whether it was the lofty rock 900 feet above the sea, the tessellated pavements or the thirty-five miles by rail from Messina that moved the spirit of Ernst Boehe to consider the availability of this town as a subject for musical embodiment it is enough to note that out of it he has made a tone poem for orchestra, opus 9, and that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the guidance of Dr. Karl Muck, did collectively and severally make known this composition at a matinée concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Paderewski was the solo performer, and perhaps it was nothing less than a piece of cunning on the part of Dr. Muck to put "Taormina" on the programme with him and thus make sure that it would have an audience. The official programme book records that this work was first performed in Essen, and "since then it has been played in other cities, as in Munich and Glasgow." To this striking combination must now be added Boston and New York.

The official expositor also tells us that some have found in Boehe's music an attempt to suggest "the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies and amid surroundings in which the beauties of nature vie in interest with the remains and recollections of the great past of an enchanting country." This is a captivating suggestion and leads to splendid inspirations, for following the path pointed out by Mr. Boehe rising composers of the Bostonese school may now set about the composition of Philadelphia and Allaire, N. J.

One thing was made plain by the performance, and that was that the translation into music of glorious views, vistas of the past, ruined theatres, and nature, vieing with history, not to speak of the population of 2,390, requires a deal of apparatus. The score calls for four flutes, three oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, contra bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, bass trumpet, three trombones, bass tuba, three kettledrums, bass drum, deep side drum, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, glockenspiel, tamtam, the usual array of bowed instruments, two harps and four deep toned bells.

Among all these forces something surely should be done with the representation of the engaging features of Taormina, even the aqueduct or the tessellated pavements with their bricks of gold. The programme writer declares that on the score there is a picture of the town and that the composer has given no other key to his music. If you have seen Taormina you can identify the features of the composition for yourself, even to the appearance of the population. If you have not seen it you can identify things to suit yourself, just the same, and doubtless with much less trouble.

At any rate Mr. Boehe's music meanders along through a considerable number of measures, modulating with much frequency and exhibiting here and there the simulacrum of a theme, until a chaste and enlightening tutti brings us to an end of the modulating and the four deep toned bells in D flat, A flat, B flat and G flat give an excellent imitation of a church spire announcing the hour of evening thanksgiving. Whereupon we bless heaven that it is all over and get ready for the next number on the programme.

Yesterday this was the adagio and finale of Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor. This was another resolutely wrought piece of music, which uttered no clarion call to recognition from the throne of fame. Music made with honest intent and with industrious effort, it interested merely by its disclosure of a certain skill in craftsmanship.

Mr. Paderewski's number was Rubinstein's D minor concerto, which may not be an immortal work but is at least musical music, filled with grace, and wearing at least an outward front of pleasing character. The famous pianist who wrote it would doubtless have found pleasure in listening to the performance of the equally famous pianist who played it yesterday. Mr. Paderewski's art is quite within its happiest sphere in such a work as this and he delivered himself of its measures, both those which caused the piano to thunder from end to end and those which sought for its gentler accents, eloquently and with deep appreciation.

Only in that caressing and velvety quality of tone which used to be one of the most enchanting traits of this artist's playing was the performance deficient. The concert came to a close with Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody. Dr. Muck and his players discharged [illegible] and the

[illegible] AMERICA
[illegible]ress
[illegible] DEC 5- 1907

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Concert Will Long Be Remembered by Musical Public.

The Program.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening will long be remembered by the musical public. It was an event in Baltimore's musical history. The following was the program:

Boehe—
"Taormina," tone poem, Op. 9.
First time in Baltimore.

Reznicek—
Adagio and Scherzo-finale from Symphonic Suite in E Minor and full orchestra.
First time in Baltimore.

Beethoven—
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non' troppo.

Schumann—
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.

The program naturally divided itself into three parts. First, the two very modern numbers by Bache and Reznicek; second, the Beethoven Emperor piano concerto, and, third, the Schumann overture. Even the order and arrangement of the program was edifying and educational. The two new, modern numbers were given, while the listeners were free to consider them in a fresh and unwearied condition; and the listeners gained from the two novelties all that could be gained at a single hearing. The first was an excellent sample of modern orchestration with unusual scoring for four flutes, three oboes and English horn, three clarinets and bass clarinet, three bassoons and double bassoon, three trumpets and bass trumpet, with all the extra modern instruments. The rich coloring produced by all these instruments would have been beyond the imagination of composers a hundred years ago.

The Beethoven piano-concerto was the great feature of the evening. It was played by the greatest of all pianists, by an orchestra unsurpassed in the whole world, directed by a conductor who stands unequalled.

In playing this concerto Paderewski left himself entirely aside. He played the work as faithfully, according to the great master's own ideal, as if Beethoven himself had been present, and he had been a piano pupil of the master, Beethoven. Between the soloist, the director and the orchestra there was the most absolute impression of the fullest comradeship, without even a suspicion of domination, and hence the art triumph was complete.

Paderewski broke the rule as to encores by responding and playing a Mendelssohn "Song Without Words," which gratified the enthusiastic admirers of the soloist.

[illegible]m CAL[illegible] dress NEWARK, N. J.
te DEC 8- 19[illegible]

To-morrow night brings the most important musical event that Newark has had in many years, a concert by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, principal conductor of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and with Madame Olga Samaroff as solo pianist. It is the first time the orchestra has ever given a concert in New Jersey, and on the success of this one will depend its return in future seasons.

Dr. Muck has chosen his program for the concert with great care, and it may be set down as a model one of its kind. The first work on it, and the work of largest dimensions, is a symphonic trilogy by Vincent d'Indy, who is known as the greatest of living French composers. The composer has drawn his inspiration from Schiller's three great dramatic poems, "Wallenstein's Camp," "The Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and third movements of the work bear the same names as the first and last poems, but the second has been called "Max and Thekla" instead of "I Piccolomini."

The other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture to his dead and gone opera "Venoveva." It is all that remains of the opera, and is a striking illustration of the survival of the fittest. Hampered by an impossible libretto, Schumann's opera was fated to dust-gathering shelves, but the beautiful and lovely overture will always remain as one of the best specimens of its kind.

Madame Olga Samaroff, who will tomorrow night make her debut in Newark, is one of the most brilliant of the younger pianists. Moreover, she has the particular distinction of being an American woman whose whole career so far has been spent in America, and she is a living contradiction of the hackneyed saying that no artist can succeed in this country without an Old-World reputation. She will play Grieg's Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor. This is one of the few ventures in the larger forms of music in which the Norwegian composer was successful, and it is likely to remain forever a favorite work in the repertoire of pianists. It has tunefulness and melodiousness, and at the same time it has the brilliancy necessary to display the virtuosity of the artist.

The concert will begin at 8 o'clock.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
DEC 8 1907

CHATTERING SCHOOLGIRLS REBUKED BY PADEREWSKI

Pianist Glares at Maids Who Gabble When He Plays.

ODD SCENE IN CARNEGIE HALL

Rubinstein Concerto Fails of Usual Effect—Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents Novelties.

Playing once more in the blaze of electric lights at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Ignaz Paderewski added nothing to his reputation as a musician, though he held a vast audience spellbound by force of personality. His performance of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4, admirable in conception, was far from beautiful in the hearing, for the simple reason that the pianist did not produce a resonant tone when he struck hard. And instead of tempering his attack to meet this difficulty, he struck out still more furiously, which, of course, did not help things.

Maybe the noise of whispering girls in the first row of the orchestra augmented his anger. He glared at them once, twice, and finally said something that was not heard. Visions of De Pachmann! Every eye in the house was turned on the unfortunate damsels, schoolgirls from up the Hudson, perhaps. After that they behaved. But before the Rubinstein concerto had closed the Paderewski management had dispatched one of its sleuths to the front of the house to investigate the cause of the Pole's peevishness. The sleuth, who proved to be an innocent usher, beat a retreat soon after ascertaining that order in the front row had been restored.

In the slow movement of the concerto Paderewski was heard to best advantage, for he played it softly. He gave a somewhat gushing interpretation, but perhaps that was appropriate. The music itself is sentimental to the point of mawkishness. In the last movement Paderewski sent temperamental sparks in all directions. A pity, though, that his picturesque efforts were not translated into pleasurable sounds. The audience felt the magnetism of the man and applauded hard. In response he gave Chopin's Berceuse as an encore, once more transgressing long-established rules and giving the musicians of the orchestra anxious moments lest they lose their train.

To descend from Paderewskian heights to the level of mere orchestral playing, Dr. Muck presented music new to New York. Though not of epoch-making importance, it certainly was worth hearing. It consisted of a tone poem, "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, and the adagio and scherzo finale from Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor.

Boehe's opus 9, written when the composer was only 26 years old, is named after a Sicilian town, famous for its beauty and its picturesque history. The composer has written no explanatory programme. The score bears merely a picture of Taormina, and that, indeed, suggests the character of the music. The tone-poem seeks to bring into tonal life impressions of atmosphere, of scenic beauty and of such moods as might be aroused by the contemplation of things associated with subtle suggestions of past ages.

That "Taormina" bears witness of unusual gifts, of musical talent nothing less than precocious, cannot be gainsaid. Utilizing an enormous body of players, Boehe, after the manner of the most modern composers of Germany, handles his material with surprising ease, and with results that in general are delicious to the ear. His instrumentation is rich and sonorous, his contrapuntal workmanship brilliant.

Throughout, too, the music sweeps along with the spirit and energy of genuine enthusiasm. But the composer's ideas are hardly strong enough to carry the full weight of his work. There is reiteration of melodic exuberances. What at first makes an impression gradually loses in effect. The opening melody is of rare beauty, but it is not Boehe's. It is the tune of the ancient hymn, "Ave, Maris Stella." The other thematic material shows no particular originality.

Of the two movements from Reznicek's suite a composition that dates back more than twenty years to a time when the author had just passed into manhood, the scherzo left the stronger impression. There is no attempt at poetic delineation here; merely a clever application of musical skill. Exceedingly brilliant is the workmanship displayed, particularly on the rhythmical side. But the result seems more a feat in intertwining and combining themes rhythmically at war with one another than a spontaneous expression of inspiration. The performance of the orchestra under Muck was extraordinary. Indeed, the Reznicek's scherzo was welcome more for the opportunity it gave for the display of the conductor's and orchestra's virtuosity than for its intrinsic quality. A word also is due to the accompaniment of the orchestra in the Rubinstein concerto. It was remarkably fine. The concert closed with Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

The concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra in the evening also brought a novelty in the shape of a piano concerto by Liapunouw, which Josef Hofmann presented with the assistance of Walter Damrosch and his men. But in listening to this concerto, played without stop, in the manner of Liszt, one could not help wondering what feeling, save friendship for the composer, could have prompted the pianist to put it in his repertory. A weak imitation of Liszt, with an infusion of Russian melody, it is not only insignificant musically, but thankless from a pianist's point of view. Of course, Hofmann played it superbly. But there was more opportunity for revealing his art to advantage in a group of solo pieces afterward. Liszt's "Funerailles" is not one of the composer's most inspired creations, but in it Hofmann gave a wonderful exhibition of the power and strength of his left hand. In marked contrast to Paderewski, he never forced the tone of his instrument. Tremendous torrents of sound he awakened, but never noise. In Liszt's "Lorelei" the pianist showed his limitations. Sentimental music is not in his line. In the same composer's "Gnomenreigen" he again was at his best. The programme opened with Schubert's symphony in C major and closed with Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture. After the concerto Damrosch and his orchestra gave a delightful performance of a delightful work, Hugo Wolf's "Italian Sere-

From N. Y. TRIBUNE
Address
Date DEC 8- 1907

MUSIC.

TWO SYMPHONIC CONCERTS.

Rubinstein's piano concerto is not often called upon to stand as the nearest representative of the musical classics, but it occupied that position yesterday in the scheme prepared by Dr. Muck for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee. Not only in seniority but in its devotion to older ideals did the familiar Rubinstein piece live up to the task designed for it by the programme maker, for the three other composers drawn upon were men using the richer musical vocabulary of to-day without having any very considerable ideas to disclose therewith. Chabrier, indeed, whose well known rhapsody, "España," had already had a hearing this season before its performance yesterday by the Boston men, was not only a master of orchestral color, but a composer of distinctive character and expression. But both Ernest Boehe in his tone poem, "Taormina," and Emil von Reznicek, in the adagio and scherzo from his E minor suite, gave evidence not only of belonging to the post-Wagner school, but of having been haunted too insistently by memories of "Parsifal" and "Tristan" respectively. Putting aside for the moment, however, this trio of modern compositions, it was doubtless not the excellent Rubinstein concerto so much as the fact that Mr. Paderewski was to play it that helped to swell the audience to a number beyond the seating capacity of Carnegie Hall. The Polish pianist has been heard here when he gave deeper and more general pleasure than he did yesterday, but he received the ovations with which his public appearances are always accompanied, and the demonstrations continued until he added as an extra piece the Chopin berceuse. The contrast between his playing in the concerto and in the solo number illustrated once again why his audiences would in general prefer to hear Mr. Paderewski in recital rather than with orchestra. The musician's own rare personality shone through every bar of the tender little Chopin cradle song, while in the concerto, the slow movement was the only one that did not seem a rather reluctant medium for the transmission of Mr. Paderewski's best powers. Here, truly, there was refined and lovely color, vitalized and attuned to expressive beauty, to which both composer and pianist contributed. But in the first movement there was forcing of the tone, and in the final allegro some of the melodic contours were of perhaps too sharp an outline. There were not lacking, of course, the pianist's unfailing distinction and brilliancy of style, his bold and vigorous climaxes and the other admirable qualities of his playing, which are too familiar to be dwelt upon. Dr. Muck and the orchestra provided a most artistic accompaniment for the Rubinstein work.

The Boehe tone poem and the symphonic suite by von Reznicek were both new to this city. Ernest Boehe is a young Munich composer, and his "Taormina," with its sumptuous scoring and subdued chiming of deep voiced bells, may be taken as the reflex upon a Northern temperament of the clear deep skies and smiling shores of Sicily. German art for four hundred years past has intermittently refreshed and clarified itself through the pilgrimages of its creative workers to the Mediterranean, and the stimulus has lost little of its potency to-day. In Boehe's case it has helped to produce a tone poem full of lovely color and not devoid of originality, notwithstanding the "Parsifal" reminiscences before mentioned and the overworking of certain rhythmic figures. The composer ought to be heard from again, as this tone poem is only his Opus 9, and his years have not yet reached thirty. Von Reznicek's adagio and scherzo were written twenty years ago, when that composer was even younger than Boehe, but they hint plainly at the clarity of thought and skill of treatment noted by Continental critics in his later opera, "Donna Diana," and in his several large orchestral works. The Boston orchestra's presentation of this modern music was all that could be asked.

...paper Clipping Bureau in the World
NEWARK
s NEWARK, N. J.
DEC 9- 1907

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO-NIGHT

The Great Organization to Give a Concert in Krueger Auditorium.

The finest orchestral concert in the musical history of Newark will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Krueger Auditorium to-night. The great organization, which has no superior in the world and is the foremost in this country, will make its first appearance here on this occasion, and should be greeted, as it is wherever it plays, by an audience limited only by the capacity of the hall. Its performances under Conductor Karl Muck will set a standard here by which all future orchestral efforts must be measured. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, a talented pianist, who in herself should be a potent attraction. Every seat in the house is good vantage ground from which to hear the concert, and plenty of good seats can be had up to 6 o'clock this evening at the Lauter Company's music warerooms, and after that hour at the boxoffice in Krueger's Auditorium.

ishe

[86]

From NEW YORK SUN
Address
Date DEC 8- 1907

ONE MORE IDYL OF SICILY

TAORMINA EMBODIED IN ERNST BOCHE'S MUSIC.

Mr. Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Draw People to Hear a Long Winded Tone Poem—Rubinstein's D Minor Concerto Sounds Very Good to Them After Mr. Boche Gets Through.

Taormina, a town on the east coast of Sicily, on a lofty rock 900 feet above the sea, thirty-five miles southwest of Messina by rail. Has numerous relics of antiquity, including an aqueduct, tessellated pavements and the remains of a theatre, regarded as one of the finest ruins in Sicily. Has a view of remarkable beauty. Population, 2,390. Thus the salient facts recorded in Chambers's Encyclopædia.

Whether it was the lofty rock 900 feet above the sea, the tessellated pavements or the thirty-five miles by rail from Messina that moved the spirit of Ernst Boehe to consider the availability of this town as a subject for musical embodiment it is enough to note that out of it he has made a tone poem for orchestra, opus 9, and that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the guidance of Dr. Karl Muck, did collectively and severally make known this composition at a matinée concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Paderewski was the solo performer, and perhaps it was nothing less than a piece of cunning on the part of Dr. Muck to put "Taormina" on the programme with him and thus make sure that it would have an audience. The official programme book records that this work was first performed in Essen, and "since then it has been played in other cities, as in Munich and Glasgow." To this striking combination must now be added Boston and New York.

The official expositor also tells us that some have found in Boehe's music an attempt to suggest "the joy of living in a balmy climate under sunny skies and amid surroundings in which the beauties of nature vie in interest with the remains and recollections of the great past of an enchanting country." This is a captivating suggestion and leads to splendid inspirations, for following the path pointed out by Mr. Boehe rising composers of the Bostonese school may now set about the composition of Philadelphia and Allaire, N. J.

One thing was made plain by the performance, and that was that the translation into music of glorious views, vistas of the past, ruined theatres, and nature, vieing with history, not to speak of the population of 2,390, requires a deal of apparatus. The score calls for four flutes, three oboes, English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, contra bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, bass trumpet, three trombones, bass tuba, three kettledrums, bass drum, deep side drum, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, glockenspiel, tamtam, the usual array of bowed instruments, two harps and four deep toned bells.

Among all these forces something surely should be done with the representation of the engaging features of Taormina, even the aqueduct or the tessellated pavements with their bricks of gold. The programme writer declares that on the score there is a picture of the town and that the composer has given no other key to his music. If you have seen Taormina you can identify the features of the composition for yourself, even to the appearance of the population. If you have not seen it you can identify things to suit yourself, just the same, and doubtless with much less trouble.

At any rate Mr. Boehe's music meanders along through a considerable number of measures, modulating with much frequency and exhibiting here and there the simulacrum of a theme, until a chaste and enlightening tutti brings us to an end of the modulating and the four deep toned bells in D flat, A flat, B flat and G flat give an excellent imitation of a church spire announcing the hour of evening thanksgiving. Whereupon we bless heaven that it is all over and get ready for the next number on the programme.

Yesterday this was the adagio and finale of Reznicek's symphonic suite in E minor. This was another resolutely wrought piece of music, which uttered no clarion call to recognition from the throne of fame. Music made with honest intent and with industrious effort, it interested merely by its disclosure of a certain skill in craftsmanship.

Mr. Paderewski's number was Rubinstein's D minor concerto, which may not be an immortal work but is at least musical music, filled with grace, and wearing at least an outward front of pleasing character. The famous pianist who wrote it would doubtless have found pleasure in listening to the performance of the equally famous pianist who played it yesterday. Mr. Paderewski's art is quite within its happiest sphere in such a work as this and he delivered himself of its measures, both those which caused the piano to thunder from end to end and those which sought for its gentler accents, eloquently and with deep appreciation.

Only in that caressing and velvety quality of tone which used to be one of the most enchanting traits of this artist's playing was the performance deficient. The concert came to a close with Chabrier's Spanish rhapsody. Dr. Muck and his players discharged their duties proficiently and the audience [illegible] "encored" [illegible]

From AMERICA
Address
...ress
Date
...e 5-

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Concert Will Long Be Remembered by Musical Public. The Program.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening will long be remembered by the musical public. It was an event in Baltimore's musical history. The following was the program:

Boehe—
"Taormina," tone poem, Op. 9.
First time in Baltimore.
Reznicek—
Adagio and Scherzo-finale from Symphonic Suite in E Minor and full orchestra.
First time in Baltimore.
Beethoven—
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.
Schumann—
Overture to "Genoveva," Op. 81.

The program naturally divided itself into three parts. First, the two very modern numbers by Bache and Reznicek; second, the Beethoven Emperor piano concerto, and, third, the Schumann overture. Even the order and arrangement of the program was edifying and educational. The two new, modern numbers were given, while the listeners were free to consider them in a fresh and unwearied condition; and the listeners gained from the two novelties all that could be gained at a single hearing. The first was an excellent sample of modern orchestration with unusual scoring for four flutes, three oboes and English horn, three clarinets and bass clarinet, three bassoons and double bassoon, three trumpets and bass trumpet, with all the extra modern instruments. The rich coloring produced by all these instruments would have been beyond the imagination of composers a hundred years ago.

The Beethoven piano-concerto was the great feature of the evening. It was played by the greatest of all pianists, by an orchestra unsurpassed in the whole world, directed by a conductor who stands unequalled.

In playing this concerto Paderewski left himself entirely aside. He played the work as faithfully, according to the great master's own ideal, as if Beethoven himself had been present, and he had been a piano pupil of the master, Beethoven. Between the soloist, the director and the orchestra there was the most absolute impression of the fullest comradeship, without even a suspicion of domination, and hence the art triumph was complete.

Paderewski broke the rule as to encores by responding and playing a Mendelssohn "Song Without Words," which gratified the enthusiastic admirers of the soloist.

...om CA...
dress ...
te DEC 8- 19...

To-morrow night brings the most important musical event that Newark has had in many years, a concert by the celebrated Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, principal conductor of the Royal Opera of Berlin, and with Madame Olga Samaroff as solo pianist. It is the first time the orchestra has ever given a concert in New Jersey, and on the success of this one will depend its return in future seasons.

Dr. Muck has chosen his program for the concert with great care, and it may be set down as a model one of its kind. The first work on it, and the work of largest dimensions, is a symphonic trilogy by Vincent d'Indy, who is known as the greatest of living French composers. The composer has drawn his inspiration from Schiller's three great dramatic poems, "Wallenstein's Camp," "The Piccolomini" and "Wallenstein's Death." The first and third movements of the work bear the same names as the first and last poems, but the second has been called "Max and Thekla" instead of "I Piccolomini."

The other orchestral number will be Schumann's overture to his dead and gone opera "Venoveva." It is all that remains of the opera, and is a striking illustration of the survival of the fittest. Hampered by an impossible libretto, Schumann's opera was fated to dust-gathering shelves, but the beautiful and lovely overture will always remain as one of the best specimens of its kind.

Madame Olga Samaroff, who will tomorrow night make her debut in Newark, is one of the most brilliant of the younger pianists. Moreover, she has the particular distinction of being an American woman whose whole career so far has been spent in America, and she is a living contradiction of the hackneyed saying that no artist can succeed in this country without an Old-World reputation. She will play Grieg's Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor. This is one of the few ventures in the larger forms of music in which the Norwegian composer was successful, and it is likely to remain forever a favorite work in the repertoire of pianists. It has tunefulness and melodiousness, and at the same time it has the brilliancy necessary to display the virtuosity of the artist.

The concert will begin at 8 o'clock.

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC. 8- 1907

Calendar of Concerts.

DECEMBER.

9. Anne Roberts, song recital, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
9. Liza de Serra, song recital, evening, Carnegie Chamber Music Hall.
10. Walter Damrosch, lecture-recital on "Pelleas et Melisande," afternoon Lyceum Theatre.
10. Mr. and Mrs. Baird, song recital, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
11. Arthur Whiting, piano and harpsichord recital, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
11. Rafael Navas, piano recital, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
12. Russian Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall.
12. Herbert Witherspoon, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
12. Augusta Cottlow, piano recital, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
13. Philharmonic Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
13. Miss de Forest Anderson, flute recital, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
13. Paul Dufault, song recital, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
14. Philharmonic Society, evening, Carnegie Hall.
14. Paderewski, piano recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
17. Charles W. Clark, song recital, afternnoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
19. Josef Hofmann, piano recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
19. Rubinstein Club, evening, Waldorf-Astoria.
21. Young People's Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie.
26. New York Oratorio Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
27. New York Trio, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
28. New York Oratorio Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
28. New York Symphony Society, evening, Carnegie Hall.

JANUARY.

2. Olive Mead Quartet, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
3. Philharmonic Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
4. Philharmonic Society, evening, Carnegie Hall.
4. Mme. Schumann-Heink, song recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
5. Victor Maurel, song recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
7. Kneisel Quartet, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
9. Boston Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORK WORLD

NOTABLE MUSICAL WEEK IN OPERA AND CONCERT; "IRIS" AND "VITA NUOVA."

By Reginald De Koven.

THE past week was made notable by several musical events in concert and opera, any one of which would have been sufficient to mark it with a white stone. There has been talk in various quarters about the lack of enterprise displayed by the management of the Metropolitan Opera-House in not offering their subscribers and patrons more in the way of operatic novelties. But two such productions as those of "The Flying Dutchman" and "Iris" in a single week, the latter of which will certainly be recorded as the most complete and beautiful operatic representation from a scenic standpoint ever seen at the Metropolitan, must certainly have once for all any such idea from the minds of the opera-going public.

The first hearing also of an important and highly interesting choral work like Wolf-Ferrari's "La Vita Nuova" and two appearances of a great pianist like Paderewski with a great orchestra like the Boston Symphony are sufficient to make the world of concert music stand out luminously.

NEWS

WHAT TIMELY PUBLIC SPIRIT CAN DO.

In connection with the enjoyment and benefit that great audiences of Baltimoreans are getting out of the Boston Symphony concerts—as, for instance, was the case in the splendid performance of last night—it is worth while occasionally to recall the fact that not many years ago the city was in danger of losing this privilege permanently. Attendance at the concerts had fallen off, and the management of the Orchestra had actually, though reluctantly, decided, at the close of that season, to drop Baltimore from its list for future seasons. At this juncture a few public-spirited citizens and lovers of music, realizing how great a loss this would be to the city, got together and guaranteed the Orchestra a revenue equal to the minimum necessary to justify the continuance of its Baltimore concerts. The decision arrived at was thereupon gladly reversed, and from that time to this the concerts have been given in Baltimore with most gratifying success. It is this kind of prompt, timely and alert public spirit that counts for so much in the welfare and progress of cities, and when it has been so amply justified as in this instance it is well to remember it both as a matter of grateful recognition and as a stimulus to similar action in other cases.

NEW YORK NATION.

NATION.

DEC 5- 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall this evening and Saturday afternoon, December 7. He will play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor," tonight, and Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor, No. 4, on Saturday afternoon. This will be his only appearance in New York with an orchestra, and he will play only twice more here. His third recital will be

N. Y. EV'G SUN

DEC 9- 1907

Carnegie Hall's greatest matinée on Saturday ended the dual alliance of the Boston Orchestra and Paderewski. Dr. Muck, unlike Hans von Buelow on a famous occasion, never once sneezed at the ovation to his solo star. Together they appeared, like the fabled lion and the lamb, throughout the orchestra's regular December trip to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York.

To-night, before it returns home, the Boston Orchestra will give a concert in Newark, N. J., for the first time it has ever appeared in that city. Mme. Samaroff is the soloist. Mr. Paderewski, after Christmas, is to play with the Pittsburg, Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras.

Mr. E. A. Baughan, in a new life of "Paderewski," previously reviewed in this newspaper, gives a chapter for students and teachers of piano.

Paderewski's advice to pianists might be summed up: Study your music first, study your muscles next, and finally study your instrument. There are two other pages of uncommonly interesting reading in this book of less than a hundred pages in all. One of them tells of the bitter disappointment when the pianist broke down after a train wreck on the Auburn road running into Syracuse, N. Y., and could not play in Boston at the testimonial to his first patron Modjeska.

Another incident, recalled from the second American tour, is that of the rival pianos at the Chicago World's Fair, when "quite a newspaper war arose." The pianist won out for his instrument of a non-exhibiting firm. "The incident is worth mentioning because it is often stated in private that great pianists are in receipt of salaries from manufacturers. . . . This dignified protest should be sufficient contradiction of the persistent rumors that Paderewski has been bound to play certain pianofortes."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES

DEC 5- 1907

BOSTON FIDDLERS AND PADEREWSKI

Great Pianist Makes Orchestra Go Way Back and Sit Down.

In lyrical slang, Paderewski "landed a left hook and a right swing" simultaneously on the musical "jaw" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the "fourth round" last night.

The orchestra "went groggy" in an instant, and after staggering about the stage in a vain effort "to hang on" to the great pianist with a possible hope of "fouling him," the said orchestra "went down and out, kicked up its heels, palpitated its solar-diaphragm and lay still."

The crowd went wild over the victory of the pianist. The ladies might have carried him out on their shoulders if their escorts hadn't kicked, yet not even one of the latter would bother to "swing a towel" over the down-and-out orchestra, and not a hand was lifted to "hold the ammonia bottle" to the nose of the "has-was musical pugilists."

Therefore it is pretty hard to say whether it was a good thing or a bad thing that Paderewski was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night.

Had he not been with them the people would have suffered the loss of hearing by far the best part of the program, but the reputation of the orchestra would not have suffered so badly by contrast.

However, this loss of prestige was entirely of their own doing.

They insisted on butting in where they had no business to butt in. For a matter of illustration, one might say that it was a good deal like a street hurdy-gurdy trying to play an accompaniment to Caruso or a rattle-bone artist acting as an orchestra for Parsifal.

The trouble is that Pederewski is a genius. The members of the symphony are undoubtedly good fiddlers, but there is not one of them who comes anywhere near being a genius.

Therefore when Pederewski was forced to wait long intervals while the orchestra orchestraed, the crowd naturally became irritable and sore, and the pianist himself shifted nervously in his chair, while his face assumer a martyred expression, as though he was quoting the biblical prayer

"How long, O Lord, how long?"

Well, it was long enough, all right, and entirely too long, and, besides, the tone of the fiddles sadly interfered with the people having a chance to really appreciate the rarely beautiful tones from the piano, which have gone so far to make Paderewski famous.

The program was badly arranged, insofar as the interests of the patrons were concerned. By some mixup in the announcement of the opening time, or else by unavoidable delays, a good portion of the audience did not arrive till 8.30. The concert began about 8.15, and the worst feature was that the first number was exceedingly long. Therefore, as the doors were shut a good portion of the crowd was forced to stand out in the chilly hallway for half an hour, incidentally missing what they had paid for and catching cold. This could have easily been avoided by substituting two short numbers at the beginning, by which time the audience would have all been seated.

While the work of the orchestra was thoroughly appreciated, the applause gained by it was so slight in comparison to the repeated ovations given Pederewski that it almost seemed the fiddlers were getting nipped by frost.

Not until the fourth encore, however, would they allow Paderewski to have a chance by himself, and it was here that he gave the final out-putting blow.

BOSTON HERALD—

DECEMBER 11, 1907.

PADEREWSKI INDISPOSED.

NEW HAVEN, Dec. 10—Paderewski, according to an announcement made at the Hyperion Theatre here tonight, where he was engaged to appear, was too indisposed to fulfil his engagement. Paderewski's manager returned to New York tonight.

[87]

From SUN

Address BALTIMORE, MD

ITS CONCERT ARTISTIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra With Paderewski At Lyric.

POLISH PIANIST AT HIS BEST

Excellent Program Is Given With Rare Appreciation — Dr. Muck's Selections Excellent.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, the second of the present series, was both artistically and socially one of the most brilliant successes of its kind given here thus far this season. Besides a program of more than usual interest was the additional attraction of Ignace Jan Paderewski, the Polish pianist, as soloist. Paderewski gave Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5. The program in full was as follows:

Boehe.....Taormina, Tone Poem, Op. 9
(First time in Baltimore.)
Reznicek.....Adagio and Scherzo-finale from Symphonic Suite in E minor for full orchestra. (First time in Baltimore.)
Beethoven....Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.
Schumann.....Overture to Genoveva, Op. 81

Much interest was naturally centered in the first two numbers—the tone poem, "Taormina," by Ernest Boehe, a young German composer, and the two movements from the symphonic suite by Emil Nicolaus Freiherr von Reznicek, an Austrian. Both numbers are comparative novelties, and were given for the first time in Baltimore.

The title of Boehe's tone poem is taken from the Sicilian town known to the ancients as Tauromenium, located on the eastern shore, with a superb view of hills and sea and Mount Ætna. The work is written in a joyous and somewhat capricious vein, in which the composer has embodied the suggestion of a rhythmic Gregorian choral melody and resorted to the use of deep-voiced bells. The thematic treatment of the poem is of exceptional beauty and great orchestral range.

The symphonic suite contains, in addition to the movements given, an overture.

Both numbers were given a thoroughly masterful reading by Dr. Muck, whose discretion in selecting new works for the orchestra is to be admired and encouraged. Such additions from time to time on the programs of great musical organizations, such as the Boston Symphony, doubtless give the concerts additional interest without detracting from the interest in the works of the older and greater masters. In this connection attention might be called to the admirable taste with which last evening's program was arranged. The first half was devoted to the new composition, while the latter half was devoted to the performance of the Beethoven and Schumann numbers.

Paderewski's rendition of the Beethoven concerto was flawless. With him restraint on the limitations of his work is undoubtedly frequently beneficial. There is no opportunity for impromptu devices, to which he frequently resorts in concerts, and in consequence his reading of last evening's number was both faithful and conscientious. His playing was greeted with a hearty ovation, to which he was obliged to respond to an encore, giving one of Mendelssohn's songs without words.

The overture to the four-act opera "Genoveva" proved a fitting and decidedly satisfying conclusion to such a thoroughly great performance.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS

From

Address

Date DEC 5

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Paderewski At The Lyric Last Night.

The absence of a symphony from the programme gave additional prominence to the Beethoven concerto in E flat major which Mr. Ignaz Jan Paderewski played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night, and conspired with that gentleman's popularity to make the occasion a particular triumph for him. Fortunately the Beethoven concerto is something more than a mere vehicle for displaying the solo performer's technical powers; it performs that function, but it further affords opportunity for the soloist to exhibit his musical feeling and "temperament" as well. And Paderewski played it exquisitely. In his recitals of late the Polish pianist has been accused of pounding the keyboard unduly, but there were no evidences of that last night. He was at his best in the more delicate passages, the tonal shadings of which were rendered beautifully, and there was at all times perfect sympathy between the soloist and the orchestra. In response to the applause Paderewski violated the rule of the orchestra by playing as an encore number one of Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words."

There were two numbers on the programme last night that were new to Baltimore—Ernst Boehe's "Taormina: A Tone Poem," and the adagio and scherzo finale from the symphonic suite in E minor by Emil Nicolaus Freiherr von Reznicek. The former is a typical example of modern orchestration, scored for a large variety of instruments, including bells behind the scenes, with much variety and beauty of tone color. It was delightful on a first hearing. The final number on the programme was Schumann's overture to "Genoveva."

NEW YORK TIMES

DEC 8- 1907

Calendar of Concerts.

DECEMBER.

9. Anne Roberts, song recital, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
9. Lizza da Porra, song recital, evening, Carnegie Chamber Music Hall.
10. Walter Damrosch, lecture-recital on "Pelleas et Mélisande," afternoon Lyceum Theatre.
10. Mr. and Mrs. Baird, song recital, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
11. Arthur Whiting, piano and harpsichord recital, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
11. Rafael Navas, piano recital, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
12. Russian Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall.
12. Herbert Witherspoon, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
12. Augusta Cottlow, piano recital, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
13. Philharmonic Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
13. Miss de Forest Anderson, flute recital, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
13. Paul Dufault, song recital, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
14. Philharmonic Society, evening, Carnegie Hall.
14. Paderewski, piano recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
17. Charles W. Clark, song recital, afternnoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
19. Josef Hofmann, piano recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
19. Rubinstein Club, evening, Waldorf-Astoria.
21. Young People's Symphony Orchestra, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
26. New York Oratorio Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
27. New York Trio, afternoon, Mendelssohn Hall.
28. New York Oratorio Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
28. New York Symphony Society, evening, Carnegie Hall.

JANUARY.

2. Olive Mead Quartet, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
3. Philharmonic Society, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
4. Philharmonic Society, evening, Carnegie Hall.
4. Mme. Schumann-Heink, song recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
5. Victor Maurel, song recital, afternoon, Carnegie Hall.
7. Kneisel Quartet, evening, Mendelssohn Hall.
9. Boston Symphony Orchestra, evening, Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORK WORLD

NOTABLE MUSICAL WEEK IN OPERA AND CONCERT; "IRIS" AND "VITA NUOVA."

By Reginald De Koven.

THE past week was made notable by several musical events in concert and opera, any one of which would have been sufficient to mark it with a white stone. There has been talk in various quarters about the lack of enterprise displayed by the management of the Metropolitan Opera-House in not offering their subscribers and patrons more in the way of operatic novelties. But two such productions as those of "The Flying Dutchman" and "Iris" in a single week, the latter of which will certainly be recorded as the most complete and beautiful operatic representation from a scenic standpoint ever seen at the Metropolitan, must certainly remove once for all any such idea from the minds of the opera-going public.

The first hearing also of an important and highly interesting choral work like Wolf-Ferrari's "La Vita Nuova" and two appearances of a great pianist like Paderewski with a great orchestra like the Boston Symphony are sufficient to make the world of concert music stand out luminously.

N EWS

Y. EV'G SUN

DEC 9- 1907

WHAT TIMELY PUBLIC SPIRIT CAN DO.

In connection with the enjoyment and benefit that great audiences of Baltimoreans are getting out of the Boston Symphony concerts—as, for instance, was the case in the splendid performance of last night—it is worth while occasionally to recall the fact that not many years ago the city was in danger of losing this privilege permanently. Attendance at the concerts had fallen off, and the management of the Orchestra had actually, though reluctantly, decided, at the close of that season, to drop Baltimore from its list for future seasons. At this juncture a few public-spirited citizens and lovers of music, realizing how great a loss this would be to the city, got together and guaranteed the Orchestra a revenue equal to the minimum necessary to justify the continuance of its Baltimore concerts. The decision arrived at was thereupon gladly reversed, and from that time to this the concerts have been given in Baltimore with most gratifying success. It is this kind of prompt, timely and alert public spirit that counts for so much in the welfare and progress of cities, and when it has been so amply justified as in this instance it is well to remember it both as a matter of grateful recognition and as a stimulus to similar action in other cases.

NEW YORK NATION

NATION

DEC 5- 1907

Paderewski will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall this evening and Saturday afternoon, December 7. He will play Beethoven's concerto in E-flat major, "The Emperor," tonight, and Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor, No. 4, on Saturday afternoon. This will be his only appearance in New York with an orchestra, and he will play only twice more here. His third recital will be

Carnegie Hall's greatest matinée on Saturday ended the dual alliance of the Boston Orchestra and Paderewski. Dr. Muck, unlike Hans von Buelow on a famous occasion, never once sneezed at the ovation to his solo star. Together they appeared, like the fabled lion and the lamb, throughout the orchestra's regular December trip to Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York.

To-night, before it returns home, the Boston Orchestra will give a concert in Newark, N. J., for the first time it has ever appeared in that city. Mme. Samaroff is the soloist. Mr. Paderewski, after Christmas, is to play with the Pittsburg, Chicago and Minneapolis orchestras.

Mr. E. A. Baughan, in a new life of "Paderewski," previously reviewed in this newspaper, gives a chapter for students and teachers of piano.

Paderewski's advice to pianists might be summed up: Study your music first, study your muscles next, and finally study your instrument. There are two other pages of uncommonly interesting reading in this book of less than a hundred pages in all. One of them tells of the bitter disappointment when the pianist broke down after a train wreck on the Auburn road running into Syracuse, N. Y., and could not play in Boston at the testimonial to his first patron Modjeska.

Another incident, recalled from the second American tour, is that of the rival pianos at the Chicago World's Fair, when "quite a newspaper war arose." The pianist won out for his instrument of a non-exhibiting firm. "The incident is worth mentioning because it is often stated in private that great pianists are in receipt of salaries from manufacturers. . . . This dignified protest should be sufficient contradiction of the persistent rumors that Paderewski has been bound to play certain pianofortes."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ress BALTIMORE, MD.

DEC 5- 1907

BOSTON FIDDLERS AND PADEREWSKI

Great Pianist Makes Orchestra Go Way Back and Sit Down.

In lyrical slang, Paderewski "landed a left hook and a right swing" simultaneously on the musical "jaw" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the "fourth round" last night.

The orchestra "went groggy" in an instant, and after staggering about the stage in a vain effort "to hang on" to the great pianist with a possible hope of "fouling him," the said orchestra "went down and out, kicked up its heels, palpitated its solar-diaphram and lay still."

The crowd went wild over the victory of the pianist. The ladies might have carried him out on their shoulders if their escorts hadn't kicked, yet not even one of the latter would bother to "swing a towel" over the down-and-out orchestra, and not a hand was lifted to "hold the ammonia bottle" to the nose of the "has-was musical pugilists."

Therefore it is pretty hard to say whether it was a good thing or a bad thing that Paderewski was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night.

Had he not been with them the people would have suffered the loss of hearing by far the best part of the program, but the reputation of the orchestra would not have suffered so badly by contrast.

However, this loss of prestige was entirely of their own doing.

They insisted on butting in where they had no business to butt in. For a matter of illustration, one might say that it was a good deal like a street hurdy-gurdy trying to play an accompaniment to Caruso or a rattle-bone artist acting as an orchestra for Parsifal.

The trouble is that Pederewski is a genius. The members of the symphony are undoubtedly good fiddlers, but there is not one of them who comes anywhere near being a genius.

Therefore when Pederewski was forced to wait long intervals while the orchestra orchestraed, the crowd naturally became irritable and sore, and the pianist himself shifted nervously in his chair, while his face assumer a martyred expression, as though he was quoting the biblical prayer

"How long, O Lord, how long?"

Well, it was long enough, all right, and entirely too long, and, besides, the tone of the fiddles sadly interfered with the people having a chance to really appreciate the rarely beautiful tones from the piano, which have gone so far to make Paderewski famous.

The program was badly arranged, insofar as the interests of the patrons were concerned. By some mixup in the announcement of the opening time, or else by unavoidable delays, a good portion of the audience did not arrive till 8.30. The concert began about 8.15, and the worst feature was that the first number was exceedingly long. Therefore, as the doors were shut a good portion of the crowd was forced to stand out in the chilly hallway for half an hour, incidentally missing what they had paid for and catching cold. This could have easily been avoided by substituting two short numbers at the beginning, by which time the audience would have all been seated.

While the work of the orchestra was thoroughly appreciated, the applause gained by it was so slight in comparison to the repeated ovations given Pederewski that it almost seemed the fiddlers were getting nipped by frost.

Not until the fourth encore, however, would they allow Paderewski to have a chance by himself, and it was here that he gave the final out-putting blow.

BOSTON HERALD—

DECEMBER 11, 1907.

PADEREWSKI INDISPOSED.

NEW HAVEN, Dec. 10—Paderewski, according to an announcement made at the Hyperion Theatre here tonight, where he was engaged to appear, was too indisposed to fulfil his engagement. Paderewski's manager returned to New York tonight.

[87]

From SUN

Address BALTIMORE, MD.

Dec 5

ITS CONCERT ARTISTIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra With Paderewski At Lyric.

POLISH PIANIST AT HIS BEST

Excellent Program Is Given With Rare Appreciation — Dr. Muck's Selections Excellent.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric, the second of the present series, was both artistically and socially one of the most brilliant successes of its kind given here thus far this season. Besides a program of more than usual interest was the additional attraction of Ignace Jan Paderewski, the Polish pianist, as soloist. Paderewski gave Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5. The program in full was as follows:

Boehe.....Taormina, Tone Poem, Op. 9
(First time in Baltimore.)
Reznicek.....Adagio and Scherzo-finale from Symphonic Suite in E minor for full orchestra. (First time in Baltimore.)
Beethoven....Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E flat major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio un poco moto.
III. Rondo: Allegro ma non troppo.
Schumann.....Overture to Genoveva, Op. 81

Much interest was naturally centered in the first two numbers—the tone poem, "Taormina," by Ernest Boehe, a young German composer, and the two movements from the symphonic suite by Emil Nicolaus Freiherr von Reznicek, an Austrian. Both numbers are comparative novelties, and were given for the first time in Baltimore.

The title of Boehe's tone poem is taken from the Sicilian town known to the ancients as Tauromenium, located on the eastern shore, with a superb view of hills and sea and Mount Ætna. The work is written in a joyous and somewhat capricious vein, in which the composer has embodied the suggestion of a rhythmic Gregorian choral melody and resorted to the use of deep-voiced bells. The thematic treatment of the poem is of exceptional beauty and great orchestral range.

The symphonic suite contains, in addition to the movements given, an overture.

Both numbers were given a thoroughly masterful reading by Dr. Muck, whose discretion in selecting new works for the orchestra is to be admired and encouraged. Such additions from time to time on the programs of great musical organizations, such as the Boston Symphony, doubtless give the concerts additional interest without detracting from the interest in the works of the older and greater masters. In this connection attention might be called to the admirable taste with which last evening's program was arranged. The first half was devoted to the new composition, while the latter half was devoted to the performance of the Beethoven and Schumann numbers.

Paderewski's rendition of the Beethoven concerto was flawless. With him restraint on the limitations of his work is undoubtedly frequently beneficial. There is no opportunity for impromptu devices, to which he frequently resorts in concerts, and in consequence his reading of last evening's number was both faithful and conscientious. His playing was greeted with a hearty ovation, to which he was obliged to respond to an encore, giving one of Mendelssohn's songs without words.

The overture to the four-act opera "Genoveva" proved a fitting and decidedly satisfying conclusion to such a thoroughly great performance.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date DEC 6

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Paderewski At The Lyric Last Night.

The absence of a symphony from the programme gave additional prominence to the Beethoven concerto in E flat major which Mr. Ignaz Jan Paderewski played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night, and conspired with that gentleman's popularity to make the occasion a particular triumph for him. Fortunately the Beethoven concerto is something more than a mere vehicle for displaying the solo performer's technical powers; it performs that function, but it further affords opportunity for the soloist to exhibit his musical feeling and "temperament" as well. And Paderewski played it exquisitely. In his recitals of late the Polish pianist has been accused of pounding the keyboard unduly, but there were no evidences of that last night. He was at his best in the more delicate passages, the tonal shadings of which were rendered beautifully, and there was at all times perfect sympathy between the soloist and the orchestra. In response to the applause Paderewski violated the rule of the orchestra by playing as an encore number one of Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words."

There were two numbers on the programme last night that were new to Baltimore—Ernst Boehe's "Taormina: A Tone Poem," and the adagio and scherzo finale from the symphonic suite in E minor by Emil Nicolaus Freiherr von Reznicek. The former is a typical example of modern orchestration, scored for a large variety of instruments, including bells behind the scenes, with much variety and beauty of tone color. It was delightful on a first hearing. The final number on the programme was Schumann's overture to "Genoveva."

NEW YORK MAIL

DEC 9- 1907

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Paderewski as soloist, was heard in the second of its two December concerts at Carnegie hall Saturday afternoon. Dr. Muck's programme included two novelties, no symphony, Chabrier's brilliant "Espana," and the Rubinstein D minor piano concerto—something of a contrast to the last Saturday afternoon programme, which consisted of a Mozart and a Beethoven symphony and no soloist.

The new offerings of Saturday were a tone poem entitled "Taormina," by Ernst Boehe, and the adagio and scherzo-finale from a suite by Reznicek.

The name of the former work would indicate that the composer was reflecting his impressions of the little Sicilian town through the medium of an excellently written score glowing with color and pulsing with life.

The Reznicek movements were rather more discursive and somewhat less original, but if there were many reminiscences of Wagner, it must be understood that these were written some twenty years ago, when the influence of the great master of music drama was reflected more baldly than it is at present.

Wagner's influence colored everything that came after him, not only in his own country, but in the music of all countries. His methods have practically become the only methods, but those who wrote closer to his day, especially young people, could not free themselves from his power. The scherzo is especially attractive and the work would well bear repetitions.

Again Paderewski delighted his hearers by a wonderful performance of the Rubinstein concerto, and though he did not exercise the self-restrains shown in the Beethoven concerto of Thursday night, he gave a performance opulent in art. He responded to the insistent encores, strangely enough for such an occasion, with Chopin's Berceuse. He played it with such beauty of tonal effects and such delicacy as to disarm the rash one who would cavil at the incongruity of such an offering.

* * *

Newark, Dec. 9 (Sun)

BOSTON SYMPHONY TONIGHT.

The appearance here tonight in Krueger's Auditorium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives Newarkers their first opportunity to hear this famous organization in their own city, as it has never appeared in the State of New Jersey. With the orchestra comes its celebrated conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, of the Royal Opera, Berlin.

The soloist at the concert will be Olga Samaroff, a pianist who is a native American, despite her Russian name, and one whose success since she made her debut in New York three years ago has been of a most sensational character. Although a young woman, she is numbered among the greatest pianists now before the public. Good seats can be had at the box office of the Auditorium. The orchestra will play D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, based on Schiller's poem, and the overture to Schumann's opera "Genoveva." Mme. Samaroff will play Grieg's Concerto in A minor, op. 16.

From ..... SUN

Address .....

Date ..... DEC 10 1907

Newark for the first time last night welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra within the drawbridge gates of Newark Bay. The soloist was Mme. Samaroff, and she was also heroine of the newest story told as the band came back over the Jersey meadows to-day.

Mme. Olga Samaroff received the other day a box full of long and expensive gloves, which were a tribute to her powers, not as a pianist, but as a pedestrian. When she was returning to America last fall on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, at luncheon one day the subject of walking came up and Mme. Samaroff, who did a deal of tramping in the Tyrol last summer, told some stories of what she had done.

A young German who was at the same table heard her with polite incredulity, with the result that she challenged him to walk that afternoon not less than fifteen kilometres. She says that is about nine miles. The day was rough and stormy, and the motion of the ship made walking difficult, but the young German accepted the challenge, and they walked the full fifteen kilometres, as measured on the decks. Mme. Samaroff has enough gloves to last her through the rest of the season.

Whether or not the race was another international affair of "Madame, there is no second!" the latter day America's champion does not say.

Newark, Dec. 8 Call.

The Paderewski Recital.

That the recital to be given by Paderewski in the Krueger Auditorium on Tuesday evening, December 17, will be a great success, both from a musical as well as financial viewpoint, is practically assured. The number of orders for seats by mail for this concert have been far in excess of that of any previous concert. The public sale of seats will open at the Lauter Company piano warerooms, 657-9 Broad street, this city, next Thursday morning, December 12. Lovers of music in this vicinity should consider themselves fortunate in being honored by Mr. Paderewski with one of his recitals, which are so very limited this season. The program arranged for his recital here is one of his best.

Newark, Dec. 7 Eve. News.

Paderewski's Recital.

Music loving Newarkers [illegible] again will have an opportunity to enjoy a recital by Ignace Jan Paderewski, the famous Polish pianist, who will appear in the Krueger Auditorium Tuesday night, December 17, immediately after which date he will begin an extended Western tour.

Despite his numerous tours of this country, Paderewski continues to be the most popular, as he is the greatest pianist appearing in public to-day. His career as a virtuoso has been unique in the annals of music, and so, also, may be called his preparation of that career. If the usual virtuoso, whatever his instrument may be, is not a "wonder-child" at any rate, by the time he has entered his teens, he has a solid, primary training in his art and is the possessor of a technique far beyond the reach of any but the most gifted amateurs. By the time he is twenty he is a full-fledged artist with his career made or irretrievably maimed. Paderewski asserts that when he was sixteen his technique was so inadequate that he was always forced to make improvisations of his own in hard passages, hoping that none of his audience would be the wiser, and it was not until he was twenty-four that he set himself seriously to the task of accomplishing in a few years in his maturity what others spend a lifetime on and at a time when the fingers and wrists have the ductile flexibility of childhood.

In 1884 Paderewski was a poor, unknown musician, whose threadbare clothes differed no whit from the shabby garments of thousands of other poor, unknown musicians, who swarm the streets of Berlin and Vienna. More than that, while known among his friends as a man of undoubted talent, few, if any, saw in him the making of a great pianist. Four years later Vienna, Berlin and Paris were talking of the marvelous Pole, the pupil of Leschetizky, who was speaking a new message of beauty with his piano. Six years afterward London fought to attend his recitals, and a year later he began a series of triumphant tours of America the like of which has never been recorded.

Paderewski was a mature man of twenty-eight when he first challenged public opinion as a pianist. His life had been one long, black struggle with poverty, brightened only by a brief year of wedded happiness, when poverty did not count. As a child of three he had seen his father start out on the long, heart-breaking march of exile to Siberia, and years after he had seen him return, a prematurely old and broken man. His marriage had left him a son of such delicate health that the few years of his life were one unceasing struggle against death.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

[illegible]88

DEC 8- 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

Mr. Edwin L. Turnbull Appeals For Better Selections.

Commenting on the Boston Symphony concert of Wednesday night, Mr. Edwin Litchfield Turnbull said:

"One often hears expressions of regret from music lovers at the number of so-called musical 'novelties' which have been finding their way of late into the programs of the first orchestra of our land, and which, under the generous guidance of Mr. Higginson, has done a work for musical culture in America that will be a magnificent monument to the founder of the orchestra. There are some 48 public rehearsals and concerts given in Boston, besides 10 concerts given in Cambridge, so that at home the orchestra has abundant opportunity to produce modern compositions.

"But in Baltimore, including the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, we have only 10 programs during the entire season of selections from the vast wealth of orchestral music which the musical libraries of the world afford. Therefore when one thinks of all the beautiful works that might have been chosen one cannot help wondering sometimes at Dr. Muck's selections.

"The Boehe 'tone poem' with which the concert began the other evening had moments of interest and occasionally even of great beauty. It was richly orchestrated and there was an effective Gregorian chorale and some melodious bells in the finale.

"But the two movements from the suite of Reznicek, which followed it, were not worthy of a place on the program of this great orchestra. As someone in the audience cleverly remarked: 'To have the Boston Symphony play such a composition was equivalent to setting Alma Tadema to whitewash a fence.' Remember that we have only 10 orchestra concerts a year in Baltimore, and therefore can ill afford space on the programs for anything but the best music. Does the suite of Reznicek belong to this class?

"The overture to Schumann's 'Genoveva,' an opera which was a dismal failure, fell rather flat after the great 'Emperor' concerto. One might easily have missed all the rest of the program without any great sacrifice, and it was rather noticeable that a number of the audience did not arrive until after the performance of the two opening numbers of the program, just in time for Beethoven's immortal work for piano and orchestra, which was given a rendering that made the second concert of the Boston Symphony an event that will long be remembered in the annals of our musical history. It was the perfection of musical art. Mr. Paderewski played as if the spirit of the old master had descended upon him from the heavens. It was an inspiration to watch his face as he played to an audience completely entranced by the glories of the music. And the orchestra, under Dr. Muck's wonderful baton, played such an exquisite accompaniment that even Paderewski himself could have asked for nothing more.

"No wonder that at the conclusion the great magician of the piano eagerly grasped the conductor's hand. The delighted audience called him out again and again, and then the most wonderful thing of all happened. Ruthlessly smashing all traditions of Mr. Higginson's orchestra, Paderewski sat down and played an encore, a Mendelssohn song without words."

N. Y. Globe, Dec. 9

THE silence that settled on the city yesterday followed a busy Saturday of music. Two symphony concerts and [illegible] operatic performances were the record of the day. At Carnegie Hall in the afternoon Dr. Muck met the demand for novelties by putting two of them on the programme of the Boston orchestra. "Taormina," a tone poem by Ernst Boehe, a young German composer, and two movements from a suite by Reznicek, best known as the composer of "Donna Diana," were the pieces. Both were superbly played by Dr. Muck's men, but neither showed any overwhelming reason why it should be played at all.

"Taormina" is supposed to describe or suggest the Sicilian coast town of that name. Perhaps it does. And yet a credible report reaches us that no less an authority than its first American conductor said it might as well be called East Saugus, and another Boston wit suggested Schenectady. It is not necessary to consider here the rival claims of Quogue and Cohoes. Herr Boehe is no doubt at liberty to choose what name he pleases for his ambitious exercises in orchestration.

The Reznicek suite, although a novelty here, was written upward of twenty years ago. The two movements played yesterday aroused no curiosity about the one that was not played. Having thus paid his tribute to new music, Dr. Muck turned to old—namely, Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto for Mr. Paderewski, and Chabrier's rhapsody on Spanish airs entitled "España."

There are those who now profess to find the Rubinstein concerto banal. Yet after what had preceded it it sounded like a classic. Mr. Paderewski, unfortunately, was not at his best in it. Of course, he did some extremely beautiful and eloquent playing, but too often he indulged in sonorities which were crashing but hardly musical. Recalled again and again, he played Chopin's berceuse with a perfection that made you forget the heroics of the concerto.

The concert ended with the gorgeous and fascinating rhapsody of Chabrier. The performance was a little disappointing. The piece could be played with a richer langour and a fierier élan.

Providence TRIBUNE

From .....

Address .....

Date ..... DEC 10

To Give Recital.

A programme of exceptional brilliancy is to be given at the Churchill House Wednesday, Dec. 11, at 3 o'clock, when, under the auspices of the Listeners, George Proctor will give a pianoforte recital. Mr. Proctor was soloist last season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has many appreciative friends in Providence. A limited number of guests' tickets may be secured from Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, 424 Brook street.

N. Y. World, Dec. 8

PADEREWSKI PLAYS AGAIN AT MATINEE.

Pianist, with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Renders Two Novelties at Carnegie Hall.

By Reginald De Koven.

The combination of Paderewski and the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew another large audience to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The Rubinstein Concerto took the place of the usual symphony, and the programme otherwise was interesting as containing two novelties. One, "Taormina," a tone poem by Boehe, a young Munich composer first heard yesterday, opened the programme. Taormina is the name of an Italian village. If Boehe's music describes it, it must be a dismal place.

This "poem" is full of seething, crawling, modern harmonics which arrive at nowhere in particular melodically. Though well played, it did not impress me. The other novelty, an adagio and scherzo-finale from E minor suite, by Reznicek, did. This work possesses form and substance, is melodically attractive and has more dignity than the "Donna Diana" overture heard at a recent concert. It is also impressively scored.

It seems now the fashion to decry Rubinstein and hurl anathema maranatha at the heads of conductors who dare to play him. For all this his D minor Concerto is one of the most brilliantly effective works of its class, especially when, as yesterday, played by a master. Paderewski, in forceful dynamic mood, made light of all its technical difficulties and gave a remarkable exhibition of virtuosity; the piano fairly thundered, but it was never banging.

Beethoven said: "The great pianists have nothing but technique and affectation." Paderewski has certainly the technique, but he seldom if ever loses the artist in the mere virtuoso. So, the pathos and sentiment of the slow movement were exquisite, and the dynamics were overdone; while the brilliancy of the finale was scintillating. Chopin's "Berceuse" was the inevitable encore, following stormy applause. A meteoric reading of Chabrier's musical firework "Espana" closed the concert.

For the orchestra and Dr. Muck I chant the usual paean, this time without reserve.

N. Y. Post, Dec 9.

Two Symphony Concerts.

"He wrote on the spur of the moment, driven by an inner force; he could not, as he told me, criticise, file, and brood over his compositions. They were indeed improvisations, and had the virtues and vices of improvisations."

In these words Professor Niecks of Edinburgh admirably summed up the art of Anton Rubinstein. He was one of the most original and fertile melodists that ever lived, and had he only been willing to criticise, file, and brood, like Beethoven, he would not now be so neglected. Not a few of his works, however, came from his head so beautiful in both form and content that they needed no revising. One of these, the "Ocean Symphony," was played at the last Philharmonic concert. Another, the D minor concerto, was the principal number at the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. This concerto is "aus einem Guss," as the Germans say. It simply overflows with melody, it has life, passion, vigor, romance, poetry; there is no slovenly page in it; it gives the pianist opportunity to display his art in all its best aspects. That Mr. Paderewski made admirable use of this opportunity need not be said; nor need it be told how exqusitely he played the Chopin berceuse with which he had to supplement it. The enthusiam of the audience was equal to the occasion.

The orchestra, which, in the concerto, was not always as responsive to the pianist's Slavic impulses, as might have been desired, gave an excellent account of itself in the other numbers, the familiar and fiery Spanish Rhapsody of Chabrier, and two novelties—Boehe's "Taormina" and an adagio and scherzo from a symphonic suite by Reznicek. Those two pieces proved to be so similar in character, that their insertion in the same programme betokened an insufficient regard for variety. Boehe simply supplies the word and picture of the famous Sicilian town and lets the hearer's imagination do the rest. Perhaps, like Strauss, he will subsequently supply details. But it will be hardly worth while; his piece is a panorama of gorgeous instrumental colors; but it is too much like the splendid raiment which covers a plain and commonplace woman. Less commendable still is the Reznicek piece. Here there are ideas as well as colors; but the ideas are borrowed, chiefly from Wagner and Tchaikovsky. The repeated introduction of the love motive from "Tristan and Isolde" in a scherzo [illegible] a masterstroke of infelicity.

Saale-Zeitung
Dec. 9

...ten Passagen, namentlich unnachahmlich fließenden und perlenden Triolen, sein ganzes gewaltiges Temperament. Den zweiten Satz, diese aller thematischen Verarbeitung bare Idylle, sang und spann er mit zarter Kantilene, der man nur mitunter sparsamere Anwendung des Rubato's gewünscht hätte, um in dem gewaltigen Schlußsatz einen harten Kampf mit dem feurigen Orchester auszufechten, gegen dessen Ansturm er virtuose Tonsalven, stürmische Oktavengänge und dämonische Läufe warf, eine imponirende Energie und Vehemenz! Das Publikum raste.

Die Tondichtung „Taormina" von Böhe erweist eine Meisterhand in glänzender Orchestrirung und Kolorirung, eine mitunter berauschende Polyphonie, aber eine ganz unpersönliche melodische Prägung, ohne Tiefe und Gehalt. Die Themen sind, abgesehen von dem gregorianischen Chorgesang "Ave, maris stella" am Anfang und einigen gleich Bruchschokolade erscheinenden melodiösen Fragmenten (namentlich einem sehnsüchtigen Gesang der Solovioline) unbedeutend, aber es läßt sich in den virtuosen Klangkombinationen gut schwelgen und ausmalen, welche Gelegenheit sich Dr. Muck auch nicht entgehen ließ. Der noble Klang des Orchesters, die mühelose Bewältigung der gehäuften Schwierigkeiten, die subtile Abtönung der Gruppen war bewunderungswürdig.

Allerdings ist gerade eine solch' vollkommene Wiedergabe darnach angethan, die Schwächen eines Werks in das unbarmherzige Licht des Tages zu rücken. Zum Schluß der Komposition gab es nach einer effektvollen Bläserepisode ein friedliches Abendläuten à la Gralsglocken, ein Effekt sicher wie baares Gold, aber dennoch klang der Beifall dünn. Das Publikum bewunderte die Meistertunke, vermißte aber das dazu gehörige Fleisch.

Hierauf folgte eine ältere Komposition Reznicek's, „Adagio und Scherzo-Finale". Man bewundert die Gelehrsamkeit, namentlich die feine Kontrapunktik des Komponisten, kommt aber zu keinem tiefen Eindruck, da das Werk gar zu verstandesklüh und uninspirirt ist. Die Ausführung war tadellos. In Chabrier's effektvoller Rhapsodie „España" zauberte Dr. Muck köstliche koloristische Wirkungen hervor. Es war ein Schwelgen in Klangpracht.

H.

TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 14 1907

M. Paderewski was the distinguished soloist at both the Thursday evening, December fifth, and Saturday afternoon, December seventh, concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall upon the occasion of their second visit to New York this season. The hall was taxed beyond its seating capacity. On both occasions the great artist played with the finish, authority and tonal beauty which is so characteristic of him, and on both occasions, in response to thunderous applause, did he break through the iron rule of "no encores" peculiar to the Boston Symphony concerts. The Beethoven Concerto in E flat major which he played on Thursday was performed in a broad, beautiful and noble style; and the Rubinstein charming D minor Concerto was on the whole given with the greatest of beauty, but occasionally the great pianist resorted to a bravura which forced the tone of the instrument beyond all limits. The orchestral numbers at the first concert were Brahms's beautiful second symphony and Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva." It was noticed that the Saturday program contained two novelties, a symphonic poem entitled "Taormina" by Ernst Boehe, whose name is unfamiliar here, and the Aadgio and Scherzo-finale, from a symphonic suite by Reznicek, both of which failed to make a deep impression beyond admiration for skilful orchestration. The last number was Chabrier's very brilliant Spanish rhapsody, "España," which was played by the New York Symphony under Mr. Damrosch's direction lately

NEWARK, N.J
DEC 10 1907

FINE CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Greeted by Large and Fashionable Audience.

TALENTED PIANIST ASSISTS

Program Consists of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, and Grieg's Concerto in A Minor for Piano—Orchestra's Playing Best Ever Heard Here.

A large audience, representative of Newark's society and musical culture, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon its first visit to this State, at the Krueger Auditorium, last night. The concert was a delight throughout to those with appreciative and understanding ears. No such playing has been heard in a long time, if ever. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, made the same good impression that he has in other big cities where the orchestra has played, showing himself by the results achieved a fully equipped leader and a musician of the highest rank.

The famous band numbered about seventy, a little less than its full quota, but very little difference was noticed. It had all that goes to make up accomplished playing, all those excellent qualities which it has attained by long years of practise and in which no other orchestra in the country can excel it. Its principal task was D'Indy's "Wallenstein," Trilogy, op 12, based upon the dramatic poem of Schiller, given in three parts, "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla" ("The Piccolomini"), and "The Death of Wallenstein." This took three-quarters of an hour to play. Its lesser offering was the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," op 81.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has played with the orchestra often, was the assisting soloist. She played with the orchestra Grieg's Concerto in A minor, op. 16. Her achievement was something of a personal triumph, for she was most heartily applauded. She bowed her acknowledgments three times, but gave nothing extra.

The trilogy is not one of the Frenchman's late works, but it is, nevertheless, as full of forcible truth, vividness and vigor as any of his symphonic music. The work was begun in 1873 and not completed until 1881 and an interesting fact is that the "Ouverture des Piccolomini," forming the second part of the trilogy, was the first work of the composer's to be produced in Paris, being given at a Pasdelough concert on January 25, 1874. The first and third movements were first performed in Paris in 1880. First played in this country at one of the Anton Seidl's concerts in New York in 1888, it has since been given in Chicago and Cincinnati. It may be interesting to recall, in passing, that D'Indy was himself in this country two years ago and the Boston symphony did much to make his works better known by playing a series of concerts under his baton.

The first part of the work is splendidly descriptive, showing the motley horde of adventurers who surrounded Wallenstein, leader of Ferdinand's imperial forces during the later period of the Thirty Years' War (1618-1648) which plunged Germany into a generation of religious and political strife. Heading the Catholic army the great general, who held his forces together by his wonderful personality, waged war first against the Denmark invaders and then against Agustavus Adolphus, of Sweden. The life of the camp, with the coming of the Capuchin monk and the mocking greeting from the dissolute soldiers, is depicted with all the tumult of the full orchestra, lulled or fanned into fire, as the various themes are worked out. It is mostly in the nature of a scherzo. Of the various motives that of Wallenstein is the most striking, overshadowing the others through the blare of the brasses.

The second movement represents the love of Max and Thekla and its effectively mournful ending, as the oboe sighs out Thekla's lament, is in striking contrast to the orchestral storm of the camp finale.

The third part tells of the general's assassination, ordered, so history tells us, by Emperor Ferdinand. There is a slow and ominous introduction, with the reappearance of the theme of Wallenstein. The opening measures of the allegro portray the conspiracy and the overthrow of the leader. Then again is heard the confusion of the camp. The Wallenstein theme is distorted. Death is upon him.

Dr. Muck's reading was a thoroughly musicianly achievement. The orchestra's earnest, spirited response was both efficient and stirring.

Of the "Genoveva" overture it is not necessary to say much, except that it is practically all that is heard now of that ill-fated opera. It first met the light in this country in Boston in 1866, sixteen years after the opera met with failure in Leipsic because of its dull libretto. It does not show Schumann at his best, melodious and beautiful in parts as it is.

The late Norwegian's concerto, which he is said to have written in 1868, and which was first played at Leipsic in 1872, has borne the brunt of much adverse and some favorable criticism. As a work to exhibit a pianist's virtuosity it cannot be ranked high. Mme. Samaroff made the most of it, however, and did the cadenza beautifully. She ran the second and third movements together, and accomplished the technical difficulties of the varying themes of the rondo with a proficiency which stamped her as a player of first quality. ... hour and thirty-... gentle pleasure

[89]

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWARK, N.J
DEC 10 1907

NOBLE MUSIC CHARMS MANY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Polished Art Shown in a Delightful Concert.

MME. SAMAROFF'S LOCAL DEBUT

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when announcing the engagement of that famous organization for the concert given by it in the Krueger Auditorium, last night, led the public to believe that the entire band, numbering ninety-seven musicians, would appear here. About sixty of its members were present. It cannot be said, therefore, that the concert was such as the orchestra gives in Symphony Hall, in its home city, or in Carnegie Hall, New York. Because of similar discrepancies in the past between promises and achievements in musical undertakings here, many Newarkers have learned to view with distrust the glowing announcements of enthusiastic press agents, as to what will be accomplished by visiting orchestras, and are inclined, when seeking artistic refreshment, to hie themselves to Manhattan with the certainty of seeing the best foot put forward by esthetic institutions bidding for popular support.

Dr. Karl Muck.

It is not our desire to have it inferred by those who were not in attendance that the concert, introducing a large section of the talented organization from the Hub to this community, was not of a high order of merit. It was, in fact, the finest in all respects that has been heard here since Theodore Thomas and Anton Seidl brought their forces to this city years ago. It fixed a new standard of art and beauty in musical expression by which similar entertainments in this city must be judged. While the tone of the band was less voluminous and sonorous than had been expected, yet the reduction of the orchestra's numerical strength did not affect the quality of the tone, which has helped to give these adopted Bostonians a world-wide reputation. And as fine tone is a chief consideration in all musical performances, the production of it in such perfection as was heard on this occasion was an achievement to be grateful for. No orchestra that has appeared here ever so emphasized the wide difference between merely noisy proclamations of musical ideas and the revelation of them by means of artful gradation of tone from delicately spun pianissimi to compelling sonority in climacteric passages. The faultless intonation, the clearness of phrasing, the flexibility and due assertion of the different voices, the grace in nuancing and the polished technique were amazing to ears unaccustomed to this orchestra's accomplishments. In none of the interpretations was there a suspicion of striving for sensational effect or of catching the applause of the more heedless by other than legitimate means. The performances moved on the lofty plane of ideal refinement and loveliness long ago attained by these musicians. The atmosphere created by them was not too rarefied for one to breathe easily in, yet it was far removed from that to which many of those hearing them are accustomed. If the significance of every line in the beautiful mosaics of melodies that were wrought was lost to some, yet no one in the large audience could be insensible to the potential charm in the appealing euphony.

The program comprised Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein's Trilogy," the overture to Robert Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," and the late Edvard Grieg's concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra, the soloist being Mme. Olga Samaroff. In selecting these compositions for performance Dr. Karl Muck, the orchestra's conductor, chose works that, while fairly representing their composers in their best estate, also represented three distinct [illegible] divergencies and differing racial attributes and inclinations [illegible] of those romanticists, Schubert or Schumann, the fact that he made us acquainted with M. d'Indy's "Wallenstein" is a cause for congratulation and routs any disposition to quarrel with him. In striking contrast to the trilogy was Schumann's overture to his futile opera "Genoveva," in which he sought to be dramatic, but conspicuously failed in being so. Although the work lacks the tremendous passion that swells through the overture for which he found inspiration in Byron's "Manfred," yet it is pregnant with feeling and couched in lovely and searching phrases. It is absolute music in the best sense of that term, a masterpiece of its kind, and a fine example of Schumann's musicianship in instrumentation. As played by the orchestra, with the utmost regard for all its refinements, it delighted the audience.

In introducing Mme. Samaroff here, Conductor Muck brought to local attention a pianist who has achieved much within her brief professional career and whose ability, as it was disclosed in the Grieg Concerto, induced the wish that she may be frequently heard in our concert rooms. The concerto, one of the most original, spontaneous and fragrant of the Norwegian's works, has served the purposes of many talented and ambitious pianists, and on this occasion it enabled Mme. Samaroff to disclose her technical proficiency, artistic nature and temperamental energy in a manner so engaging and with results so eloquent of the composer's music and intentions as to earn for her several recalls. She can summon to her performance the dynamic power needful to cope with a large orchestra, and in solo passages she can employ a variety of tone color that, coupled with her fleet and sure fingering and expert use of the pedal, gives distinction to her playing.

Dr. Muck is a reposeful conductor, who, by his quiet method in directing, accomplishes more than do most of the flamboyant and showy orchestral leaders. He is free from disturbing mannerisms, and while his strong personality and individuality as a guiding factor is felt in his intepretations, he leaves the impression of having no desire to shine above his associates or to attract attention to himself by indulging in eccentricities.

...wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
NEWARK, N.J
DEC 14 1907

Dr. Karl Muck is becoming very generous to the Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of orchestral novelties, and in the next six concerts no less than eight works now to Boston are to be played. They are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen;" a concerto for violin by D'Amborsio, which the new second concert-master, Mr. Czerwonky, will play; the Intermezzo Goldoniani by the Italian Bossi; Rheinberger's Concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra; Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption;" a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's Suite Fantastique. There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

Staatszeitung
Dec. 9

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Das Samstags-Nachmittags-Konzert der geschätzten Bostoner Gäste in Carnegie Hall versprach eine schwüle Affaire zu werden. Zu Anfang sizilianische Gluth mit Ernst Böhe's Tondichtung „Taormina", zum Schluß Feuer und Temperament mit Chabrier's „España" und in der Mitte Paderewski, der Hypnotiseur, der Wärmeleiter und Wärmespender par excellence. Flammen der Begeisterung gab es, ungeachtet der überaus glänzenden Durchführung des ganzen Programms, nur nach dem Rubinstein'schen D-Moll-Konzert, das der große polnische Pianist hinreißend spielte und nach welchem ihm schier überschwängliche Huldigungen dargebracht wurden.

Im ersten Satz des Konzerts entwickelte Paderewski in vollen und gebrochenen Akkorden, bravourösen Gängen und in zarten Passagen, namentlich unnachahmlich fließenden und perlenden Triolen, sein ganzes gewaltiges Temperament. Den zweiten Satz, diese aller thematischen Verarbeitung bare Idylle, sang und spann er mit zarter Kantilene, der man nur mitunter sparsamere Anwendung des Rubato's gewünscht hätte, um in dem gewaltigen Schlußsatz einen harten Kampf mit dem feurigen Orchester auszufechten, gegen dessen Ansturm er virtuose Tonperlenketten, stürmische Oktavengänge und chromatische Läufe warf, eine imponirende Entfaltung und Vehemenz! Das Publikum raste.

Die Tondichtung „Taormina" von Böhe erweist eine Meisterhand in glänzender Orchestrirung und Kolorirung, eine mitunter berauschende Polyphonie, aber eine ganz unpersönliche melodische Prägung, ohne Tiefe und Gehalt. Die Themen sind, abgesehen von dem gregorianischen Chorgesang "Ave, maris stella" am Anfang und einigen gleich Bruchschokolade erscheinenden melodiösen Fragmenten (namentlich einem sehnsüchtigen Gesang der Solovioline) unbedeutend, aber es läßt sich in den virtuosen Klangkombinationen gut schwelgen und ausmalen, welche Gelegenheit sich Dr. Muck auch nicht entgehen ließ. Der noble Klang des Orchesters, die mühelose Bewältigung der gehäuften Schwierigkeiten, die subtile Abtönung der Gruppen war bewunderungswürdig.

Allerdings ist gerade eine solch' vollkommene Wiedergabe darnach angethan, die Schwächen eines Werks in das unbarmherzige Licht des Tages zu rücken. Zum Schluß der Komposition gab es nach einer effektvollen Bläserepisode ein friedliches Abendläuten à la Gralsglocken, ein Effekt sicher wie baares Gold, aber dennoch klang der Beifall dünn. Das Publikum bewunderte die Meistertunke, vermißte aber das dazu gehörige Fleisch.

Hierauf folgte eine ältere Komposition Reznicek's, „Adagio und Scherzo-Finale". Man bewundert die Gelehrsamkeit, namentlich die feine Kontrapunktik des Komponisten, kommt aber zu keinem tiefen Eindruck, da das Werk gar zu verstandeskühl und uninspirirt ist. Die Ausführung war' tadellos. In Chabrier's effektvoller Rhapsodie „España" zauberte Dr. Muck köstliche koloristische Wirkungen hervor. Es war ein Schwelgen in Klangpracht.

H.

TOWN & COUNTRY
NEW YORK CITY
DEC 14 1907

M. Paderewski was the distinguished soloist at both the Thursday evening, December fifth, and Saturday afternoon, December seventh, concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall upon the occasion of their second visit to New York this season. The hall was taxed beyond its seating capacity. On both occasions the great artist played with the finish, authority and tonal beauty which is so characteristic of him, and on both occasions, in response to thunderous applause, did he break through the iron rule of "no encores" peculiar to the Boston Symphony concerts. The Beethoven Concerto in E flat major which he played on Thursday was performed in a broad, beautiful and noble style; and the Rubinstein charming D minor Concerto was on the whole given with the greatest of beauty, but occasionally the great pianist resorted to a bravura which forced the tone of the instrument beyond all limits. The orchestral numbers at the first concert were Brahms's beautiful second symphony and Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva." It was noticed that the Saturday program contained two novelties, a symphonic poem entitled "Taormina" by Ernst Boehe, whose name is unfamiliar here, and the Aadgio and Scherzo-finale from a symphonic suite by Reznicek, both of which failed to make a deep impression beyond admiration for skilful orchestration. The last number was Chabrier's very brilliant Spanish rhapsody, "España," which was played by the New York Symphony under Mr. Damrosch's direction lately

STAR
NEWARK, N.J.
DEC 10 1907

FINE CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Greeted by Large and Fashionable Audience.

TALENTED PIANIST ASSISTS

Program Consists of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture, and Grieg's Concerto in A Minor for Piano—Orchestra's Playing Best Ever Heard Here.

A large audience, representative of Newark's society and musical culture, greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon its first visit to this State, at the Krueger Auditorium, last night. The concert was a delight throughout to those with appreciative and understanding ears. No such playing has been heard in a long time, if ever. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, made the same good impression that he has in other big cities where the orchestra has played, showing himself by the results achieved a fully equipped leader and a musician of the highest rank.

The famous band numbered about seventy, a little less than its full quota, but very little difference was noticed. It had all that goes to make up accomplished playing, all those excellent qualities which it has attained by long years of practise and in which no other orchestra in the country can excel it. Its principal task was D'Indy's "Wallenstein," Triology, op 12, based upon the dramatic poem of Schiller, given in three parts, "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla" ("The Piccolomini"), and "The Death of Wallenstein." This took three-quarters of an hour to play. Its lesser offering was the overture to Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," op 81.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, who has played with the orchestra often, was the assisting soloist. She played with the orchestra Grieg's Concerto in A minor, op. 16. Her achievement was something of a personal triumph, for she was most heartily applauded. She bowed her acknowledgments three times, but gave nothing extra.

The trilogy is not one of the Frenchman's late works, but it is, nevertheless, as full of forcible truth, vividness and vigor as any of his symphonic music. The work was begun in 1873 and not completed until 1881 and an interesting fact is that the "Ouverture des Piccolomini," forming the second part of the trilogy, was the first work of the composer's to be produced in Paris, being given at a Pasdelough concert on January 25, 1874. The first and third movements were first performed in Paris in 1880. First played in this country at one of the Anton Seidl's concerts in New York in 1888, it has since been given in Chicago and Cincinnati. It may be interesting to recall, in passing, that D'Indy was himself in this country two years ago and the Boston symphony did much to make his works better known by playing a series of concerts under his baton.

The first part of the work is splendidly descriptive, showing the motley horde of adventurers who surrounded Wallenstein, leader of Ferdinand's imperial forces during the later period of the Thirty Years' War (1618-1648) which plunged Germany into a generation of religious and political strife. Heading the Catholic army the great general, who held his forces together by his wonderful personality, waged war first against the Denmark invaders and then against Agustavus Adolphus, of Sweden. The life of the camp, with the coming of the Capuchin monk and the mocking greeting from the dissolute soldiers, is depicted with all the tumult of the full orchestra, lulled or fanned into fire, as the various themes are worked out. It is mostly in the nature of a sherzo. Of the various motives that of Wallenstein is the most striking, overshadowing the others through the blare of the brasses.

The second movement represents the love of Max and Thekla and its effectively mournful ending, as the oboe sighs out Thekla's lament, is in striking contrast to the orchestral storm of the camp finale.

The third part tells of the general's assassination, ordered, so history tells us, by Emperor Ferdinand. There is a slow and ominous introduction, with the reappearance of the theme of Wallenstein. The opening measures of the allegro portray the conspiracy and the overthrow of the leader. Then again is heard the confusion of the camp. The Wallenstein theme is distorted. Death is upon him.

Dr. Muck's reading was a thoroughly musicianly achievement. The orchestra's earnest, spirited response was both efficient and stirring.

Of the "Genoveva" overture it is not necessary to say much, except that it is practically all that is heard now of that ill-fated opera. It first met the light in this country in Boston in 1866, sixteen years after the opera met with failure in Leipsic because of its dull libretto. It does not show Schumann at his best, melodious and beautiful in parts as it is.

The late Norwegian's concerto, which he is said to have written in 1868, and which was first played at Leipsic in 1872, has borne the brunt of much adverse and some favorable criticism. As a work to exhibit a pianist's virtuosity it cannot be ranked high. Mme. Samaroff made the most of it, however, and did the cadenza beautifully. She ran the second and third movements together, and accomplished the technical difficulties of the varying themes of the rondo with a proficiency which stamped her as a player of first quality. The concert lasted one hour and thirty-five minutes, and was a genuine pleasure throughout.

[87]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEWS
NEWARK, N.J.
DEC 10 1907

NOBLE MUSIC CHARMS MANY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Polished Art Shown in a Delightful Concert.

MME. SAMAROFF'S LOCAL DEBUT

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when announcing the engagement of that famous organization for the concert given by it in the Krueger Auditorium, last night, led the public to believe that the entire band, numbering ninety-seven musicians, would appear here. About sixty of its members were present. It cannot be said, therefore, that the concert was such as the orchestra gives in Symphony Hall, in its home city, or in Carnegie Hall, New York. Because of similar discrepancies in the past between promises and achievements in musical undertakings here, many Newarkers have learned to view with distrust the glowing announcements of enthusiastic press agents, as to what will be accomplished by visiting orchestras, and are inclined, when seeking artistic refreshment, to hie themselves to Manhattan with the certainty of seeing the best foot put forward by esthetic institutions bidding for popular support.

Dr. Karl Muck.

It is not our desire to have it inferred by those who were not in attendance that the concert, introducing a large section of the talented organization from the Hub to this community, was not of a high order of merit. It was, in fact, the finest in all respects that has been heard here since Theodore Thomas and Anton Seidl brought their forces to this city years ago. It fixed a new standard of art and beauty in musical expression by which similar entertainments in this city must be judged. While the tone of the band was less voluminous and sonorous than had been expected, yet the reduction of the orchestra's numerical strength did not affect the quality of the tone, which has helped to give these adopted Bostonians a world-wide reputation. And as fine tone is a chief consideration in all musical performances, the production of it in such perfection as was heard on this occasion was an achievement to be grateful for. No orchestra that has appeared here ever so emphasized the wide difference between merely noisy proclamations of musical ideas and the revelation of them by means of artful gradation of tone from delicately spun pianissimi to compelling sonority in climacteric passages. The faultless intonation, the clearness of phrasing, the flexibility and due assertion of the different voices, the grace in nuancing and the polished technique were amazing to ears unaccustomed to this orchestra's accomplishments. In none of the interpretations was there a suspicion of striving for sensational effect or of catching the applause of the more heedless by other than legitimate means. The performances moved on the lofty plane of ideal refinement and loveliness long ago attained by these musicians. The atmosphere created by them was not too rarefied for one to breathe easily in, yet it was far removed from that to which many of those hearing them are accustomed. If the significance of every line in the beautiful mosaics of melodies that were wrought was lost to some, yet no one in the large audience could be insensible to the potential charm in the appealing euphony.

The program comprised Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein's Trilogy," the overture to Robert Schumann's opera, "Genoveva," and the late Edvard Grieg's concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra, the soloist being Mme. Olga Samaroff. In selecting these compositions for performance Dr. Karl Muck, the orchestra's conductor, chose works that, while fairly representing their composers in their best estate, also represented three distinct individualities and differing racial attributes and inclinations. M. d'Indy belongs to the younger school of French creative musicians, including Gabriel Faure, whose of those romanticists, Schubert or Schumann, the fact that he made us acquainted with M. d'Indy's "Wallenstein" is a cause for congratulation and routs any disposition to quarrel with him. In striking contrast to the trilogy was Schumann's overture to his futile opera "Genoveva," in which he sought to be dramatic, but conspicuously failed in being so. Although the work lacks the tremendous passion that swells through the overture for which he found inspiration in Byron's "Manfred," yet it is pregnant with feeling and couched in lovely and searching phrases. It is absolute music in the best sense of that term, a masterpiece of its kind, and a fine example of Schumann's musicianship in instrumentation. As played by the orchestra, with the utmost regard for all its refinements, it delighted the audience.

In introducing Mme. Samaroff here, Conductor Muck brought to local attention a pianist who has achieved much within her brief professional career and whose ability, as it was disclosed in the Grieg Concerto, induced the wish that she may be frequently heard in our concert rooms. The concerto, one of the most original, spontaneous and fragrant of the Norwegian's works, has served the purposes of many talented and ambitious pianists, and on this occasion it enabled Mme. Samaroff to disclose her technical proficiency, artistic nature and temperamental energy in a manner so engaging and with results so eloquent of the composer's music and intentions as to earn for her several recalls. She can summon to her performance the dynamic power needful to cope with a large orchestra, and in solo passages she can employ a variety of tone color that, coupled with her fleet and sure fingering and expert use of the pedal, gives distinction to her playing.

Dr. Muck is a reposeful conductor, who, by his quiet method in directing, accomplishes more than do most of the flamboyant and showy orchestral leaders. He is free from disturbing mannerisms, and while his strong personality and individuality as a guiding factor is felt in his intepretations, he leaves the impression of having no desire to shine above his associates or to attract attention to himself by indulging in eccentricities.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
STAR
NEW 38

Dr. Karl Muck is becoming very generous to the Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of orchestral novelties, and in the next six concerts no less than eight works new to Boston are to be played. They are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen;" a concerto for violin by d'Ambrosio, which the new second concert-master, Mr. Czerwonky, will play; the Intermezzo Goldoniani by the Italian Bossi; Rheinberger's Concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra; Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption;" a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's Suite Fantastique. There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

From ...

Address ...

Date DEC 15 1907

Dr. Muck is becoming generous to the Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of orchestral novelties, and in the next six concerts no less than eight works new to Boston are being played. They are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen"; a concerto for violin by D'Amrosio, which the new second concertmaster, Mr. Czerwonky, will play; the Intermezzo Goldoniani, by the Italian, Rossi; Rheinberger's Concerto in F major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra; César Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption"; a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's Suite Fantastique. There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

DEC 15 1907

Dr. Muck is generous to the Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in orchestral novelties. In the next six concerts no less than eight works new to Boston are to be played. They are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen"; a concerto for violin by D'Ambrosio, which the new second concertmaster, Czerwonky, will play; the intermezzo "Goldoniani," by the Italian Bossi; Rheinberger's Concerto in F major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra; César Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption"; a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart and Ernest Schelling's "Suite Fantastique." There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

From TOWN & COUNTRY.

Address NEW YORK CITY.

Date DEC 14 1907

At Theater and Concert

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt celebrated their wedding anniversary very quietly with a family box-party at the Columbia Theater. With the President and Mrs. Roosevelt were Miss Ethel, Miss Hagner, Captain Fitzhugh Lee and Theodore Roosevelt, Jr. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a brilliant house for its recent Washington concert. In Mrs. Roosevelt's box were Mrs. Root, the wife of the Secretary of State; Miss Hagner and Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth. Across the way, the Baroness Sternburg occupied a box. Her sister, Miss Langham, accompanied the Baroness. In the audience, one noted Mrs. Churchill Candee, Mrs. Harriet Blaine Beale, Mrs. Julian James, and General and Mrs. Corbin.

Standard Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 15 1907

ment of Haensel and Jones.

Dr. Muck is becoming very generous to the Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of orchestral novelties, and in the next six concerts no less than eight works new to Boston are being played. They are Humperdinck's overture "Heirat Wider Willen;" a concerto for violin by d'Ambrosio, which the new second concert master, Mr. Czerwonky, will play; the intermezzo Goldoniani by the Italian Bossi; Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption;" a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's "Suite Fantastique." There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

ILE ADDRESS, NEW YORK
E" NEW YORK

AMERICAN.

s First Established and Most Complete spaper North Bureau in the World

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 15 1907

Dr. Muck is becoming generous to Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of orchestral novelties, and in the next six concerts no fewer than eight works new to Boston are being played. They are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen"; a concerto for violin by D'Ambrosio, which the new second concertmaster, Mr. Czerwonky, will play; the "Intermezzo Goldoniani," by the Italian, Bossi; Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption"; a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's "Suite Fantastique." There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 14 1907

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is decidedly enterprising in the direction of new compositions this season. Among the novelties which he is to present are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen;" a concerto for violin, by d'Ambrosio, which the new second concertmeister, Mr. Ozerwonky, will play; the "Intermezzo Goldoniana," by the Italian Rossi; Rheinberger's concerto in F-major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption;" a symphony in E-major, by Herman Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's "Suite Fantastique."

From ...

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. DEC 14 1907

Date ...

THE great Polish pianist, Paderewski, was undoubtedly accountable for the tremendous audience which turned out, last week Friday evening, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of its twentieth season in Brooklyn. The capacity of the Baptist Temple was taxed to the utmost and the thought of what might happen in such circumstances in case of a panic, must have recurred to many and given rise to fervent thanks that the long wait for an adequate musical auditorium is nearly over. Even those who were compelled to stand through the concert were amply rewarded, for the program, though putting no great burden upon the analytical faculties of the most erudite, was exquisite and magnificently rendered. Rarely, if ever before, has a Brooklyn audience been stirred to confer upon a musician such a tempest of applause as burst upon Paderewski at the conclusion of the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. It gathered force with every reappearance of the great master to bow his acknowledgements; until the moment before he resumed his seat at the piano it seemed as though the audience was about to cast aside its dignity entirely, rise to its feet and give vocal expression to its enthusiasm after the manner of effete Gauls and other inferior peoples. As an encore Paderewski played Schumann's plaintive "Nachtstuecke," familiar as a melody to all Anglican churchmen as the setting for one of Frances Ridley Havergal's hymns, but with a degree of passionate tenderness all too unfamiliar. The orchestra has, it seems to me, never rendered Beethoven's pastoral symphony with such exquisite perfection and expression as it did under Karl Muck's interpretation last week and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody with which the concert closed was simply "ripping." This is not musical criticism; but simply the impressions of an ignoramus totally unarmed with technical phrases. The rhapsody revived memories of the days when the world was young; of days when visions of ideal loveliness flitted like fairies through mazes of the midnight cotillon, at the Ihpetonka ball; but even the orchestra hidden behind banks of azaleas and other potted plants hardly surpassed Karl Muck and his men unaccompanied by azaleas, visions of loveliness, or Perrier Jouet in the dashing manner with which they rendered the Spanish fantasy. The audience of course included representatives of many of the best known Brooklyn families but as usual only a few could be distinguished in so crowded an audience. Among these may be mentioned; Mr. and Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mr. John Jay Pierrepont, Miss Benson, Miss Hunter, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Mrs. Francis L. Eames, Miss Ethel Eames, Mrs. William H. Newton, Miss Marion Brown, Miss Katharine Perry, Mrs. Alfred T. White, Miss Katharine White, Miss Annie Jean White, Miss Josephine Barr, Miss Antoinette Butler, Miss Mary Packer, Miss Zoe Liebman, Mrs. Philip Ruxton, Mrs. S. E[illegible]d Vernon, Miss Van Bergen, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic W. Hinrichs, Miss Susan Dodge, the Misses Squibb, Miss Sallie Ingalls, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Miss Perkins, Mr. Walter Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Merritt Field, and Mr. and Mrs. H. McK. Miller.

NEWS

ALTIMORE, MD

DEC 21 1907

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on January 8 at the Lyric.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN

BALTIMORE, MD

DEC 22 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 8. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Madame Teresa Carreno.

Pension Fund Concert.

The first Boston Symphony pension fund concert of the season will be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, Dec 29, and this will give the last opportunity of the season to hear Paderewski as he has volunteered his services as soloist on this occasion. Mr Paderewski is redeeming a promise made three years ago. It will be remembered that he was to have played at a pension fund concert in the spring of 1905, but before the date came he had his railroad accident, and had to cancel everything after that. When he expected to come to America last year he said that he would play at a pension fund concert, and when he changed his plans and did not come he promised that during the present season he would give his services to the fund.

Dr Muck is going to make it practically a Paderewski concert. The first number, however, will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. That will be the only orchestral selection. The second number will be Beethoven's [illegible] concerto and after that Mr [illegible]

CALL

NEWARK, N.J

DEC 15 1907

Visits of first-class orchestras to this city are exceedingly rare. There is not usually a sufficiently large number of lovers of purely instrumental music to make such visits profitable. The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, therefore, on Monday evening, in Krueger Auditorium, was a gratifying surprise, which surprise was increased at the size of the audience that assembled to hear this famous organization. It carried the memories of the older concert goers back to the days when the Thomas Orchestra used to come here often under the management of the late J. Leonard Oray, to whom the people of Newark owe many opportunities of hearing the best in the music world.

The program of Monday's concert contained only three compositions, but these filled the evening. They were Vincent D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, after the dramatic poem by Schiller; Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, played by Madame Olga Samaroff, and Schumann's overture to his forgotten opera "Genoveva."

D'Indy belongs to the extreme modern French school which numbers among its adherents such composers as Paul Dukas, Claude Debussy, Alfred Bruneau, Gustav Charpentier, the late Cesar Franck, and some others. These composers are devoted to what is called "program music. They need a picture or a scene or an event to arouse their powers. Not one of them, we imagine, could compose a piece of purely absolute music, in which the music itself should convey its meaning to the hearers without the aid of extraneous matter. Take this "Wallenstein" for an example. The hearer who has no knowledge of Schiller's poem, or has not the printed description of it in his program, hears now and then an interesting melody, occasionally a melodious phrase, fragmentary themes interrupted by great blares of the brass instruments, dissonant chords, harsh harmonies, a great sawing of strings and blowing of wind. What is it all about? The program tells us; this phrase means a monk preaching in the camp, that one, the soldiers jeering the monk and drowning his sermon with their revelry, and so on. Then we hear themes representing lovers, indicating doom, foretelling death, the whole marvelously constructed and woven together, but like a Chinese puzzle to the one who does not have the key in a knowledge of the dramatic foundation.

The old Italian composer Baldassare Galuppi told us that good music consisted of good melody, good harmony and good modulation. That definition is long since out of date. Modern composers work on an entirely different principle. Their melodies are like a few grains of wheat in a bushel of chaff, their harmonies violate every law of the theorists and are usually extremely ugly, there is no such thing as modulation, but they jump from one key to another at will and without any preparation. And we try to persuade ourselves that we like this sort of thing, talk about the wonderful picture drawing, the heavy masses of tone color, the delineation of character in tones, and all the rest of the critical jargon with which we have been filled to surfeit. And then we turn back with a sigh of relief to Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, who needed no program to make their music intelligible.

Of course, it is needless to say that these compositions were well performed. This orchestra is a virtuoso among symphonic orchestras. Whether directed by Dr. Muck, the present conductor, or by Gericke or Nikisch, this orchestra always plays well. It has deservedly won a high reputation and Dr. Muck will doubtless not only conserve that reputation, but also enhance it.

Madame Samaroff, a native American despite her foreign name, played Grieg's concerto with great fire and intensity. Grieg was himself a pianist and wrote his best works for that instrument. He is not a giant among musicians. It has been said of him that he was great in small things and small in great things. In this concerto he reached the summit of his powers. It contains many beauties with much that is redundant and uninteresting. Madame Samaroff showed a thorough understanding of the work and gave it an illuminating interpretation.

Schumann's overture is not often played and the reason is obvious. Schumann's genius was not dramatic. Though everything he wrote had merit he was at his best in the purely romantic.

There seemed to be some good joke going around among the players in the orchestra. Some of them were laughing the whole evening. This did not seem fair to the audience, which should have been let in to the fun that they might have laughed, too.

[illegible]

Washington, [illegible]
Brooklyn and [illegible] have consisted of three [illegible] each, with the exception of New [illegible] when it contained four. The [illegible] formed have been D'Indy's [illegible] stein," twice; Brahms's Sym[illegible]
2, twice; Schumann's overture [illegible]
veva," four times; Lalo's overture [illegible] Roi d'Ys," Bohe's tone poem [illegible] mina," twice; Beethoven's Symp[illegible]
6 (pastoral); Reznicek's Ad[illegible]
Scherzo Finale, twice; Chabrier's [illegible] sody, "Espana," twice; Beethoven's [illegible] pianoforte Concerto, No. 5, three times [illegible] played by Paderewski; Rubinstein's [illegible]
pianoforte Concerto No. 4, three times [illegible] player by Paderewski, and Grieg's Concerto in A minor, played by Madame Samaroff. These programs serve to indicate generally Dr. Muck's fondness for the extremely modern in orchestral music.

BOSTON GLOBE

DECEMBER 16, 1907

APPRECIATIVE AUDIENCE.

Demonstration at Symphony Hall Concert Is Such That Fritz Kreisler Responds to Three Encores.

There were few vacant seats in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, when Fritz Kreisler gave the third of the Sunday afternoon concerts. The audience was so appreciative that the violinist responded to three encores. Gordon Squire was the accompanist.

HERALD

DECEMBER 15

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first Boston Symphony Pension Fund concert of the season will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, the 29th, at 8:15 o'clock. Mr. Paderewski has volunteered his services to be soloist on this occasion. Mr. Paderewski is redeeming a promise made three years ago. It will be remembered he was to have played at a Pension Fund concert in the spring of 1905, but before the date came he had had his railroad accident and had to cancel everything after that. When he expected to come to America last year to play at a few concerts with the orchestra he said that he would also play at a Pension fund concert, and when he changed his plans and did not come over to America he promised that during the present season he would give his services to the fund.

The first number on the programme will of itself attract many people, as it will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. This will be the only orchestral number. The second number will be Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. After that Mr. Paderewski will play what pleases him. The sale of seats is now in progress at Symphony Hall.

Eighth Symphony [illegible]

Edward MacDowell was represented on the eighth Symphony program by his interesting suite in A minor for orchestra. Bizet's dramatic overture "Patrie," and the symphony in F major by Hermann Gotz were the other selections. Mr MacDowell's sad affliction has recently drawn increased attention to his great abilities as a composer and he is now accorded recognition on many programs, not only in this country but abroad, for the widespread sympathy for his misfortune naturally has had a tendency to bring his works into [illegible] favor. His suite in A minor is an [illegible] ic five-part composition, the divisions titles indicating the pastoral nature of the work, which is worked out in such a manner as to make detailed description impossible, the composer not considering the suite as a perfect whole. The titles merely suggest the [illegible] each one standing isolated, as it were, but harmonious in conjunction.

His instrumentation is [illegible] ranged and in each movement [illegible] Dowell has introduced [illegible] many of them quaint, pastoral suggestions for the different choirs of the orchestra. "In a Haunted Forest" the mysterious significance of the [illegible] associated vividly with insistent beats [illegible] instruments; the "Summer Idyl" and "In October" are each treated in strongly contrasted styles, yet there are many hints of close relationship. The charm of "The Song of the Shepherdess" is undeniable, for it is melody in exquisite form, and it was played delightfully and in the "Forest Spirits" the elf gnomes and pixies are set a-dancing to the queerest rhythms and maddest lucky tempos. The performance by the orchestra was one of spirit, charm and finesse and seemed as a sympathetic tribute to one who as artist and man commands the esteem of all.

Bizet's brilliant and fiery "Patrie" overture was invested with becoming vigor, pomp and variations of fortissimo effects allotted to the different instrumental groups and the Gotz symphony went well throughout, the second movement showing up the excellent qualities of the woodwind and horns of the band.

Dr Muck will be generous to the performance of novelties at the concerts since out of four [illegible] three will be heard in Boston for the first time. Moreover, the [illegible] the concerts will have the opportunity to hear as soloist Mr Kreisler, who shares the violins with Mr [illegible] cert master. Mr [illegible] concerto for violin by [illegible] which has never been [illegible] ton, and it is a [illegible] been heard in America.

The first number on the [illegible] the overture to [illegible] latest opera. The other [illegible]

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE

DECEMBER 15, 1907

Symphony Hall Concerts.

The third popular Sunday concert will be given in Symphony hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. There will be only one artist, but this will be Kreisler, whose name should be sufficient to bring out a great audience. This is likely to be Mr Kreisler's last appearance in Boston this year, and it will be the only opportunity to hear him under any conditions at such reasonable prices. His accompanist will be Mr Hadden Squire.

The program is as follows:

Trille du Diable.....Tartini
Concerto No. 2, F sharp minor.....Vieuxtemps
Romance, A major.....Schumann
Larghetto, B flat major.....Weber
Rondo, G major.....Mozart
Siegfied paraphrase.....Wilhelmj
Bohemian fantasie.....Smetana

[illegible]

[20]

From ...

Address ...

Date DEC 15 1907

Dr. Muck is becoming generous to the Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of orchestral novelties, and in the next six concerts no less than eight works new to Boston are being played. They are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat wider Willen"; a concerto for violin by D'Ambrosio, which the new second concertmaster, Mr. Czerwonky, will play; the Intermezzo Goldoniani, by the Italian, Rossi; Rheinberger's Concerto in F major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra; César Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption"; a symphony in E major, by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's Suite Fantastique. There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

The New York Press

NEW YORK CITY.

DEC 15 1907

Liszt.

Dr. Muck is generous to the Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in orchestral novelties. In the next six concerts no less than eight works new to Boston are to be played. They are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen"; a concerto for violin by D'Ambrosio, which the new second concertmaster, Czerwonky, will play; the intermezzo "Goldoniani," by the Italian Bossi; Rheinberger's Concerto in F major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra; César Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption"; a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart and Ernest Schelling's "Suite Fantastique." There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

From TOWN & COUNTRY

Address NEW YORK CITY

Date DEC 14 1907

At Theater and Concert

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt celebrated their wedding anniversary very quietly with a family box-party at the Columbia Theater. With the President and Mrs. Roosevelt were Miss Ethel, Miss Hagner, Captain Fitzhugh Lee and Theodore Roosevelt, Jr. The Boston Symphony Orchestra had a brilliant house for its recent Washington concert. In Mrs. Roosevelt's box were Mrs. Root, the wife of the Secretary of State; Miss Hagner and Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas Longworth. Across the way, the Baroness Sternburg occupied a box. Her guest, Miss Leighton, accompanied the Baroness. In the audience, one noted Mrs. Churchill Candee, Mrs. Harriet Blaine Beale, Mrs. Julian James, and General and Mrs. Corbin.

Star and Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 15 1907

ment of Haensel and Jones.

Dr. Muck is becoming very generous to the Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of orchestral novelties, and in the next six concerts no less than eight works new to Boston are being played. They are Humperdinck's overture "Heirat Wider Willen;" a concerto for violin by d'Ambrosio, which the new second concert master, Mr. Czerwonky, will play; the intermezzo Goldoniani by the Italian Bossi; Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption;" a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schellin's "Suite Fantastique." There are more important novelties to be played toward the end of the season.

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 14 1907

Dr. Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is decidedly enterprising in the direction of new compositions this season. Among the novelties which he is to present are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen;" a concerto for violin, by d'Ambrosio, which the new second concertmeister, Mr. Ozerwonky, will play; the "Intermezzo Goldoniana," by the Italian Rossi; Rheinberger's concerto in F-major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption;" a symphony in E-major, by Herman Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's "Suite Fantastique."

From ...

Address Brooklyn, N. Y. DEC 14 1907

Date ...

THE great Polish pianist, Paderewski, was undoubtedly accountable for the tremendous audience which turned out, last week Friday evening, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of its twentieth season in Brooklyn. The capacity of the Baptist Temple was taxed to the utmost and the thought of what might happen in such circumstances in case of a panic, must have recurred to many and given rise to fervent thanks that the long wait for an adequate musical auditorium is nearly over. Even those who were compelled to stand through the concert were amply rewarded, for the program, though putting no great burden upon the analytical faculties of the most erudite, was exquisite and magnificently rendered. Rarely, if ever before, has a Brooklyn audience been stirred to confer upon a musician such a tempest of applause as burst upon Paderewski at the conclusion of the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. It gathered force with every reappearance of the great master to bow his acknowledgements; until the moment before he resumed his seat at the piano it seemed as though the audience was about to cast aside its dignity entirely, rise to its feet and give vocal expression to its enthusiasm after the manner of effete Gauls and other inferior peoples. As an encore Paderewski played Schumann's plaintive "Nachtstuecke," familiar as a melody to all Anglican churchmen as the setting for one of Frances Ridley Havergal's hymns, but with a degree of passionate tenderness all too unfamiliar. The orchestra has, it seems to me, never rendered Beethoven's pastoral symphony with such exquisite perfection and expression as it did under Karl Muck's interpretation last week and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody with which the concert closed was simply "ripping." This is not musical criticism; but simply the impressions of an ignoramus totally unarmed with technical phrases. The rhapsody revived memories of the days when the world was young; of days when visions of ideal loveliness flitted like fairies through mazes of the midnight cotillon, at the Ihpetonka ball; but even the orchestra hidden behind banks of azaleas and other potted plants hardly surpassed Karl Muck and his men unaccompanied by azaleas, visions of loveliness, or Perrier Jouet in the dashing manner with which they rendered the Spanish fantasy. The audience of course included representatives of many of the best known Brooklyn families but as usual only a few could be distinguished in so crowded an audience. Among these may be mentioned; Mr. and Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mr. John Jay Pierrepont, Miss Benson, Miss Hunter, Mr. and Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Mrs. Francis L. Eames, Miss Ethel Eames, Mrs. William H. Newton, Miss Marion Brown, Miss Katharine Perry, Mrs. Alfred T. White, Miss Katharine White, Miss Annie Jean White, Miss Josephine Barr, Miss Antoinette Butler, Miss Mary Packer Miss Zoe Liebman, Mrs. Philip Ruxton, Mrs. S. E[illegible] Vernon, Miss Van Bergen, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic W. Hinrichs, Miss Susan Dodge, the Misses Squibb, Miss Sallie Ingals, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mr. Thomas S. Perkins, Miss Perkins, Mr. Walter Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Merritt Field, and Mr. and Mrs. H. McK. Miller.

NEWS

DEC 21 1907

The next concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on January 8 at the Lyric.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

AMERICAN

BALTIMORE, MD

DEC 22 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, January 8. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Madame Teresa Carreno.

ILE ADDRESS, "E" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NORTH AMERICAN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 31 1907

Dr. Muck is becoming generous to Boston audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the matter of orchestral novelties, and in the next six concerts no fewer than eight works new to Boston are being played. They are Humperdinck's overture, "Heirat Wider Willen"; a concerto for violin by D'Ambrosio, which the new second concertmaster, Mr. Czerwonky, will play; the "Intermezzo Goldoniani," by the Italian, Bossi; Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption"; a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff; three German dances by Mozart, and Ernest Schelling's "Suite Fantastique."

Pension Fund Concert.

The first Boston Symphony pension fund concert of the season will be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, Dec 29, and this will give the last opportunity of the season to hear Paderewski as he has volunteered his services as soloist on this occasion. Mr Paderewski' is redeeming a promise made three years ago. It will be remembered that he was to have played at a pension fund concert in the spring of 1905, but before the date came he had his railroad accident, and had to cancel everything after that. When he expected to come to America last year he said that he would play at a pension fund concert, and when he changed his plans and did not come, he promised that during the present season he would give his services to the fund.

Dr Muck is going to make it practically a Paderewski concert. The first number, however, will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. That will be the only orchestral selection. The second number will be Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and after that Mr Paderewski will play what pleases him.

[70]

CALL

NEWARK, N.J.

DEC 15 1907

Visits of first-class orchestras to this city are exceedingly rare. There is not usually a sufficiently large number of lovers of purely instrumental music to make such visits profitable. The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, therefore, on Monday evening, in Krueger Auditorium, was a gratifying surprise, which surprise was increased at the size of the audience that assembled to hear this famous organization. It carried the memories of the older concert goers back to the days when the Thomas Orchestra used to come here often under the management of the late J. Leonard Gray, to whom the people of Newark owe many opportunities of hearing the best in the music world.

The program of Monday's concert contained only three compositions, but these filled the evening. They were Vincent D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, after the dramatic poem by Schiller; Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, played by Madame Olga Samaroff, and Schumann's overture to his forgotten opera "Genoveva."

D'Indy belongs to the extreme modern French school which numbers among its adherents such composers as Paul Dukas, Claude Debussy, Alfred Bruneau, Gustav Charpentier, the late Cesar Franck, and some others. These composers are devoted to what is called "program music. They need a picture or a scene or an event to arouse their powers. Not one of them, we imagine, could compose a piece of purely absolute music, in which the music itself should convey its meaning to the hearers without the aid of extraneous matter. Take this "Wallenstein" for an example. The hearer who has no knowledge of Schiller's poem, or has not the printed description of it in his program, hears now and then an interesting melody, occasionally a melodious phrase, fragmentary themes interrupted by great blares of the brass instruments, dissonant chords, harsh harmonies, a great sawing of strings and blowing of wind. What is it all about? The program tells us; this phrase means a monk preaching in the camp, that one, the soldiers jeering the monk and drowning his sermon with their revelry; and so on. Then we hear themes representing lovers, indicating doom, foretelling death, the whole marvelously constructed and woven together, but like a Chinese puzzle to the one who does not have the key in a knowledge of the dramatic foundation.

The old Italian composer Baldassare Galuppi told us that good music consisted of good melody, good harmony and good modulation. That definition is long since out of date. Modern composers work on an entirely different principle. Their melodies are like a few grains of wheat in a bushel of chaff, their harmonies violate every law of the theorists and are usually extremely ugly, there is no such thing as modulation, but they jump from one key to another at will and without any preparation. And we try to persuade ourselves that we like this sort of thing, talk about the wonderful picture drawing, the heavy masses of tone color, the delineation of character in tones, and all the rest of the critical jargon with which we have been filled to surfeit. And then we turn back with a sigh of relief to Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, who needed no program to make their music intelligible.

Of course, it is needless to say that these compositions were well performed. This orchestra is a virtuoso among symphonic orchestras. Whether directed by Dr. Muck, the present conductor, or by Gericke or Nikisch, this orchestra always plays well. It has deservedly won a high reputation and Dr. Muck will doubtless not only conserve that reputation, but also enhance it.

Madame Samaroff, a native American despite her foreign name, played Grieg's concerto with great fire and intensity. Grieg was himself a pianist and wrote his best works for that instrument. He is not a giant among musicians. It has been said of him that he was great in small things and small in great things. In this concerto he reached the summit of his powers. It contains many beauties with much that is redundant and uninteresting. Madame Samaroff showed a thorough understanding of the work and gave it an illuminating interpretation.

Schumann's overture is not often played and the reason is obvious. Schumann's genius was not dramatic. Though everything he wrote had merit he was at his best in the purely romantic.

There seemed to be some good joke going around among the players in the orchestra. Some of them were laughing the whole evening. This did not seem fair to the audience, which should have been let in to the fun that they might have laughed, too.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—DECEMBER 15, 1907

Symphony Hall Concerts.

The third popular Sunday concert will be given in Symphony hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. There will be only one artist, but this will be Kreisler, whose name should be sufficient to bring out a great audience. This is likely to be Mr Kreisler's last appearance in Boston this year, and it will be the only opportunity to hear him under any conditions at such reasonable prices. His accompanist will be Mr Hadden Squire.

The program is as follows:

Trille du Diable	Tartini
Concerto No. 2, F sharp minor	Vieuxtepins
Romance, A major	Schumann
Larghetto, B flat major	Weber
Rondo, G major	Mozart
Siegfied paraphrase	Wilhelmj
Bohemian fantasie	Smetana
Non Piu Mesta	Paganini

Dr. Muck's Taste in Programs.

In the last seven concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, Brooklyn and Newark, the programs have consisted of three compositions each, with the exception of New York, when it contained four. The works performed have been D'Indy's "Wallenstein," twice; Brahms's Symphony No. 2, twice; Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," four times; Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Bohe's tone poem, "Taormina," twice; Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 (pastoral); Reznicek's Adagio and Scherzo Finale, twice; Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana," twice; Beethoven's pianoforte Concerto No. 5, three times, played by Paderewski; Rubinstein's pianoforte Concerto No. 4, three times, played by Paderewski, and Grieg's Concerto in A minor, played by Madame Samaroff. These programs serve to indicate generally Dr. Muck's fondness for the extremely modern in orchestral music.

BOSTON GLOBE—DECEMBER 16, 1907

APPRECIATIVE AUDIENCE.

Demonstration at Symphony Hall Concert is Such That Fritz Kreisler Responds to Three Encores.

There were few vacant seats in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, when Fritz Kreisler gave the third of the Sunday afternoon concerts. The audience was so appreciative that the violinist responded to three encores. Hadden Squire was the accompanist.

HERALD—DECEMBER 15, 1907

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first Boston Symphony Pension Fund concert of the season will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, the 29th, at 8:15 o'clock. Mr. Paderewski has volunteered his services to be soloist on this occasion. Mr. Paderewski is redeeming a promise made three years ago. It will be remembered he was to have played at a Pension Fund concert in the spring of 1905, but before the date came he had had his railroad accident and had to cancel everything after that. When he expected to come to America last year to play at a few concerts with the orchestra he said that he would also play at a Pension fund concert, and when he changed his plans and did not come over to America he promised that during the present season he would give his services to the fund.

The first number on the programme will of itself attract many people, as it will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. This will be the only orchestral number. The second number will be Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. After that Mr. Paderewski will play what pleases him. The sale of seats is now in progress at Symphony Hall.

Eighth Symphony Program.

Edward MacDowell was represented on the eighth Symphony program by his interesting suite in A minor for orchestra. Bizet's dramatic overture, "Patrie," and the symphony in F major by Hermann Gotz were the other selections. Mr MacDowell's sad affliction has recently drawn increased attention to his great abilities as a composer and he is now accorded recognition on many programs, not only in this country but abroad, for the widespread sympathy in his misfortune naturally has had a tendency to bring his works into renewed favor. His suite in A minor is an idyllic five-part composition, the division titles indicating the pastoral nature of the work, which is worked out in such a manner as to make detailed description impossible, the composer not considering the suite as a perfect whole. The titles merely suggest the intent, each one standing isolated, as it were, but harmonious in conjunction.

His instrumentation is skilfully arranged and in each movement Mr MacDowell has introduced beautiful, and many of them quaint, pastoral suggestions for the different choirs of the orchestra. "In a Haunted Forest" has the mysterious significance of the title associated vividly with insistent heavier instruments; the "Summer Idyl" and "In October" are each treated in strongly contrasted styles, yet there are many hints of close relationship. The charm of "The Song of the Shepherdess" is undeniable, for it is melody in exquisite form, and it was played delightfully, and in the "Forest Spirits" the elves, gnomes and pixies are set a-dancing to the queerest rhythms and happy-go-lucky tempos. The performance by the orchestra was one of spirit, charm and finesse and seemed as a sympathetic tribute to one who as artist and man commands the esteem of all.

Bizet's brilliant and fiery "Patrie" overture was invested with becoming vigor, pomp and variations of fortissimo effects allotted to the different instrumental groups and the Gotz symphony went well throughout, the second movement showing up the excellent qualities of the woodwind and horns in the band.

Dr Muck will be generous in his performance of novelties at this week's concerts since out of four numbers three will be heard in Boston for the first time. Moreover, the patrons of the concerts will have the opportunity to hear as soloist Mr Richard Czerwonky, who shares the first desk in the violins with Mr Wendling, the concert master. Mr Czerwonky will play a concerto for violin by d'Ambrosio, a work which has never been heard in Boston, and it is a question if it has been heard in America.

The first number on the program is the overture to Englebert Humperdinck's latest opera, "Heirat Wider Willen." The other novelty will be a set of pieces for the string orchestra by the Italian Bossi, entitled "Intermezzi Goldoniani." Mozart's D [illegible] symphony will close the [illegible]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony Concert.
Programme.

Bizet. Dramatic Overture. "Patrie".
MacDowell. Suite in A minor.
Goetz. Symphony in F.

The concert had the distinction of having the smallest audience that we can remember at any of this series. This was probably due partly to the storm, partly to the prevalence of the grippe, partly to the fact that there was no soloist, partly because of an opera troupe being in Boston, and partly to the fact that the numbers were of only tepid interest. It is a pity, however, that the public should crave a soloist at these important concerts; we find a good orchestral programme to be the beau ideal of such occasions.

But it is a question whether this was a good orchestral programme. All the numbers were in the conservative vein. The last two works had a similarity of scoring. Only the overture employed anything like the full modern orchestra and even that work was less developed than is customary in latter-day composition. We love Bizet as having been the most promising of all the modern Frenchmen, a man with red blood in his veins, a composer who would scorn "la Musique cerebrale" which seems to enchain musical France of today. But "Patrie" is not comparable to some of the other works of this genius. It seems to be "made-to-order" music to which Dr. Muck gave a fictitious value by an excellent reading. Anything better executed than the final great crescendo cannot be imagined.

There is a certain military spirit in the work, the themes are well contrasted, and there is some lamentation in its measures, but it is at no time very convincing or inspired.

MacDowell's Suite was the best work of the evening, yet it is not the best orchestral work of the composer. It suggests the "Im Walde" symphony of MacDowell's friend Raff. It begins with a suggestion of Raff's "Frau Holle". The first movement is a picture of a "Haunted Forest". It is evidently haunted by the ghost of a piccolo-player, but has many poetic touches of gloom and mystery. The second movement is a "Summer Idyll", brief and beautiful. MacDowell does not spin out his thoughts to the interminable length of many moderns; when his tale is told he ends, even if, as in this case, the movement be exceptionally brief. The third movement—"October",—is exhilarating and hearty. It is the most original part of the work and there is nothing in the "Im Walde" symphony at all like it. There is brilliant use made of horn and woodwind, in this movement, and these were exceptionally well-played on this occasion. The contrast of the tender subordinate theme against the hearty and high-spirited chief theme is very effective. But again this movement, "October",—is as brief as if it was February. This is, however, a merit, not a defect.

In the next movement, "The Shepherdess' Song", one naturally expected to hear much of the instrument of innocence and rusticity,—the oboe,—but the composer has given most of the tone-coloring to the flute, with muted strings and horns. The Finale is entitled "Forest Spirits", which, to a Southerner, would suggest Moonshine Whiskey, but these spirits are of a more ethereal order. Although we cannot avoid noticing the kinship with Raff's sylvan spectres, the touches of ghostly revelry are most poetically made, and the movement sparkles from beginning to end. If we hold the "Indian Suite" above this work we must still consider it one of the noble additions to the American repertoire. There was much applause at the end of each movement of the composition.

What an odd thing it is to notice our well-fed composers of today, in receipt of good incomes and plentiful newspaper notices, writing the most bitter and dissonant music, and to note that the sufferers of bygone times, Schubert with his empty pocket-book, Mozart with his constant disappointments, Goetz exhausted with consumption yet forced to do musical duties for daily bread and medicine, all writing beautiful melodies and bright and hopeful themes. There is not a whiff of the charnel-house in any of their works,—that is left for their well-nurtured successors to portray.

Yet we must confess that Goetz's symphony does not wear as well as we had hoped. It is just possible that it lost some of its effect on this occasion by being played after another work of modest scoring and simple effects. It was an especial flute evening, for Goetz uses the instrument very freely and constantly, while it had been prominent in the MacDowell work as well. This gave a trifle of monotony to the tone-color scheme of the evening, but the flute was exceedingly well-played. The horn too was prominent in the Goetz as in the MacDowell composition, and also deserves commendation.

It is a keen satisfaction to think that Goetz found consolation in tones in the midst of his physical misery. The motto upon the symphony seems to show this. It runs,—

"Within thy heart's still, holy chambers, Seek refuge from the stress of Life."

A sentiment which was shared by Schubert when he wrote his beautiful "An die Musik," in which the verse runs,—

"Oft has a sigh from thy great harp immortal
Smoothed out the wrinkles from my troubled brow.
Unlocked for me of Heaven the lofty portal,
Thou Holy Art, I thank thee for it now."

If only some of our professional wailers and pessimists in Art could be induced to look on Music in this light we might have some more beautiful compositions in the near future.

Louis C. Elson.

MR. KREISLER'S CONCERT.

At a popular concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, Fritz Kreisler played the following programme before a large and very friendly audience:—

PROGRAMME.

1. "Trille Du Diable" (Devil's Trill).....Tartini
2. Concerto No. 2, F-sharp minor..Vieuxtemps
   Allegro. Andante. Finale.
3. a. Romance, A major.....Schumann
   b. Larghetto, B-flat major.....Weber
   c. Rondo, G major.....Mozart
4. a. Siegfried Paraphrase.....Wilhelmj
   b. Bohemian Fantasie.....Smetana
   c. Non Piu Mesta.....Paganini

The accompanist was Mr. Haddon Squire, by reason of a flawless technique, a large, warm tone and poetic feeling, together with an excellent stage presence has always been a favorite with Boston audiences.

In a programme of frankly popular appeal the brilliant and difficult Tartini and Paganini pieces found a fitting place, and gave the hearers abundant opportunity to hold their breaths. Especially fine was Mr. Kreisler's playing of the long flageolet tone passages in the Paganini piece.

In the Concerto and the opera selections Mr. Kreisler was ably seconded by the excellent accompaniment of Mr. Haddon Squire.

L. A. B.

KREISLER DELIGHTS HIS SUNDAY AUDIENCE

Symphony Hall Concert Adds New Laurels to Violinist's Successes. Symphony Orchestra's Saturday Concert Triumphs Over Blizzard.

Mr. Mudgett's delightful Sunday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall came to an end temporarily yesterday with the entertainment provided by Fritz Kreisler, the violinist whose present American tour has so far been a series of remarkable successes. The concert was greatly enjoyed by the large audience. The next concert will come after the holidays.

Mr. Kreisler played yesterday Tartini's "Devil's Trill," Vieuxtemps' Concerto in F sharp minor, Schumann's Romance in A major, Weber's Larghetto in B flat, Mozart's Rondo in G major, Wilhelmj's "Siegfried Paraphrase," Smetana's Bohemian Fantasy and Paganini's "Non piu mesta." The technical and interpretive sides of his peerless art were displayed to everyone's delight. Haddon Squire's accompaniments were also praiseworthy.

PATRONS BRAVE BLIZZARD FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

In spite of the heavy storm and the fact that there was no soloist to attract the hero-worshipers, there was a good-sized audience at the Symphony concert Saturday evening. Those who did brave the show and the blow were amply repaid for their trouble in hearing a splendid performance of MacDowell's A minor Suite, which had not been played by the Symphony Orchestra for several years.

Just at this time owing to the unfortunate affliction which clouded the intellect of this foremost American composer, there is a general revival of interest in his works. That many of those present Saturday night had never before heard the Suite was evident by the spontaneous applause which followed the playing of each of the five movements and by the many comments heard. MacDowell is at his best when writing of the woodland with its sprites and its elves and of the lowlands with its calm and indolence. In his A minor, beginning with its weird and uncanny Haunted Forest movement and closing with the vivacious Forest Spirits, he has given his vivid imagination full play and painted with those high colors which make his music so attractive.

The program opened with Bizet's Patrie overture and closed with the Goetz symphony in F major. Both works are familiar to Symphony audiences. The Symphony was particularly well played by the strings.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

(From Mr. Elson's criticism in the Daily Advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage."
D'Ambrosio—Violin Concerto, B minor.
Mr. Richard Czerwonky, Soloist.
Bossi—Goldonian Intermezzi for Strings.
Mozart—Symphony in D major.

Oh Humperdinck! Oh Humperdinck!
Your Muse has given out, I thinck.
'Tis very evident your pate'll
Not make another "Hans and Gretel."

Humperdinck, like Mascagni, is a "single-speech Hamilton". There is nothing in this overture that is as effective as the climax of the Prelude to his own "Haensel and Gretel". Everything is artificial and manufactured without inspiration. There is a strong flavor of "Yankee Doodle" in the second theme, which awakens a languid interest in the American breast. It may be remembered, by the way, that the Germans have a cheap "Gassenhauer" (street melody) that is like our tune, which led to the false statement that it was brought over here by the Hessians during the Revolution. Something very like "Yankee Doodle" was used by Beethoven as the chief theme of the finale of the Ninth symphony. The overture was well played and abundantly applauded, but we hope never to hear its conventionalities again.

Italian instrumental composers are scarce and violin concertos are scarcer, therefore we cordially welcome an Italian who has written a classical concerto. D'Ambrosio's concerto opens with a long "tutti" (orchestra alone) which gives the waiting soloist a good chance to get nervous. But if Mr. Czerwonky got nervous at all he did not show it, for he played with fire and breadth from the very first.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the eighth Symphony rehearsal and concert was as follows: Overture, "Patrie," Bizet; suite in A minor, op. 42, MacDowell; symphony in F major, op. 9, Goetz.

The overture "Patrie" is music for the holiday, the public square and the brass band. It is a plausible, even "soulful" work of art, it is clearly, brilliantly thought out, both as regards form and instrumentation; it would undoubtedly arouse sympathies and emotions of the many-headed. But how far, how very far, is this from the wonderful orchestral music to "L'Arlessienne"! A pot-boiler by comparison.

Between the overture and the Goetz symphony MacDowell's suite stood out, the vital part of the programme. This suite is a series of short, fanciful sketches, headed by the following titles, poetic indications: "In a Haunted Forest," "Summer Idyl," "In October," "The Shepherdess Song," "Forest Sprites." At once we are transported to another realm where nature, undefiled, reigns supreme, where the poet's fantasy plays free and unfettered by the tawdry and impure, translating these essences into forms almost as impalpable. It is not hard on hearing this music to appreciate the truth of the letter concerning MacDowell which is quoted by the programmatist. Some sentences follow: "Deep in his heart he half believed the old tales of spirits and fairies—of course, not in his ordinary moods, but his imagination often carried him very far, even though he might laugh at himself. He hated cutting down a big tree; it seemed possible that something more than the tree suffered."

These sketches savor more of impromptu inspiration than ambitious design; their basic material is often of slight weight, but what a rich, albeit delicate, imagination glows through the measures, and what exquisite feeling for orchestral colors! Think of the thrilling possibilities of "A Haunted Forest," and the captivating lilt of the "Summer Idyl." "In October" was written some time after the other movements, and added to them after some indecision on the part of the composer. It could not well be spared, for he has caught with rare felicity the sad joyousness, the gray and gold, the vigor of the fresh wind, the sunset glories of the autumn month; and you will not forget the loving musing of the contrasting middle section. "A Shepherdess Song" that is not in 6-8 rhythm and that is not inexorably purposed to suggest knee kilts and panpipes! Oh, joy! Finally, the flittings of merry forest elves. Well, there should be more such music!

How few things escape the scythe of time, and what an intrinsically noble composition the Goetz symphony is! Such a fine sense of proportion, such masterly and free handling of the form are not always found, even among the works of the great ones. Sincerity and humanity—Melody, too, gentlemen of today!—speak from every line, and yet—it is music of another time and another sphere, and many of its beauties fell on deaf ears yesterday.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The first Pension Fund concert by the Symphony Orchestra this season will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, Dec. 29, at 8:15. Ignace Jan Pederewski will be soloist, on which occasion he will appear for the last time this winter in this city. It will be remembered that in 1905 Mr. Paderewski was involved in a serious railway accident, just previous to an expected appearance at one of these concerts. The present agreement is partly in the nature of the fulfilment of a pledge made at the time, a promise that he would ultimately act upon his original intention in proferring his services. Tchaikowski's "Symphonie Pathetique," which received such a stirring performance last winter at one of the Symphony concerts, will be the only purely orchestra number on the programme. Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto" will follow, and Mr. Paderewski will play other pieces that will be later designated.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK

At Symphony Hall at 3 this afternoon will take place the third of the popular Sunday concerts. Mr. Fritz Kreisler, violinist, plays the following programme:

1. "Trille du Diable" (Devil's Trill)....Tartini
2. Concerto No. 2, F-sharp miner..Vieuxtemps
   Allegro. Audante. Finale.
3. a—Romance, A major.....Schumann
   b—Larghetto, B-flat major.....Weber
   c—Rondo—G major.....Mozart
4. a—Siegfried Paraphrase.....Wilhelmj
   b—Bohemian Fantasie.....Smetana
   c—Non Piu Mesta.....Paganini

The accompanist will be Mr. Haddon Squire.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra will give an interesting programme consisting of three compositions that will be played for the first time: Overture, "Die Heirath wider Willen," Humperdinck; concerto for violin, A. d'Ambrosia; intermezzo, Goldomani, for string orchestra, E. Bossi; and Mozart's symphony in D major, No. 38 (Kochel 504). Mr. Richard Czerwonky, the new second concertmeister, will be soloist.

The Symphony Concert

The veterans of the Symphony Concerts, who knew them in the old Music Hall, as well as in their present abiding place, could recall no such small audience as that which assembled on Saturday night, while even on Friday afternoon, by unusual exception, only a part of the "rush" seats in the second balcony were sold. Christmas with its preoccupations is at hand, an opera company is visiting us, Saturday evening was stormy, and the programme in itself was not especially tempting. Thus conspiring circumstance left many and long gaps in the audience; the hall was barely half filled; and certainly Dr. Muck in all his experience in America had never before conducted to so small a company. It was a new sensation equally for the men, and it was good to see that the number of their hearers in no way affected either their zeal or their pains. Often, in fact, they and the conductor seemed more interested than did the audience.

The causes were not far to seek. Only an orchestra of Frenchmen under a French conductor playing to a French audience can give the true thrill to Bizet's overture, "Patrie," which began the concert. Our own conductor and our own men played it dramatically enough to our audience, but to all three, with a few exceptions, it was only a warmly-colored concert piece. It was eloquent in the conventional sense, but in a concert in Paris, even after thirty years, each man on the stage brings to it an individual eloquence, and each listener an individual response, that used to make the stuffy air of the old Chatelet Theatre electric. The coolest-blooded foreigner felt the emotional tingle and for the moment there was no other country to the whole audience but the "Patrie" of Bizet. Saturday evening most of us only listened, and we only listened again to Goetz's pretty symphony. True, it was hailed as a masterpiece when it was going the rounds of European concerts in the seventies and eighties, and Mr. Weingartner will still have it so. But there have been so many masterpieces in their day that somehow time—the deliberate, slow-working judge—reduces only to pleasurable prettiness, and Goetz's symphony, even with all the charm Dr. Muck and the band gave to it, seems one of them. It has not exactly faded; it has only lost the factitious glamour that used to hang like a halo about it. MacDowell's early suite—the suite of the woodlands that made the third number of the concert—has better withstood the discriminating years. It is fancifully imagined and fancifully expressed music still, but even so is its idiom quite of our time or of the immortal musical speech that knows no years?

H. T. P.

Symphony Hall: Mr. Kreisler

Mr. Kreisler was the virtuoso in his finest estate in the concert that he gave in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to an audience the numbers and interest of which attested once more that no city in America hears him so gladly as does Boston. For once he forsook his old classics of the violin and none of the music on his list was of much significance in itself. All were virtuoso pieces—Tartini's "Devil's Trill," Vieuxtemps's concerto in F-sharp minor, Wilhelmj's "Siegfried Paraphrase," Smetana's "Bohemian Fantasy," Paganini's bedecking and befuddling of Figaro's tune, "Non piu Mesta," a "romance" from Schumann, a larghetto from Weber, a rondo from Mozart. In nearly all these, even in the last three, the virtue of the music is in the playing of it. The violinist and the violin must give them voice. It were a late day to dwell upon Mr. Kreisler's mastery of his instrument. The technical sorcery of Paganini, the technical fertility of Vieuxtemps, and the technical felicities of Wilhelmj lie alike within his powers. He achieves them all with an ease and certainty that make these "display" pieces seem no display either of the violinist or his instrument. They become a natural speech, even a speech that is expressive of more than sure and adroit dexterity. On the printed page they are contrivance. Heard yesterday at Mr. Kreisler's hands they seemed magical improvisations. The violinist—not the composer—was inventing them, making them, writing them in tones in which the violin was finding new accents, new inflections, new shadings for its voice. The process was rapturous and rhapsodic for the violinist. He seemed to be creating, and we hearers to be watching the music find form and voice at his touch. And he was most rapturous and rhapsodic of all in Tartini's "Devil's Trill." Liszt called some of his piano pieces "transcendent" studies, and there is something equally transcendent in the technical qualities of Tartini's piece. To write it, play it, hear it is an emotion itself and it was that emotion at its fullest that Mr. Kreisler kindled, maintained and heightened at the end to rhapsody itself. So again, a gypsy in spirit, in spite of frock-coat and all the rest, he improvised Smetana's fantasy. And for repose in the midst of all this technical rhapsodizing, were the three little pieces of Weber, Schumann and Mozart. Then Mr. Kreisler set his violin to the beauty of pure and undulating tone. The magic of his technique had recreated the "display" pieces. Now he summoned the equal and animating magic of his tone.

H. T. P.

Beside the three new pieces that stand on the programme of the next Symphony Concerts, Dr. Muck has in hand for the weeks to come a concerto by Rheinberger for organ, three horns and string orchestra, three German dances by Mozart, Franck's tone-poem, "The Redemption," a new symphony by Bischoff that is making the round of orchestral concerts in Germany, and a "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, the pianist, in which he himself will play the solo part. All these pieces are new to our concerts.

[91]

CONCERT WITHOUT NOVELTY, SOLOIST

Eighth Symphony Performance Had Restful, So[illegible] ing Programme.

STORM INTERFERED WITH ATTENDANCE

Bizet's Overture, MacDowell's Suite in A Minor and Goetz's Symphony Well Played.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Our Country".....Bizet
Suite in A minor, No. 1.....MacDowell
Symphony in F major.....Goetz

Bizet's overture is seldom played in this country. I recall two performances in Boston. For a few years after the Franco-Prussian war the piece was popular in France, but whether this popularity were due to patriotism or to musical enjoyment would be hard to say. "Patrie" should perhaps be Englished "Fatherland," but as this word is commonly associated with Germany, the translation would here be inappropriate, if not ironical. It is said that the music depicts the woe and agony of conquered France; that it also expresses the belief in her restoration to rank and fame among the nations.

Music in these days is supposed to be capable of expressing everything—except, in some instances, music. Bizet was a true patriot, and he felt the shame and agony of his country. There is no evidence that he had any special programme in his mind. Pasdeloup asked him to write an overture for performance and he wrote one, as Massenet wrote at the same time his "Phedre" and Guiraud an overture that was not entitled until some time after the performance.

Music Perfunctory.

A Bostonian hearing the "Patrie" overture in 1907 is concerned with it simply as music. Does it interest him? Does it thrill him? Or is the music finely imagined and eloquently expressed?

The overture is not to be ranked with Bizet's best work. The opening arouses anticipation, but the second theme is not a salient one, nor is the treatment of it striking. The lamentation section is not significant, and the final apotheosis while it is sturdy, is not heroic. In spite of what has been said by commentators and biographers concerning Bizet's emotions while he was at work on the overture, the music seems more or less perfunctory. We have heard more stirring performances of it than that of last night.

And here might be a long discussion of the question whether orchestral or vocal music that is deliberately patriotic is often successful and whether it often has any life beyond the occasion that produced it? I refer to works of reasonably long breath, not to patriotic songs, hymns, anthems.

Suite by MacDowell.

While the first suite of MacDowell shows in a certain measure the influence of Raff, his teacher and friend, and also occasionally his admiration for Wagner, it contains much music of the character that individualizes the later music of MacDowell: music that suggests faces and phases of nature, joy in out-of-door life, thoughts of the forest and its mysterious sounds and of its inhabitants that are not seen by grosser eyes.

The Scottish blood in MacDowell, as his wife wrote to the editor of the programme book, had filled his mind with mysticism. The strange people of the woods were known to him, and it is not surprising that today the first and the last movements of the suite are the most striking and imaginative: "In a Haunted Forest" and "Forest Spirits." The other movements contain music that is pretty and some music that is beautiful in an idyllic way. There are buoyant pages in the third movement "In October."

Goetz's Symphony.

The poverty and misery of Goetz's life were perhaps fortunate for his reputation after death. His opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," was named a masterpiece, though I confess I could not find it a sympathetic treatment of Shakespeare's comedy-farce, when I heard the opera in Dresden, nor did the greater part of the music seem operatically effective, without any reference to the manner in which the composer understood the play.

The symphony played last night was also popular for a time; it was even fashionable. Extraordinary things were said in its praise. The symphony has been played here at these concerts five or six times. It is now nearly 40 years old, and the most that can be said of the greater part of it is that it is pleasant music fitted to inspire agreeable contemplation of almost anything while the orchestra is playing.

The Intermezzo has given delight to many, yet it now seems obvious, if not commonplace. The sentiment of the trio is that of the German male quartet hymning the praise of nature, while the landscape is seen from a beer garden with wooden crickets to keep the feet of the women from dampness, and there is knitting, and there is a mighty consumption of veal, sliced and cold, or in the form of a Schnitzel crowned with a dropped egg.

A Sad Fate.

It is a sad fate to be poor and neglected and sick in mind and body. It [illegible] still sadder fate to [illegible] consoled by the thought that the music neglected while the composer is living will rise to immortality after his death. Goetz was an honest musician. The story of his life will excite sympathy when his works are forgotten.

There were very many vacant seats on account of the disagreeable weather, but the spirit of Dr. Muck and his men was not daunted. While the programme was by no means a brilliant one, it was restful and the pieces were for the most part well played.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT
DECEMBER 21, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

YOUTH, A VIOLIN CONCERTO AND MR. CZERWONKY

A New Impression Yesterday Afternoon in the Young Violinist—The Brightness and Charm of His Playing—A New Overture by Humperdinck and Six Pieces by a New Italian Composer, with Mozart for a Foil

Mr. Czerwonky brought a new impression, almost a new sensation, to the Symphony Concert of yesterday. It was the [illegible] of youth, and youth is a comparatively new and strange thing there. Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings through the winter Symphony Hall is truly the dwelling-place of the middle-aged. Bid a visiting stranger to his first Symphony Concert, and the chances are ten to one that when he recounts his observations, he will call the audience, be it of the afternoon or of the evening, middle-aged. When the orchestra went last winter for the first time in thirteen years to Chicago, two or three of the reviewers, receiving also a first impression, called it middle-aged of aspect. We have chiefly eminent singers and virtuosi for "soloists" nowadays, and they have usually spent their youth in the gaining of the eminence that gives them a place at our concerts. The changes that Dr. Muck has made in the personnel of the band have made it less middle-aged to the eye and the ear, and there is youth still—forty or no forties—in the conductor himself. And yesterday, in Mr. Czerwonky of the first violins, youth came to be the "soloist." The omniscient programme-book averred that he was only one-and-twenty, and doubtless could have documented the fact. Fellow-members of the orchestra inquired eagerly and with a touch of personal liking how "the boy" had played. There was no need of the date and the phrase. Youth spoke unmistakably in Mr. Czerwonky, and equally to the eye and the ear, and the Symphony Concert was fresher and a more human for its presence. It was a novel and pleasurable thing to see his young face with its boyish heap of blonde hair and his youthful carriage. It was better still to watch the blending of youthful diffidence and youthful confidence in him; to see his fine and absorbed ardor in his work—if ever a violinst played for all that was in him it was Mr. Czerwonky yesterday—and good even to hear the little sigh of relief when he had carried himself, evidently as he wished, through two movements of his chosen concerto. As youthfully, bravely and ably he went on to the end, and then his boyish pleasure in the applause that twice and thrice recalled him was as honest and modest as his playing. From the beginning it was impossible to hear him without sympathy. At the end his pleasure was infectious.

And no one but a youth would have chosen the concerto that Mr. Czerwonky chose and played it as he did. A certain d'Ambrosio wrote it who dwells at Nice, after a Parisian schooling, and makes little pieces for the violin, the piano, and even the orchestra with a concerto, as it appears, and a ballet, as the programme-book records, on occasion. Mr. d'Ambrosio has written a sounding concerto. It courts the voice of the violin and it follows the idiom of the instrument. It invites a supple and resourceful but not a showy technique. The composer labels the beginning "Grandioso" and aspires in it to large and sustained utterance. Exaltation of matter or manner is hard to hear in it, but the music "sounds" with ample rhetoric. The concerto proceeds in contemplative, almost melancholy vein, and the slow song of the violin has an amiably pensive charm. Then for foil comes a finale of quicker pace and lighter mood in which there is as amiably rhythmic diversion. A pretty and attractive concerto, a drawing-room concerto, so to say, tempting a young violinist with becoming superficial allurements, and never once leading him beyond his depths. As music it has neither bone nor sinew, but it has a pleasing surface, and Mr. Czerwonky skimmed it as pleasingly. His tone is bright, clear and warm. It flows smoothly to the melodic line; it is supple in arabesque and tracery; it has light and shade and rhythmic sensitiveness. It adjusted itself to the harmonic background. It had an unforced youthful dignity at the beginning; it gained songful quality in the slow movement; and it had a pretty elasticity and sparkle in the finale. Not once did Mr. Czerwonky seek to display his technical resources, yet they served him with variety and surety. He plied them with a youthful intentness; he caught the sentiment of the music eagerly and warmly; and his young absorption in it won the audience to his faith and liking for it. By his playing and personality he made it articulate and agreeable. Enough of the masters of music have written concertos for mature violinists. Mr. d'Ambrosio was written a young concerto, and he was fortunate to have such sympathetic youth as Mr. Czerwonky's to bring it to speech and charm.

Mr. Muck in his turn was fortunate as [illegible] another new piece that was interesting—the overture to the opera "Die Heirat durch Heirat" ("Forced Marriage") by Humperdinck, made out [illegible] has hardly lingered in the repertory of the German theatres that have mounted it; and the overture—an after thought—has already become a concert piece. A fresher Humperdinck seems to write in it than we in Boston have heard for long. This time he is not writing an opera of children, witches and fairies out of German folk-lore or contriving a Moorish Rhapsody, or dreaming over the fortunes of royal children to whom fate has been unkind. And for once he does not walk the straight and narrow way of the Wagnerian disciple. The music is still sonorous and warm and rich of instrumental dress, but it sounds with its own voice. Distinctly it is the overture to a light and elegant operatic comedy, graceful, animated, touched now with sentiment and now with ardor, hinting for a moment at shadows and then running away with gayety and high spirits. It had its verve and almost its brilliance as Dr. Muck and his men played it. Distinctly it brought the mood of light and spirited comedy. And whenever Dr. Muck plays an operatic overture, it sounds of the theatre and leads straight toward a rising curtain.

The other new piece—there were three on the programme—came from an unfamiliar hand. Enrico Bossi is an Italian composer, teacher, organist and conductor who seems to bask simultaneously in the favor of court, church, choral societies and conductors. He has written prolifically in many styles and in many forms, and his orchestral and choral pieces—he has forsworn opera since his youth—are one of the fashions of the hour in German concert-rooms. Out of them came the "Intermezzi Goldoniani" played yesterday in all probability for the first time in America. They are not incidental or entr'acte music for any of Goldoni's comedies, and there is no reason to believe that they have ever been played with them. Rather the moods of the six "intermezzi" are a few of the moods of Goldoni's many pieces. He, for example, could write on occasion with the artificial charm and the aristocratic grace of his own eighteenth century. Accordingly, some of the "intermezzi" follow the old dance forms—a minuet or a galliard. Goldoni, and to this day in the popular theatres of Venice, could be riotously humorous, and Bossi makes a burlesca for ending. Goldoni could play with pretty amorous sentiment, and one intermezzo is a tinkling serenade. Goldoni loved the humors of the people as well as the elegance of their betters, and Bossi sets a musetta a-piping. Bland was Goldoni, and bland often is Bossi's music. And so forth and so on—artificial pieces all, changeful and amusing to hear, going and coming and leaving clearest impression of the aptness with which the conductor and his men played them. They, more than the fecund and playful Bossi, gave them bland elegance or sparkling piquancy or gay fun. Engaging, but a little labored trifler, singularly un-Italian in voice, easily diverting to hear and as easy to forget. Bossi made his music, and were Dr. Muck [illegible] a less conscientious [illegible] uctor, dutiful to every sort of piece and ev[illegible] composer that he chooses, it would be easy [illegible] suspect that he had placed the spontaneous, [illegible] laborless Mozart of the symphony in D m[illegible]r a little maliciously at the Italian's heels. Bossi had been contriving his eighteenth century blandishments and graces, and they were a perfect sham. Now they were the light breath of Mozart's life; he could not help idealizing them; he put them into tones, and lo! they are alive in 1907. H. T. P.

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

Franck's [illegible] at the [illegible] Symphony Concerts—A Recital by Ma[illegible]d—The Announcements for January—Harold Bauer's Return—Schumann-Heink Hand

The "revoiced" and generally renovated organ in Symphony Hall is to be duly exhibited and tested at the Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, in the hope that it will prove a submissive and expressive instrument after long intractability and somnolence. Mr. Wallace Goodrich is to be the organist, and he is to play Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ alone and to carry the organ part in Rheinberger's concerto for organ, three horns and string orchestra—a piece both new and novel to the Symphony concerts. Novel as well, as the programmes go, is a concerto by Händel for two wind choirs and string orchestra. Thus, the only piece on the programme that calls for the band in its normal estate is César Franck's tone-poem, "The Redemption." In its original form it made the second part of a "symphonic poem" for chorus, solo voice and orchestra, in which Franck would hymn the two Redemptions—that wrought by the coming of the Christ to men and that which men may gain in after-ages by prayer. The first part sang the coming of the Saviour to a world that pursued vain pleasures and vain beliefs. The third sang the new redemption of forgiveness, proclaimed by angelic voices. Between the two stands an orchestral piece, in which Franck sought to make his music speak the joy of men under the words of the Christ; their triumphant faith and then their lapse into the old pleasures and gropings. It is this orchestral piece that Dr. Muck and his men are to play, and it is new to our concerts.

[illegible] DECEMBER [illegible]

[illegible] hall is to be duly exhibited and tested at the Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, in the hope that it will prove a submissive and expressive instrument after long intractability and somnolence. Mr. Wallace Goodrich is to be the organist, and he is to play Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ alone and to carry the organ part in Rheinberger's concerto for organ, three horns and string orchestra—a piece both new and novel to the Symphony concerts. Novel as well, as the programmes go, is a concerto by Händel for two wind choirs and string orchestra. Thus, the only piece on the programme that calls for the band in its normal estate is César Franck's tone-poem, "The Redemption." In its original form it made the second part of a "symphonic poem" for chorus, solo voice and orchestra, in which Franck would hymn the two Redemptions—that wrought by the coming of the Christ to men and that which men may gain in after-ages by prayer. The first part sang the coming of the Saviour to a world that pursued vain pleasures and vain beliefs. The third sang the new redemption of forgiveness, proclaimed by angelic voices. Between the two stands an orchestral piece, in which Franck sought to make his music speak the joy of men under the words of the Christ; their triumphant faith and then their lapse into the old pleasures and gropings. It is this orchestral piece that Dr. Muck and his men are to play, and it is new to our concerts.

[illegible] has been set to [illegible] [illegible]rous organ in Symphony Hall, it [illegible] been "revoiced"; the wind pressure [illegible] been increased; and henceforth it is [illegible] as obedient as a good organ should be [illegible] the organist's will. Dr. Muck has [illegible] gained enough confidence in it to test it [illegible] the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 27 and 28. Then he has put on his programme Bach's "Toccata" and "Fugue" in D minor for the organ alone, and Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra. Mr. Wallace Goodrich, as heretofore, will be the organist. On the same programme also stands César Franck's tone-poem, "The Redemption," which he remodelled from his like-named piece for chorus and orchestra. It is new to Boston, and with it Dr. Muck will attempt for the first time here the perilous task of conducting Franck's mystical music.

Mr. Paderewski is to play as many solo pieces as he likes at his concert with the Symphony Orchestra, on Dec. 29, for the benefit of its Pension Fund. No announcement of them appears on the programme, because after he has played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto with the orchestra, the pianist will be left to choose what, and as many, extra pieces as he will. It is new custom of several German orchestras to order their programmes so when an eminent virtuoso appears with them, and Dr. Muck, Mr. Paderewski and the managers of the Pension Fund have wisely chosen to follow it.

The next concert of the Longy Club of virtuosi on wind instruments falls on Monday evening, Dec. 30, at Potter Hall, and at it music by Wolf-Ferrari, the half-Italian, half-German composer, who is gaining firm reputation in Europe, will be heard for the first time here. The particular piece is his "chamber symphony" for piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, double bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. For it, a quintet of strings will assist the Longy Club. Before long, we hope to give our readers some particulars of Wolf-Ferrari and his work. A fortnight ago his choral setting of Dante's "New Life" much impressed many who heard it at the concert of the Oratorio Society in New York, and among them the conductor of our own Cecilia.

BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY
DECEMBER 23, 1907

NOVELTIES ON THE SYMPHONY'S BILL

Second Concert Master Czerwonky Made His Debut as Soloist at Saturday Night's Concert.

Three of the four numbers on the Symphony program Saturday night were novelties—the overture to Humperdinck's opera, "The Forced Marriage," the Goldonian Intermezzi by Enrico Bossi and Alfred d'Ambrosio's Concerto in B minor, for violin and orchestra. The classical number was Mozart's ever beautiful Symphony in D major.

Richard Czerwonky, the second concert master of the orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in this country in the d'Ambrosio concerto. Mr. Czerwonky, who is 21 years old, played in a lively, graceful and tasteful manner. The concerto itself is not a very impressive work. Of the novelties, indeed, the best impression was made by the Intermezzi by Bossi, who, by the way, is a famous Italian organist. The six little pieces fairly bubbled with beauty. Their delightful spirit infected both orchestra and audience, and so the performance of them proved one of the greatest pleasures of the Symphony season so far. The Humperdinck work realized the most favorable expectations, being sprightly, tuneful and worked out in a masterly fashion. Dr. Muck read this and the other numbers with characteristic enthusiasm.

An organ solo will be a feature of next Saturday's concert. Wallace Goodrich, one of Boston's leading musicians, will play Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor. There will also be two more novelties on the program, Rheinberger's Concerto for organ, three horns and string orchestra, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem from "The Redemption." The other number will be Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra.

Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
ss
DEC 22 1907

[illegible] people not indirectly [illegible] in the business have any idea of the important part that women are taking in music in this country, in the business side of music. Managers having artists to place do at least half their local business with women, and most satisfactorily is it done, as a general rule. Illustrative of this is the coming Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be made in the last week of January. The orchestra will give six concerts on six successive days, in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and two in Cincinnati. Five of these concerts are under local direction of women, all of whom are taking large risks in bringing to their respective cities so expensive an organization. These five concerts are in Buffalo, Indianapolis, Columbus and the two in Cincinnati. Local management of musical affairs has opened up a wide field of usefulness to many women in all parts of the country [illegible] very few of them [illegible] made

[92]

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, DECEMBER 15, 1907.

CONCERT WITHOUT NOVELTY, SOLOIST

Eighth Symphony Performance Had Restful, Soothing Programme.

STORM INTERFERED WITH ATTENDANCE

Bizet's Overture, MacDowell's Suite in A Minor and Goetz's Symphony Well Played.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Our Country".....Bizet
Suite in A minor, No. 1.....MacDowell
Symphony in F major.....Goetz

Bizet's overture is seldom played in this country. I recall two performances in Boston. For a few years after the Franco-Prussian war the piece was popular in France, but whether this popularity were due to patriotism or to musical enjoyment would be hard to say. "Patrie" should perhaps be Englished "Fatherland," but as this word is commonly associated with Germany, the translation would here be inappropriate, if not ironical. It is said that the music depicts the woe and agony of conquered France; that it also expresses the belief in her restoration to rank and fame among the nations.

Music in these days is supposed to be capable of expressing everything—except, in some instances, music. Bizet was a true patriot, and he felt the shame and agony of his country. There is no evidence that he had any special programme in his mind. Pasdeloup asked him to write an overture for performance and he wrote one, as Massenet wrote at the same time his "Phedre" and Guiraud an overture that was not entitled until some time after the performance.

Music Perfunctory.

A Bostonian hearing the "Patrie" overture in 1907 is concerned with it simply as music. Does it interest him? Does it thrill him? Or is the music finely imagined and eloquently expressed?

The overture is not to be ranked with Bizet's best work. The opening arouses anticipation, but the second theme is not a salient one, nor is the treatment of it striking. The lamentation section is not significant, and the final apotheosis while it is sturdy, is not heroic. In spite of what has been said by commentators and biographers concerning Bizet's emotions while he was at work on the overture, the music seems more or less perfunctory. We have heard more stirring performances of it than that of last night.

And here might be a long discussion of the question whether orchestral or vocal music that is deliberately patriotic is often successful and whether it often has any life beyond the occasion that produced it? I refer to works of reasonably long breath, not to patriotic songs, hymns, anthems.

Suite by MacDowell.

While the first suite of MacDowell shows in a certain measure the influence of Raff, his teacher and friend, and also occasionally his admiration for Wagner, it contains much music of the character that individualizes the later music of MacDowell: music that suggests faces and phases of nature, joy in out-of-door life, thoughts of the forest and its mysterious sounds and of its inhabitants that are not seen by grosser eyes.

The Scottish blood in MacDowell, as his wife wrote to the editor of the programme book, had filled his mind with mysticism. The strange people of the woods were known to him, and it is not surprising that today the first and the last movements of the suite are the most striking and imaginative: "In a Haunted Forest" and "Forest Spirits." The other movements contain music that is pretty and some music that is beautiful in an idyllic way. There are buoyant pages in the third movement "In October."

Goetz's Symphony.

The poverty and misery of Goetz's life were perhaps fortunate for his reputation after death. His opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," was named a masterpiece, though I confess I could not find it a sympathetic treatment of Shakespeare's comedy-farce, when I heard the opera in Dresden, nor did the greater part of the music seem operatically effective, without any reference to the manner in which the composer understood the play.

The symphony played last night was also popular for a time; it was even fashionable. Extraordinary things were said in its praise. The symphony has been played here at these concerts five or six times. It is now nearly 40 years old, and the most that can be said of the greater part of it is that it is pleasant music fitted to inspire agreeable contemplation of almost anything while the orchestra is playing.

The Intermezzo has given delight to many, yet it now seems obvious, if not commonplace. The sentiment of the trios is that of the German male quartet hymning the praise of nature, while the landscape is seen from a beer garden with wooden crickets to keep the feet of the women from dampness, and there is knitting, and there is a mighty consumption of veal, sliced and cold, or in the form of a Schnitzel crowned with a dropped egg.

A Sad Fate.

It is a sad fate to be poor and neglected and sick in mind and body. It is perhaps a still sadder fate to be consoled by the thought that the music neglected while the composer is living will rise to immortality after his death. Goetz was an honest musician. The story of his life will excite sympathy when his works are forgotten.

There were very many vacant seats on account of the disagreeable weather, but the spirit of Dr. Muck and his men was not daunted. While the programme was by no means a brilliant one, it was restful and the pieces were for the most part well played.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
DECEMBER 21, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

YOUTH, A VIOLIN CONCERTO AND MR. CZERWONKY

A New Impression Yesterday Afternoon in the Young Violinist—The Brightness and Charm of His Playing—A New Overture by Humperdinck and Six Pieces by a New Italian Composer, with Mozart for a Foil

Mr. Czerwonky brought a new impression, almost a new sensation, to the Symphony Concert of yesterday. It was the of youth, and youth is a comparatively new and strange thing there. Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings through the winter Symphony Hall is truly the dwelling-place of the middle-aged. Bid a visiting stranger to his first Symphony Concert, and the chances are ten to one that when he recounts his observations, he will call the audience, be it of the afternoon or of the evening, middle-aged. When the orchestra went last winter for the first time in thirteen years to Chicago, two or three of the reviewers, receiving also a first impression, called it middle-aged of aspect. We have chiefly eminent singers and virtuosi for "soloists" nowadays, and they have usually spent their youth in the gaining of the eminence that gives them a place at our concerts. The changes that Dr. Muck has made in the personnel of the band have made it less middle-aged to the eye and the ear, and there is youth still—forty or no forties—in the conductor himself. And yesterday, in Mr. Czerwonky of the first violins, youth came to be the "soloist." The omniscient programme-book averred that he was only one-and-twenty, and doubtless could have documented the fact. Fellow-members of the orchestra inquired eagerly and with a touch of personal liking how "the boy" had played. There was no need of the date and the phrase. Youth spoke unmistakably in Mr. Czerwonky, and equally to the eye and the ear, and the Symphony Concert was fresher and a more human for its presence. It was a novel and pleasurable thing to see his young face with its boyish heap of blonde hair and his youthful carriage. It was better still to watch the blending of youthful diffidence and youthful confidence in him; to see his fine and absorbed ardor in his work—if ever a violinst played for all that was in him it was Mr. Czerwonky yesterday—and good even to hear the little sigh of relief when he had carried himself, evidently as he wished, through two movements of his chosen concerto. As youthfully, bravely and ably he went on to the end, and then his boyish pleasure in the applause that twice and thrice recalled him was as honest and modest as his playing. From the beginning it was impossible to hear him without sympathy. At the end his pleasure was infectious.

And no one but a youth would have chosen the concerto that Mr. Czerwonky chose and played it as he did. A certain d'Ambrosio wrote it who dwells at Nice, after a Parisian schooling, and makes little pieces for the violin, the piano, and even the orchestra with a concerto, as it appears, and a ballet, as the programme-book records, on occasion. Mr. d'Ambrosio has written a sounding concerto. It courts the voice of the violin and it follows the idiom of the instrument. It invites a supple and resourceful but not a showy technique. The composer labels the beginning "Grandioso" and aspires in it to large and sustained utterance. Exaltation of matter or manner is hard to hear in it, but the music "sounds" with ample rhetoric. The concerto proceeds in contemplative, almost melancholy vein, and the slow song of the violin has an amiably pensive charm. Then for foil comes a finale of quicker pace and lighter mood in which there is as amiably rhythmic diversion. A pretty and attractive concerto, a drawing-room concerto, so to say, tempting a young violinist with becoming superficial allurements, and never once leading him beyond his depths. As music it has neither bone nor sinew, but it has a pleasing surface, and Mr. Czerwonky skimmed it as pleasingly. His tone is bright, clear and warm. It flows smoothly to the melodic line; it is supple in arabesque and tracery; it has light and shade and rhythmic sensitiveness. It adjusted itself to the harmonic background. It had an unforced youthful dignity at the beginning; it gained songful quality in the slow movement; and it had a pretty elasticity and sparkle in the finale. Not once did Mr. Czerwonky seek to display his technical resources, yet they served him with variety and surety. He plied them with a youthful intentness; he caught the sentiment of the music eagerly and warmly; and his young absorption in it won the audience to his faith and liking for it. By his playing and personality he made it articulate and agreeable. Enough of the masters of music have written concertos for mature violinists. Mr. d'Ambrosio was written a young concerto, and he was fortunate to have such sympathetic youth as Mr. Czerwonky's to bring it to speech and charm.

Dr. Muck in his turn was fortunate as well in another new piece that was interesting to hear—the overture to the opera-comique, "The Forced Marriage" "Heirat wider Willen" [illegible] Humperdinck made out of the [illegible]'s gay comedy, "Demoiselles de Sainte Cyr." The opera has hardly lingered in the repertory of the German theatres that have mounted it; and the overture—an after thought—has already become a concert piece. A fresher Humperdinck seems to write in it than we in Boston have heard for long. This time he is not writing an opera of children, witches and fairies out of German folk-lore or contriving a Moorish Rhapsody, or dreaming over the fortunes of royal children to whom fate has been unkind. And for once he does not walk the straight and narrow way of the Wagnerian disciple. The music is still sonorous and warm and rich of instrumental dress, but it sounds with its own voice. Distinctly it is the overture to a light and elegant operatic comedy, graceful, animated, touched now with sentiment and now with ardor, hinting for a moment at shadows and then running away with gayety and high spirits. It had its verve and almost its brilliance as Dr. Muck and his men played it. Distinctly it brought the mood of light and spirited comedy. And whenever Dr. Muck plays an operatic overture, it sounds of the theatre and leads straight toward a rising curtain.

The other new piece—there were three on the programme—came from an unfamiliar hand. Enrico Bossi is an Italian composer, teacher, organist and conductor who seems to bask simultaneously in the favor of court, church, choral societies and conductors. He has written prolifically in many styles and in many forms, and his orchestral and choral pieces—he has forsworn opera since his youth—are one of the fashions of the hour in German concert-rooms. Out of them came the "Intermezzi Goldoniani" played yesterday in all probability for the first time in America. They are not incidental or entr'acte music for any of Goldoni's comedies, and there is no reason to believe that they have ever been played with them. Rather the moods of the six "intermezzi" are a few of the moods of Goldoni's many pieces. He, for example, could write on occasion with the artificial charm and the aristocratic grace of his own eighteenth century. Accordingly, some of the "intermezzi" follow the old dance forms—a minuet or a galliard. Goldoni, and to this day in the popular theatres of Venice, could be riotously humorous, and Bossi makes a burlesca for ending. Goldoni could play with pretty amorous sentiment, and one intermezzo is a tinkling serenade. Goldoni loved the humors of the people as well as the elegance of their betters, and Bossi sets a musetta a-piping. Bland was Goldoni, and bland often is Bossi's music. And so forth and so on—artificial pieces all, changeful and amusing to hear, going and coming and leaving clearest impression of the aptness with which the conductor and his men played them. They, more than the fecund and playful Bossi, gave them bland elegance or sparkling piquancy or gay fun. Engaging, but a little labored trifler, singularly un-Italian in voice, easily diverting to hear and as easy to forget. Bossi made his music, and were Dr. Muck a less conscientious conductor, dutiful to every sort of piece and every composer that he chooses, it would be easy to suspect that he had placed the spontaneous, the laborless Mozart of the symphony in D major a little maliciously at the Italian's heels. Bossi had been contriving his eighteenth century blandishments and graces, and they were a perfect sham. Now they were the light breath of Mozart's life; he could not help idealizing them; he put them into tones, and lo! they are alive in 1907. H. T. P.

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

Franck's [illegible] at the [illegible] Symphony Concerts—A Recital by Ma[illegible]l—The Announcements for January—Harold Bauer's Return—Schumann-Heink Hand

The "revoiced" and generally renovated organ in Symphony Hall is to be duly exhibited and tested at the Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, in the hope that it will prove a submissive and expressive instrument after long intractability and somnolence. Mr. Wallace Goodrich is to be the organist, and he is to play Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor for organ alone and to carry the organ part in Rheinberger's concerto for organ, three horns and string orchestra—a piece both new and novel to the Symphony concerts. Novel as well, as the programmes go, is a concerto by Händel for two wind choirs and string orchestra. Thus, the only piece on the programme that calls for the band in its normal estate is César Franck's tone-poem, "The Redemption." In its original form it made the second part of a "symphonic poem" for chorus, solo voice and orchestra, in which Franck would hymn the two Redemptions—that wrought by the coming of the Christ to men and that which men may gain in after-ages by prayer. The first part sang the coming of the Saviour to a world that pursued vain pleasures and vain beliefs. The third sang the new redemption of forgiveness, proclaimed by angelic voices. Between the two stands an orchestral piece, in which Franck sought to make his music speak the joy of men under the words of the Christ; their triumphant faith and then their lapse into the old pleasures and gropings. It is this orchestral piece that Dr. Muck and his men are to play, and it is new to our concerts.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
DECEMBER 13, 1907

At last the repairer's hand—and it was much needed—has been set to that wondrous organ in Symphony Hall. It has been "revoiced"; the wind pressure has been increased; and henceforth it will be as obedient as a good organ should be to the organist's will. Dr. Muck has even gained enough confidence in it to test it at the Symphony Concerts of Dec. 27 and 28. Then he has put on his programme Bach's "Toccata" and "Fugue" in D minor for the organ alone, and Rheinberger's concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra. Mr. Wallace Goodrich, as heretofore, will be the organist. On the same programme also stands César Franck's tone-poem, "The Redemption," which he remodelled from his like-named piece for chorus and orchestra. It is new to Boston, and with it Dr. Muck will attempt for the first time here the perilous task of conducting Franck's mystical music.

Mr. Paderewski is to play as many solo pieces as he likes at his concert with the Symphony Orchestra, on Dec. 29, for the benefit of its Pension Fund. No announcement of them appears on the programme, because after he has played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto with the orchestra, the pianist will be left to choose what, and as many, extra pieces as he will. It is the custom of several German orchestras to order their programmes so when an eminent virtuoso appears with them, and Dr. Muck, Mr. Paderewski and the managers of the Pension Fund have wisely chosen to follow it.

The next concert of the Longy Club of virtuosi on wind instruments falls on Monday evening, Dec. 30, at Potter Hall, and at it music by Wolf-Ferrari, the half-Italian, half-German composer, who is gaining firm reputation in Europe, will be heard for the first time here. The particular piece is his "chamber symphony" for piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, double bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. For it, a quintet of strings will assist the Longy Club. Before long, we hope to give our readers some particulars of Wolf-Ferrari and his work. A fortnight ago his choral setting of Dante's "New Life" much impressed many who heard it at the concert of the Oratorio Society in New York, and among them the conductor of our own Cecilia.

BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY
DECEMBER 23, 1907.

NOVELTIES ON THE SYMPHONY'S BILL

Second Concert Master Czerwonky Made His Debut as Soloist at Saturday Night's Concert.

Three of the four numbers on the Symphony program Saturday night were novelties—the overture to Humperdinck's opera, "The Forced Marriage," the Goldonian Intermezzi by Enrico Bossi and Alfred d'Ambrosio's Concerto in B minor, for violin and orchestra. The classical number was Mozart's ever beautiful Symphony in D major.

Richard Czerwonky, the second concert master of the orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in this country in the d'Ambrosio concerto. Mr. Czerwonky, who is 21 years old, played in a lively, graceful and tasteful manner. The concerto itself is not a very impressive work. Of the novelties, indeed, the best impression was made by the Intermezzi by Bossi, who, by the way, is a famous Italian organist. The six little pieces fairly bubbled with beauty. Their delightful spirit infected both orchestra and audience, and so the performance of them proved one of the greatest pleasures of the Symphony season so far. The Humperdinck work realized the most favorable expectations, being sprightly, tuneful and worked out in a masterly fashion. Dr. Muck read this and the other numbers with characteristic enthusiasm.

An organ solo will be a feature of next Saturday's concert. Wallace Goodrich, one of Boston's leading musicians, will play Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor. There will also be two more novelties on the program, Rheinberger's Concerto for organ, three horns and string orchestra, and Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem from "The Redemption." The other number will be Handel's Concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra.

[illegible]on,
[illegible]
ss [illegible]
[illegible] 1907.

few people not indirectly interested in the business have any idea of the important part that women are taking in music in this country, in the business side of music. Managers having artists to place do at least half their local business with women, and most satisfactorily is it done, as a general rule. Illustrative of this is the coming Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be made in the last week of January. The orchestra will give six concerts on six successive days, in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and two in Cincinnati. Five of these concerts are under local direction of women, all of whom are taking large risks in bringing to their respective cities so expensive an organization. These five concerts are in Buffalo, Indianapolis, Columbus and the two in Cincinnati. Local management of musical affairs has opened up a wide field of usefulness to many women in all parts of the country, and very few of them have made failures of their undertakings.

[92]

...TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

...erture to "The Forced Marriage" and Two Other Pieces First Time Here.

ENTERTAINING SUITE BY BOSSI PERFORMED

Czerwonky, Violinist, Makes His Debut Before Large Boston Audience.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage".....Humperdinck
Concerto in B minor for violin...D'Ambrosio
Goldonian Intermezzi.....Bossi
Symphony in D major (K. 504).....Mozart

The overture, intermezzi and violin concerto were played in Boston for the first time. Mr. Richard Czerwonky, the second concert master of the orchestra, played a solo for the first time in this country.

Humperdinck wrote the overture to "The Forced Marriage," a comic opera based on a play of the elder Dumas, "Les Demoiselles de Saint-Cyr," for the first performance of the opera in Munich. When the opera was produced at Berlin the year before there was no overture. The thematic material of the overture is taken from the opera itself. This material has little that is of musical importance, however well it may be fitted to the situations and business of the stage, nor is the treatment of the material striking in any way.

The overture is manufactured deliberately and carefully. Once or twice in the main body there are hints at romantic pages, but the overture is after all like any of the goods that have been handed over the counter by Humperdinck since his "Haensel Und Gretel," a much over praised opera, by the way. You see Humperdinck smiling on the customer, doing the overture up neatly, and saying in a smooth voice: "Shall I not send this to your house?" Humperdinck is still reckoned seriously by some as a shining light of the modern German school.

Dr. Muck, a man of remarkably catholic taste, is acquainting us with the later works of this school. Hearing them—the words of Pfitzner, Boehe, Humperdinck, Fried and others—one is tempted to ask whether the Germans are now writing anything but notes; whether there is any composer among them of imagination save Richard Strauss, and he hath a devil, as Heasley said of de Maupassant.

Indisputable Talent.

Mr. Czerwonky is a virtuoso of indisputable talent. The concerto by d'Ambrosio is poor stuff even for a virtuoso piece. It is dull and aimless and every now and then you can hear the composer nailing sections together so that the structure will stand. Yet it served to display Mr. Czerwonky's full, agreeable and pure tone and his fluent mechanism. It will undoubtedly be a pleasure to hear him in a more serious work. As it is, he made a very favorable impression, and he deserved the applause that was long-continued and not at all perfunctory or merely an exhibition of good nature, as is too often the case at these concerts.

Bossi's Intermezzi are written presumably in the spirit of Goldoni's comedies, and the music is purposely cast in archaic moulds. The opening prelude with minuet is of little consequence, but the Galliard that follows is intoxicating in its spirit and boldness. The Curfew is of minor interest, but the Musette in the second minuet is quaint in its burlesque and the minuet is entertaining in the repetition. The little serenade is charming and it is not in conventional form. Mr. Ferir played the solo for the viola d'amore delightfully. The finale, a burlesca, brings a dashing end.

Never Pretentious.

The music of this suite is never pretentious. The composer no doubt would say of the movements: "They are little things"; but these little things are cleverly made and they are effective when they are played as they were last night with beauty of tone, fine sense of proportion and extreme brilliance. It is not surprising then that the suite gave much pleasure. Bossi, though an Italian, has evidently studied the German classics. While there is a suggestion of Bach in the prelude, the suite as a whole shows the influence of Mendelssohn.

The performance of Humperdinck's overture and the accompaniment to the concerto—how pompous is the orchestral introduction of this concerto that leads to nothing!—"In the name of the Prophet—figs!"—these were played brilliantly. Only certain horn and trumpet passages were markedly unsatisfactory. There are eight horns in the orchestra at present—but there is still room for a ...horn.

...ENSION FUND CONCERT.

...t hardly necessary to say that there ...t demand for seats for the ... Symphony pension fund concert ... to be given on Sunday evening, ... Mr. Paderewski as the ... pension fund concerts have ... popular, and Dr. Muck has ... programme as the orches... the "Pathetic" symphony ...wsky, which of itself has ... power. The programme ...ter than it really will be, ... the symphony and Beetho... "Emperor" concerto on it, but ...ski's generosity in the matter ... well known, and for ... has been decided to limit ... orchestra to the sym... the accompaniment of the ...

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Symphony Orchestra, at the ninth public rehearsal and concert, gave the following programme: Overture to "The Forced Marriage," Humperdinck; concerto in B minor for violin and orchestra, op. 29, Alfred d'Ambrosio; "Intermezzi Goldoniani," op. 127, Enrico Bossi; these three pieces were given for the first time in this city, and Mozart's D Major Symphony (Koechel 504) concluded the list. Mr. Richard Czerwonky, who sits at the first desk with Mr. Wendling in the orchestra, was soloist.

Other orchestral compositions by Humperdinck have been given in this city. They have seldom come to stay. This overture to his recently completed opera will probably not outlive its predecessors. It is agreeable sound, but the melodies have little distinction. The phrases are cleverly hung together, there is mastery of form and very vivid instrumentation, but as page follows page there comes over the hearer a growing sensation of shortness of breath, so to speak, on the part of the composer. One longs increasingly for a strong, potential musical thought, for a melody that will carry conviction with it, and this melody does not come.

D'Ambrosio, again, in his violin concerto, does not display remarkable power of invention, though the lack is partly atoned for by a certain constructive facility. The first movement of this concerto is practically built upon one theme, which is announced at the beginning by the orchestra, and is not in itself of great inherent worth. It is brightly handled, however; an ingeniously conceived counter-theme makes brief appearance, and the movement is connected with the slow movement that follows. This section is of a sensuously-lyric character. The finale comes dangerously near triviality. The solo part, in contrast to the majority of modern concertos, is probably a pleasurable task for the player, and Mr. Czerwonky, with a tone that is not overlarge, but vibrant and truly expressive, made a very favorable impression by his performance, and acknowledged a number of recalls.

Bossi wrote his "Intermezzi" in honor of the Italian playwright, Carlo Goldoni, who lived during the 18th century. He is said to have written in the old dance forms in order to express appropriately the spirit of the age. These Intermezzi are six in number, "Preludio e Minuetto," "Gagliardi," "Coprifuoco (curfew)," "Minuetto e Musetta," "Serenatina," "Burlesca." They are scored for strings only. The composer writes with a dexterous hand. His melodic material is pleasing and he employs many devices in obtaining the various effects of which a string choir is capable, as the flageolet tones of the 'celli in the dronebass accompaniment of the "Musetta." The gradual development of the first minuet from the more vigorous prelude is a happy thought, and in the trio of the former are a few charming bars for the solo viola, which instrument, by the way, is given an unusually interesting part throughout. The third number presumably refers to the curfew hour. A constantly reiterated note, which to some might suggest the vibration of a bell, is given chiefly to the violas, and it produces a beautiful effect. The "Gagliardi" is sparkling and gay, as the title might presuppose, and is a snappy bit of writing. We might expect a pizzicato accompaniment in the "Serenatina"—which is small, oh, very small—with a pretty little melody floating overhead. The "Burlesca" has real wit and sparkle, and the suite was heartily applauded. The strings distinguished themselves by crisp attacks, unanimity and dynamic balance, and a fine, brilliant quality of tone.

Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, will give the following programme: Toccatta and Fugue in D minor for organ, J. S. Bach; Concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Handel; Concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra, Rheinberger; Symphonic Poem from the Redemption, Cesar Franck. Mr Wallace Goodrich, organist, will be soloist. The two last named compositions will be given for the first time at the Symphony concerts. Rheinberger's Concerto is the first of two compositions in that form for organ. It was finished in 1855, and, if we are not mistaken, was given its first public performance by our countryman, Horatio Parker, then pursuing his studies under the master. The "Symphonic Poem" from the "Redemption" is a comparatively short orchestral movement that divides the work into two parts.

DATES AHEAD

Sunday evening, Dec. 29, will take place the first of the Pension Fund concerts this season. M. Paderewski will be soloist, and the orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's ever-popular pathetic symphony. Beethoven's Emperor concerto and piano soli will constitute the remainder of the programme.

The second concert by the Lougy Club will take place Monday evening, Dec. 30. The programme, which is not less original than usual, will consist of a symphonic poem by Gustav Bumcke, "Der Spaziergang," the "Trio des Ishmaelites," an instrumental excerpt from the third part of Berlioz's sacred trilogy, "The Infancy of Christ," scored for two flutes and harp; and a "Sinfonia da Camera," by Wolf Ferrari, a modern composer who is rapidly coming into prominence. The club will be assisted by Messrs. Schuecker, harp; Keller, double bass, and the Theodorowitz string quartet, a new quorum of string players who have recently commenced work together.

TIMES
WASHINGTON, D.C.
DEC 22 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7. Walter Damrosch and his big New York Symphony Orchestra will come to this same theater Sunday night, January [illegible]

Ninth Symphony Program.

Dr Muck introduced three new pieces to Symphony concert patrons last week, an overture by Humperdinck written for his opera, "The Forced Marriage;" a violin concerto in B minor by D'Ambrosio, and Rossi's "Goldonian" Intermezzi. These were given for the first time in Boston and Mr Richard Czerwonky, second concert master of the orchestra, made his local debut as a soloist in the violin concerto. Mozart's D major symphony closed the program.

The overture is built upon themes from the opera, several of them being rather quaint in treatment, the melody in the early part being admirably arranged for the horns, with interruptions and cross harmonies allotted to the other instruments. There is considerable orchestral figuration and the sombre melody, "The King's Hymn," is a fine example of scoring for the heavier brass choir. A peculiar pianissimo effect is introduced by the strings near the finale in which an agitato movement is worked up with curious effect. The performance was spirited and the style of composition should make it very acceptable to the general public.

Mr Czerwonky, one of the new members of the orchestra, chose Ambrosio's violin concerto for a debut here as a soloist, and although the work appears to be of uneven merit, the performance by the violinist was highly pleasing and displayed in a commendable light some of the phases of his art. His tone is not big, but it is resonant and sufficient for the concert hall of average size.

His fingering is true, whether single or in chords, and his bowing is even in passage work requiring legato or sustained notes. His lack of power, of course, is specially noticeable when he is playing with an orchestral support, like that of Dr Muck's forces, but aside from that the young man evidently is an artist worthy his rank in the orchestra.

The concerto is rather monotonous in the first part, which opens forte by the orchestra. Afterward the solo instrument enters with some elaborateness of a theme and continues, moderato, in a plaintive style to the close of the movement. A fitful, intermittent introduction by the brass contingent opens the second movement, which is interrupted by the violin in a gentler form. Then after repetitions of a theme by the different bands, the finale is led up to and finally terminates in a series of rapid, fortissimo passages.

Bossi's intermezzi consist of six musical forms dedicated to the Italian dramatist, Goldoni, famous in the 18th century for his many comedies. The half-dozen pieces are mainly amusing in scope, though great skill in the score is shown by numerous variations and odd combinations for the instruments in ensembles and divided choirs. The second part, with a hop and skip rhythm, the bagpipe and reed effects in the fourth, the dainty guitar serenade that follows, and the ridiculous syncopated hurly-burly measures of the final movement gave the orchestra constant opportunity to show its ability to fairly run the gamut of musical demands. The jolly piece was most heartily applauded and its performance certainly warranted the reception.

In fine contrast was the last number on the program, Mozart's D major symphony, with its charming melodies, dignified and courtly in its irresistible appeal, and interpreted with sympathetic understanding of its manifold beauties.

The organ in Symphony hall is to play an important part in the symphony program this week. During the last few weeks some very important changes have been made in the instrument with the result that it is much more effective for concert purposes than it has ever been in the past. The soloist will be Mr Wallace Goodrich, and the opening number will be Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, for the organ.

Mr Goodrich will also be the organist in Rheinberger's concerto in F major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra. This will be played for the first time at these concerts. The orchestral numbers will be Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras in F, and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption," which will be heard in Boston for the first time.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert.

There is a great demand for seats for the Boston symphony pension fund concert, which is to be given next Sunday evening, with Paderewski as the soloist. Pension fund concerts have always been popular, and Dr Muck has placed on the program as the orchestral number the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky, which of itself has great drawing power.

The program appears briefer than it really will be, with only the symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto on it, but Mr Paderewski's generosity in the matter of encores is well known, and for this reason it has been decided to limit the work of the orchestra to the symphony and to the accompaniment of the concerto.

Longy Club Concerts.

The second concert of the Longy club will be given in Potter hall Monday evening, Dec 30. The first number will be a symphonic poem by Gustav Bumcke, entitled "Der Spaziergang," for flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, a horn, two bassoons and harp. The second number will be Berlioz' trio, "Des Ismaelites," from the "Infancy of Christ," for two flutes and harp. The third number, a "sinfonia da camera," by Wolf-Ferrari, is for piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, bassoon, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. The assisting artists will be Messrs Schuecker harp, K. Keller basso, and the Theodorowicz quartet, comprising Mr Theodorowicz first violin, Mr Ribarsch second violin, Mr Gietzen viola and Mr J. Keller 'cello.

HERALD
WASHINGTON, D.C.
DEC 22 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 7. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.

...de, Boston, New York, 1884

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage."
D'Ambrosio—Violin Concerto, B minor.
Mr. Richard Czerwonky, Soloist.
Bossi—Goldonian Intermezzi for Strings.
Mozart—Symphony in D major.

Oh Humperdinck! Oh, Humperdinck!
Your Muse has given out, I thinck.
'Tis very evident your pate'll
Not make another "Hans and Gretel."

Humperdinck, like Mascagni, is a "single-speech Hamilton". There is nothing in this overture that is as effective as the climax of the Prelude to his own "Haensel and Gretel". Everything is artificial and manufactured without inspiration. There is a strong flavor of "Yankee Doodle" in the second theme, which awakens a languid interest in the American breast. It may be remembered, by the way, that the Germans have a cheap "Gassenhauer" (street melody) that is like our tune, which led to the false statement that it was brought over here by the Hessians during the Revolution. Something very like "Yankee Doodle" was used by Beethoven as the chief theme of the finale of the Ninth symphony. The overture was well played and abundantly applauded, but we hope never to hear its conventionalities again.

Italian instrumental composers are scarce and violin concertos are scarcer, therefore we cordially welcome an Italian who has written a classical concerto. D'Ambrosio's concerto opens with a long "tutti" (orchestra alone) which gives the waiting soloist a good chance to get nervous. But if Mr. Czerwonky got nervous at all he did not show it, for he played with fire and breadth from the very first.

It is quite evident that the new Italians are not going along the thorny path which the latter-day French composers have chosen. There was nothing bitter, ugly or labored in the new concerto. That D'Ambrosio had studied his Wagner was sometimes evident, but no sensible modern can escape from the influence of that great reformer.

The concerto started its soloist with a great deal of difficult double-stopping, which Mr. Czerwonky gave finely. There was some broad work on the G string which also was well executed. The high positions were given with pure intonation and without effort. Throughout the work the soloist displayed pure intonation and a full and sympathetic tone.

The opening Allegro led directly into the Andante, which was full of expression, and both movements had good figure development and were at least interesting. The finale had much work in the high positions, in which Mr. Czerwonky was especially successful. Altogether, the concerto is not going to rank with the Beethoven, Brahms, or Bruch masterpieces, but it deserves to to be heard often and to take its place in the standard repertoire. Mr. Czerwonky recalled three times. The impression he has made as a soloist at his debut is certainly an excellent one.

The programme tended towards the Italian school and after Italia Bassa had had its innings Italia Alta took the bat-on. Bossi is a new composer to us. He is not at all vealy, as his name might suggest. His work is clear, interesting and musicianly. His set of Intermezzi is intended to bring back the time of the charming dramatist, Goldoni, just as Grieg's Suite (also for strings) "Aus Holberg's Zeit" pictures the quaint and playful style of the Norwegian-Danish author, Holberg. Both composers have caught the spirit of the antique days and the playfulness of their subjects.

Dr. Muck took the first Minuet with the stately gravity that becomes the Court dance. Rubinstein once said that Mozart's lofty Minuet in "Don Giovanni" was really a Sarabande, but this classification only showed that he did not comprehend that a true dance minuet and a "Tempo di Minuetto" are two wholly different things. The loftiness of the Minuet is too little understood by conductors and we were glad to find Dr. Muck restoring its dignity.

In every number of the Intermezzi there was the surest and easiest leading of the voices. The elfin tricksiness of the Gallard recalled the fairies in Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-night's Dream Overture." The "Curfew" was somewhat less original, yet still attractive. In the Musette of the second Minuet there was some effective work "Sull Ponticello" (the bow played next to the bridge of the instrument) which gave a quaint squeakiness to the bagpipe effect which is the chief characteristic of the Musette.

The little Serenade gave a splendid solo to the violist, Mr. Ferir, (was it a viola d'amour?) a tender theme being supported entirely by pizzicato effects. There were some strikingly beautiful harmonics in this, one of the best tone-colors of the viola d'amour. Brusque and hearty was the final Burlesca, and all these shifting styles fitted well to represent the moods of the great Italian playwright, for Goldoni was the Moliere of Italy.

One point we note with pleasure in connection with this performance. The strings of the orchestra have again reached their highest standard of brilliancy. Nothing more perfect from a technical point of view could possibly be desired. We are glad to state this since we have not always found the ensemble flawless in some recent concerts. This work became a triumph for the string orchestra, and when the applause rang out, Dr. Muck caused the orchestra to rise and share with him in the popular tribute. It was an ovation for both that was entirely earned.

Here the concert might have stopped. It was now within a few minutes of an hour and a half in length and few cared especially for a Mozart symphony as dessert. There was delicacy of reading and interpretation in the Andante and there was considerable dash in the opening Allegro. But the Finale was tame. It is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, nor good red herring. It is not in the naively genial style of Haydn's endings, nor is it in the resolute and earnest manner of a Beethoven. Mozart has here aimed at dramatic power, and the greatest dramatic power of orchestral scoring of the 18th century becomes very tame beside the whirlwinds in this direction which Strauss, Mahler & Co. have accustomed us to in the 20th century. ...s struggles after the intense could not ...mall the spoiled musical ... of the

[93]

DECEMBER 22, 1907 BOSTON SUNDAY POST

HERALD—

NOVELTIES AT NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Overture to "The Forced Marriage" and Two Other Pieces First Time Here.

ENTERTAINING SUITE BY BOSSI PERFORMED

Czerwonky, Violinist, Makes His Debut Before Large Boston Audience.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Muck conducted. The programme was as follows:

Overture to the opera "The Forced Marriage".....Humperdinck
Concerto in B minor for violin..D'Ambrosio
Goldonian Intermezzi.....Bossi
Symphony in D major (K. 504).....Mozart

The overture, intermezzi and violin concerto were played in Boston for the first time. Mr. Richard Czerwonky, the second concert master of the orchestra, played a solo for the first time in this country.

Humperdinck wrote the overture to "The Forced Marriage," a comic opera based on a play of the elder Dumas, "Les Demoiselles de Saint-Cyr," for the first performance of the opera in Munich. When the opera was produced at Berlin the year before there was no overture. The thematic material of the overture is taken from the opera itself. This material has little that is of musical importance, however well it may be fitted to the situations and business of the stage, nor is the treatment of the material striking in any way.

The overture is manufactured deliberately and carefully. Once or twice in the main body there are hints at romantic pages, but the overture is after all like any of the goods that have been handed over the counter by Humperdinck since his "Haensel Und Gretel," a much over praised opera, by the way. You see Humperdinck smiling on the customer, doing the overture up neatly, and saying in a smooth voice: "Shall I not send this to your house?" Humperdinck is still reckoned seriously by some as a shining light of the modern German school.

Dr. Muck, a man of remarkably catholic taste, is acquainting us with the later works of this school. Hearing them—the words of Pfitzner, Boehe, Humperdinck, Fried and others—one is tempted to ask whether the Germans are now writing anything but notes; whether there is any composer among them of imagination save Richard Strauss, and he hath a devil, as Henley said of de Maupassant.

Indisputable Talent.

Mr. Czerwonky is a virtuoso of indisputable talent. The concerto by d'Ambrosio is poor stuff even for a virtuoso piece. It is dull and aimless and every now and then you can hear the composer nailing sections together so that the structure will stand. Yet it served in displaying Mr. Czerwonky's full, agreeable and pure tone and his fluent mechanism. It will undoubtedly be a pleasure to hear him in a more serious work. As it is, he made a very favorable impression, and he deserved the applause that was long-continued and not at all perfunctory or merely an exhibition of good nature, as is too often the case at these concerts.

Bossi's Intermezzi are written presumably in the spirit of Goldoni's comedies, and the music is purposely cast in archaic moulds. The opening prelude with minuet is of little consequence, but the Galliard that follows is intoxicating in its spirit and boldness. The Curfew is of minor interest, but the Musette in the second minuet is quaint in its burlesque and the minuet is entertaining in the repetition. The little serenade is charming and it is not in conventional form. Mr. Ferir played the solo for the viola d'amore delightfully. The finale, a burlesca, brings a dashing end.

Never Pretentious.

The music of this suite is never pretentious. The composer no doubt would say of the movements: "They are little things"; but these little things are cleverly made and they are effectlve when they are played as they were last night with beauty of tone, fine sense of proportion and extreme brilliance. It is not surprising then that the suite gave much pleasure. Bossi, though an Italian, has evidently studied the German classics. While there is a suggestion of Bach in the prelude, the suite as a whole shows the influence of Mendelssohn.

The performance of Humperdinck's overture and the accompaniment to the concerto—how pompous is the orchestral introduction of this concerto that leads to nothing!—"In the name of the Prophet—figs!"—these were played brilliantly. Only certain horn and trumpet passages were markedly unsatisfactory. There are eight horns in the orchestra at present—but there is still room for a first horn.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

It is hardly necessary to say that there is a great demand for seats for the Boston Symphony pension fund concert which is to be given on Sunday evening, Dec. 29, with Mr. Paderewski as the soloist. The pension fund concerts have always been popular, and Dr. Muck has placed on the programme as the orchestral number the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky, which of itself has great drawing power. The programme sounds briefer than it really will be with only the symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto on it, but Mr. Paderewski's generosity in the matter of encores is well known, and for this reason it has been decided to limit the work of the orchestra to the symphony and to the accompaniment of the

DECEMBER 22, 1907

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Symphony Orchestra, at the ninth public rehearsal and concert, gave the following programme: Overture to "The Forced Marriage," Humperdinck; concerto in B-minor for violin and orchestra, op. 23, Alfred d'Ambrosio; "Intermezzi Goldoniani," op. 127, Enrico Bossi; these three pieces were given for the first time in this city, and Mozart's D Major Symphony (Kochel 504) concluded the list. Mr. Richard Czerwonky, who sits at the first desk with Mr. Wendling in the orchestra, was soloist.

Other orchestral compositions by Humperdinck have been given in this city. They have seldom come to stay. This overture to his recently completed opera will probably not outlive its predecessors. It is agreeable sound, but the melodies have little distinction. The phrases are cleverly hung together, there is mastery of form and very vivid instrumentation, but as page follows page there comes over the hearer a growing sensation of shortness of breath, so to speak, on the part of the composer. One longs increasingly for a strong, potential musical thought, for a melody that will carry conviction with it, and this melody does not come.

D'Ambrosio, again, in his violin concerto, does not display remarkable power of invention, though the lack is partly atoned for by a certain constructive facility. The first movement of this concerto is practically built upon one theme, which is announced at the beginning by the orchestra, and is not in itself of great inherent worth. It is brightly handled, however; an ingeniously conceived counter-theme makes brief appearance, and the movement is connected with the slow movement that follows. This section is of a sensuously-lyric character. The finale comes dangerously near triviality. The solo part, in contrast to the majority of modern concertos, is probably a pleasurable task for the player, and Mr. Czerwonky, with a tone that is not overlarge, but vibrant and truly expressive, made a very favorable impression by his performance, and acknowledged a number of recalls.

Bossi wrote his "Intermezzi" in honor of the Italian playwright, Carlo Goldoni, who lived during the 18th century. He is said to have written in the old dance forms in order to express appropriately the spirit of the age. These Intermezzi are six in number, "Preludio e Minuetto," "Gagliardi," "Coprifuoco (curfew)," "Minuetto e Musetta," "Serenatina," "Burlesca." They are scored for strings only. The composer writes with a dexterous hand. His melodic material is pleasing and he employs many devices in obtaining the various effects of which a string choir is capable, as the flageolet tones of the 'celli in the dronebass accompaniment of the "Musetta." The gradual development of the first minuet from the more vigorous prelude is a happy thought, and in the trio of the former are a few charming bars for the solo viola, which instrument, by the way, is given an unusually interesting part throughout. The third number presumably refers to the curfew hour. A constantly reiterated note, which to some might suggest the vibration of a bell, is given chiefly to the violas, and it produces a beautiful effect. The "Gagliardi" is sparkling and gay, as the title might presuppose, and is a snappy bit of writing. We might expect a pizzicato accompaniment in the "Serenatina"—which is small, oh, very small—with a pretty little melody floating overhead. The "Burlesca" has real wit and sparkle, and the suite was heartily applauded. The strings distinguished themselves by crisp attacks, unanimity and dynamic balance, and a fine, brilliant quality of tone.

Friday afternoon at 2:30 and Saturday evening at 8 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, will give the following programme: Toccatta and Fugue in D minor for organ, J. S. Bach; Concerto for two wind choirs and string orchestra, Handel; Concerto in F major for organ, three horns and string orchestra, Rheinberger; Symphonic Poem from the Redemption, Cesar Franck. Mr Wallace Goodrich, organist, will be soloist. The two last named compositions will be given for the first time at the Symphony concerts. Rheinberger's Concerto is the first of two compositions in that form for organ. It was finished in 1885, and, if we are not mistaken, was given its first public performance by our countryman, Horatio Parker, then pursuing his studies under the master. The "Symphonic Poem" from the "Redemption" is a comparatively short orchestral movement that divides the work into two parts.

DATES AHEAD

Sunday evening, Dec. 29, will take place the first of the Pension Fund concerts this season. M. Paderewski will be soloist, and the orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's ever-popular pathetic symphony. Beethoven's Emperor concerto and piano soli will constitute the remainder of the programme.

The second concert by the Lougy Club will take place Monday evening, Dec. 30. The programme, which is not less original than usual, will consist of a symphonic poem by Gustav Bumcke, "Der Spaziergang," the "Trio des Ishmaelites," an instrumental excerpt from the third part of Berlioz's sacred trilogy, "The Infancy of Christ," scored for two flutes and harp; and a "Sinfonia da Camera," by Wolf Ferrari, a modern composer who is rapidly coming into prominence. The club will be assisted by Messrs. Schuecker, harp; Keller, double bass, and the Theodorowitz string quartet, a new quorum of string players who have recently commenced work together.

TIMES

D.C

DE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7. Walter Damrosch and his big New York Symphony Orchestra will come to this same theater Sunday night, January 12, at

DECEMBER 22, 1907

GLOBE—

Ninth Symphony Program.

Dr Muck introduced three new pieces to Symphony concert patrons last week, an overture by Humperdink written for his opera, "The Forced Marriage;" a violin concerto in B minor by D'Ambrosio, and Rossi's "Goldonian" Intermezzi. These were given for the first time in Boston and Mr Richard Czerwonky, second concert master of the orchestra, made his local debut as a soloist in the violin concerto. Mozart's D major symphony closed the program.

The overture is built upon themes from the opera, several of them being rather quaint in treatment, the melody in the early part being admirably arranged for the horns, with interruptions and cross harmonies allotted to the other instruments. There is considerable orchestral figuration and the sombre melody, "The King's Hymn," is a fine example of scoring for the heavier brass choir. A peculiar pianissimo effect is introduced by the strings near the finale in which an agitato movement is worked up with curious effect. The performance was spirited and the style of composition should make it very acceptable to the general public.

Mr Czerwonky, one of the new members of the orchestra, chose Ambrosio's violin concerto for a debut here as a soloist, and although the work appears to be of uneven merit, the performance by the violinist was highly pleasing and displayed in a commendable light some of the phases of his art. His tone is not big, but it is resonant and sufficient for the concert hall of average size.

His fingering is true, whether single or in chords, and his bowing is even in passage work requiring legato or sustained notes. His lack of power, of course, is specially noticeable when he is playing with an orchestral support, like that of Dr Muck's forces, but aside from that the young man evidently is an artist worthy his rank in the orchestra.

The concerto is rather monotonous in the first part, which opens forte by the orchestra. Afterward the solo instrument enters with some elaborateness of a theme and continues, moderato, in a plaintive style to the close of the movement. A fitful, intermittent introduction by the brass contingent opens the second movement, which is interrupted by the violin in a gentler form. Then after repetitions of a theme by the different bands, the finale is led up to and finally terminates in a series of rapid, fortissimo passages.

Bossi's intermezzi consist of six musical forms dedicated to the Italian dramatist, Goldoni, famous in the 18th century for his many comedies. The half-dozen pieces are mainly amusing in scope, though great skill in the score is shown by numerous variations and odd combinations for the instruments in ensembles and divided choirs. The second part, with a hop and skip rhythm, the bagpipe and reed effects in the fourth, the dainty guitar serenade that follows, and the ridiculous syncopated hurly-burly measures of the final movement gave the orchestra constant opportunity to show its ability to fairly run the gamut of musical demands. The jolly piece was most heartily applauded and its performance certainly warranted the reception.

In fine contrast was the last number on the program, Mozart's D major symphony, with its charming melodies, dignified and courtly in its irresistible appeal, and interpreted with sympathetic understanding of its manifold beauties.

The organ in Symphony hall is to play an important part in the symphony program this week. During the last few weeks some very important changes have been made in the instrument with the result that it is much more effective for concert purposes than it has ever been in the past. The soloist will be Mr Wallace Goodrich, and the opening number will be Bach's toccata and fugue in D minor, for the organ.

Mr Goodrich will also be the organist in Rheinberger's concerto in F major, for organ, three horns and string orchestra. This will be played for the first time at these concerts. The orchestral numbers will be Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras in F, and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Redemption," which will be neard in Boston for the first time.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert.

There is a great demand for seats for the Boston symphony pension fund concert, which is to be given next Sunday evening, with Paderewski as the soloist. Pension fund concerts have always been popular, and Dr Muck has placed on the program as the orchestral number the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky, which of itself has great drawing power.

The program appears briefer than it really will be, with only the symphony and Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto on it, but Mr Paderewski's generosity in the matter of encores is well known and for this reason it has been decided to limit the work of the orchestra to the symphony and to the accompaniment of the concerto.

Longy Club Concerts.

The second concert of the Longy club will be given in Potter hall Monday evening, Dec 30. The first number will be a symphonic poem by Gustav Bumcke, entitled "Der Spaziergang," for flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, a horn, two bassoons and harp. The second number will be Berlioz' trio, "Des Ismaelites," from the "Infancy of Christ," for two flutes and harp. The third number, a "sinfonia da camera," by Wolf-Ferrari, is for piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, bassoon, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon.

The assisting artists will be Messrs Schuecker harp, K. Keller basso, and the Theodorowicz quartet, comprising Mr Theodorowicz first violin, Mr Ribarsch second violin, Mr Gletzen viola and Mr J. Keller 'cello.

HERALD

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 7. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.

...do, 1884. New York, 1884

[93]

ADVERTISER MONDAY

DECEMBER 23, 1907

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Humperdinck—Overture, "The Forced Marriage."
D'Ambrosio—Violin Concerto, B minor.
Mr. Richard Czerwonky, Soloist.
Bossi—Goldonian Intermezzi for Strings.
Mozart—Symphony in D major.

Oh Humperdinck! Oh Humperdinck!
Your Muse has given out, I thinck.
'Tis very evident your pate'll
Not make another "Hans and Gretel."

Humperdinck, like Mascagni, is a "single-speech Hamilton". There is nothing in this overture that is as effective as the climax of the Prelude to his own "Haensel and Gretel". Everything is artificial and manufactured without inspiration. There is a strong flavor of "Yankee Doodle" in the second theme, which awakens a languid interest in the American breast. It may be remembered, by the way, that the Germans have a cheap "Gassenhauer" (street melody) that is like our tune, which led to the false statement that it was brought over here by the Hessians during the Revolution. Something very like "Yankee Doodle" was used by Beethoven as the chief theme of the finale of the Ninth symphony. The overture was well played and abundantly applauded, but we hope never to hear its conventionalities again.

Italian instrumental composers are scarce and violin concertos are scarcer, therefore we cordially welcome an Italian who has written a classical concerto. D'Ambrosio's concerto opens with a long "tutti" (orchestra alone) which gives the waiting soloist a good chance to get nervous. But if Mr. Czerwonky got nervous at all he did not show it, for he played with fire and breadth from the very first.

It is quite evident that the new Italians are not going along the thorny path which the latter-day French composers have chosen. There was nothing bitter, ugly or labored in the new concerto. That D'Ambrosio had studied his Wagner was sometimes evident, but no sensible modern can escape from the influence of that great reformer.

The concerto started its soloist with a great deal of difficult double-stopping, which Mr. Czerwonky gave finely. There was some broad work on the G string which also was well executed. The high positions were given with pure intonation and without effort. Throughout the work the soloist displayed pure intonation and a full and sympathetic tone.

The opening Allegro led directly into the Andante, which was full of expression, and both movements had good figure development and were at least interesting. The finale had much work in the high positions, in which Mr. Czerwonky was especially successful. Altogether, the concerto is not going to rank with the Beethoven, Brahms, or Bruch masterpieces, but it deserves to to be heard often and to take its place in the standard repertoire. Mr. Czerwonky recalled three times. The impression he has made as a soloist at his debut is certainly an excellent one.

The programme tended towards the Italian school and after Italia Bassa had had its innings Italia Alta took the bat-on. Bossi is a new composer to us. He is not at all vealy, as his name might suggest. His work is clear, interesting and musicianly. His set of Intermezzi is intended to bring back the time of the charming dramatist, Goldoni, just as Grieg's Suite (also for strings) "Aus Holberg's Zeit" pictures the quaint and playful style of the Norwegian-Danish author, Holberg. Both composers have caught the spirit of the antique days and the playfulness of their subjects.

Dr. Muck took the first Minuet with the stately gravity that becomes the Court dance. Rubinstein once said that Mozart's lofty Minuet in "Don Giovanni" was really a Sarabande, but this classification only showed that he did not comprehend that a true dance minuet and a "Tempo di Minuetto" are two wholly different things. The loftiness of the Minuet is too little understood by conductors and we were glad to find Dr. Muck restoring its dignity.

In every number of the Intermezzi there was the surest and easiest leading of the voices. The elfin tricksiness of the Galliard recalled the fairies in Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-night's Dream Overture." The "Curfew" was somewhat less original, yet still attractive. In the Musette of the second Minuet there was some effective work "Sull Ponticello" (the bow played next to the bridge of the instrument) which gave a quaint squeakiness to the bagpipe effect which is the chief characteristic of the Musette.

The little Serenade gave a splendid solo to the violist, Mr. Ferir, (was it a viola d'amour?) a tender theme being supported entirely by pizzicato effects. There were some strikingly beautiful harmonics in this, one of the best tone-colors of the viola d'amour. Brusque and hearty was the final Burlesca, and all these shifting styles fitted well to represent the moods of the great Italian playwright, for Goldoni was the Moliere of Italy.

One point we note with pleasure in connection with this performance. The strings of the orchestra have again reached their highest standard of brilliancy. Nothing more perfect from a technical point of view could possibly be desired. We are glad to state this since we have not always found the ensemble flawless in some recent concerts. This work became a triumph for the string orchestra, and when the applause rang out, Dr. Muck caused the orchestra to rise and share with him in the popular tribute. It was an ovation for both that was entirely earned.

Here the concert might have stopped. It was now within a few minutes of an hour and a half in length and few cared especially for a Mozart symphony as dessert. There was delicacy of reading and interpretation in the Andante and there was considerable dash in the opening Allegro. But the Finale was tame. It is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl, nor good red herring. It is not in the naively genial style of Haydn's endings, nor is it in the resolute and earnest manner of a Beethoven. Mozart has here aimed at dramatic power, and the greatest dramatic power of orchestral scoring of the 18th century becomes very tame beside the whirlwinds in this direction which Strauss, Mahler & Co. have accustomed us to in the 20th century. Its struggles after the intense could not thrill the spoiled musical children of the present age. Louis C. Elson.

...Boston this year will be at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Paderewski with his well-known generosity gives his services to the orchestra, and redeems the promise which he was unable to fulfil three years ago, when he was last in America. With the orchestra he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, commonly known as the "Emperor." The orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the performance of which under Dr. Muck made such a profound impression last spring. The program has been purposely made short, as it is realized that Mr. Paderewski will probably be asked to play several encores.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The soloist at the eleventh public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Jan. 3 and Saturday evening, Jan. 4, will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who has returned to this country after an absence of several years. Mme. Carreno came to America from Australia, where she had spent several months, and she has already played several times in the Middle West. Accounts seem to agree that she still is in great plannst of former times, and that her art is as brilliant as ever. She will play MacDowell's concerto for D minor, No. 2, op. 22. The novelty on the program will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. Bischoff is a young German, a resident of Munich and a pupil of Richard Strauss. The work is one of very large dimensions and of enormous difficulty. Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been at work on it for the past two weeks, and the amount of preparation necessary for its performance exceeds that which was given to Strauss' "Symfonia Domestica." The other work on the program will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

LONGY CLUB CONCERT

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall Monday evening, at 8.15 o'clock. The item of chief interest on the program will be a Sinfonia da Camara by Wolf-Ferrari, who is one of the youngest and one of the most promising composers of the Italo-German school. A year ago Professor Willy Hess had it on his prospectus as one of the novelties to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Quartet, and Dr. Muck was to have played the piano part, but the required time to prepare it was not found, and this year Mr. Longy will bring it out. It calls for piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. In this the Longy Club will have the assistance of Mr. K. Keller, bass; and the Theodorowicz String Quartet, comprising Messrs. Theodorowicz, Ribarsch, Gietzen, and J. Keller. The first number will be a symphonic poem by Gustav Bumcke, entitled "Der Spaziergang," for flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons and harp, and the second number will be the Trio des Ismaelites, from the "Infancy of Christ," for two flutes and a harp. Mr. Heinrich Schuecker will be the harpist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BULLETIN

m ...

PHILADELPHIA, PA

dress ...

te DEC 21 1907

The active interest which the women of this country are taking in musical affairs is illustrated by the fact that during the coming Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra five concerts will be given under the local direction of women, all of whom are taking large risks in bringing to their respective cities so expensive an organization. These five concerts are in Buffalo, Indianapolis, Columbus, and two in Cincinnati. Local management of musical affairs has opened up a wide field of usefulness to many women in all parts of the country, and it is said that very few of them make failures of their undertakings.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBLIC LEDGER

om ...

dress PHILADELPHIA, PA

te DEC 22 1907

LOCAL BRIEFS

Madame Teresa Carreno will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in the Academy on January 6.

The committee indorsing the movement looking to the organization of the people's sight-singing classes in various sections of the city are planning to start a class in Roxborough early in January for residents of Wissahickon, Manayunk and Falls of Schuylkill and another in Frankford for those who reside in that vicinity.

INQUIRER.

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 22 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Madame Teresa Car-

Published: London, 1881; New York, 18

MUSICAL MATTERS

Wallace Goodrich the Symphony Soloist.

Paderewski Will Play Tonight at Pension Fund Benefit.

Concert by Longy Club—Other Events.

The 10th Symphony program was unusually interesting for the organ figured largely in the music, two of the four numbers utilizing the instrument, which was played by Mr Wallace Goodrich. Two selections were given for the first time at these concerts and two had their "first times" in this city. So all in all Dr Muck offered Bach, Handel, Rheinberger and Franck in particularly enjoyable forms.

The organ has lately been repaired and its prominence in the program was practically a test of its quality, for the Bach and Rheinberger numbers varied sufficiently in style to enable Mr Goodrich to exhibit the resources of the instrument quite fully. The different varieties of tone colors were clear and true, the effects of the deep pedal stops were thoroughly good and free from harshness and the many voices of the grand instrument not only sounded sweet, but the prompt and harmonious responses showed the admirable workmanship of the mechanical part of the organ.

Mr Goodrich is a thorough master of the instrument and being very familiar with this one his interpretations were of a superior order. The dynamic variations and changes of stops were made in a manner unusually quiet and his admirable style of managing pedals and stops showed little of the spasmodic violence so frequently displayed by organists.

The Bach toccata is one of many intermittent little harmonies that call for rapid finger work in the lighter registers. These Mr Goodrich fingered deftly, handling the changing stops without any fuss. These responses were prompt and the combinations blended perfectly. Of a more exacting nature was the Rheinberger concerto, played with part of the orchestra. In this the tonal pitch of instrument and the orchestra were even throughout.

Against a string orchestra and three horns the organ voices showed up brilliantly, the upper parts with the violins and the heavier voices with the deeper brasses. The grandeur of the first movement was impressively presented, and the florid finale went very smoothly, the big instrument being kept in splendid unison by Mr Goodrich. The soloist was cordially welcomed, heartily applauded and recalled several times after each selection.

In the Handel concerto, which is rather old-fashioned in form and treatment, the wind orchestras and strings for which it was written are to be credited with admirable work in the elaborate musical conversations that run through the composition. The members of the wind contingents played their difficult running phrases in the third movement so smoothly and in such fine unison that they were marked for special recognition by the audience. Dr Muck's reading of the "Redemption" poem by Franck was notably dignified and impressive.

This week's program will have for soloist Mme Teresa Carreno, the celebrated pianist, who has been absent from this country for several years. She will play the D minor concerto by Edward MacDowell, who studied with her at the beginning of his career as a pianist. There will be a novelty number, Hermann Bischoff's E major symphony, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture will close the program.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert.

The last appearance of Paderewski in Boston this year will be at the pension fund concert of the Boston symphony orchestra in Symphony hall this evening. Mr Paderewski with his well-known generosity gives his services to the orchestra, and redeems the promise which he was unable to fulfil three years ago, when he was last in America. With the orchestra he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, commonly known as the "Emperor."

The orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the performance of which under Dr Muck made such a profound impression last spring. The program has been purposely made short, as it is realized that Mr Paderewski will probably be asked to play several encores.

The Longy Club.

The second concert of the Longy club will be given in Potter hall tomorrow evening, and the item of chief interest on the program will be a "sinfonia da camera" by Wolf-Ferrari, who is one of the youngest and one of the most promising composers of the Italo-German school. A year ago Prof Willy Hess had it on his prospectus as one of the novelties to be performed by the Boston symphony orchestra quartet, and Dr Muck was to have played the piano part, but the required time to prepare it was not found, and this year Mr Longy will bring it out.

It calls for piano, two violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. In this the Longy club will have the assistance of Mr K. Keller bass and the Theodorowicz string quartet. The other number will be a symphonic poem by Gustav Bumcke, entitled "Der Spaziergang," and trio from the "Infancy of Christ" by Berlioz, for two flutes and a harp. Mr Heinrich Schuecker will be the harpist.

[94]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 10th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Toccata for organ in D minor, Bach; concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras, Handel (arr. by G. Kogel); concerto No. 1 for organ, three horns and strings, Rheinberger; symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Cesar Franck. Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich was soloist. The numbers on the programme, with the exception of the Handel concerto, two or three movements of which have been given before in a different version, were performed for the first time at these concerts.

Such a programme, devoted to a style of music that we do not hear too much of in these days, was an unusual gratification. The concertos by Handel and Rheinberger, which offered opportunities for the different divisions of the orchestra to display their capabilities, were not the least welcome features of the occasion.

Mr. Goodrich opened the concert auspiciously with the Bach toccata. It hardly seemed, at first—we are speaking of the Friday afternoon rehearsal—as if the newly-renovated organ was strictly on "good behavior," and one felt that Mr. Goodrich, having apprehensions of his own, was proceeding rather gingerly. As he progressed, however, this impression wore off. His solid musical attainments, his skill and fine taste in registration, and the glowing music that he discoursed, gained him warm applause at the conclusion of his performance.

The concerto by Handel is by no means one of the most extraordinary creations of that trenchant composer, but it is lusty, wholesome, open-air music. The five pieces played yesterday are in the nature of short "divertimenti," and they give the impression of having been penned with the haste so characteristic of one of the most rapid music makers of any generation. A fine, healthy vigor courses through the measures, which at their least point never fail to be entertaining. "Pomposo" is not a bad title applied to the first movement, with its vigorous stride. The third, where the wind players gave a wonderful exhibition of their impeccable virtuosity, roused much friendly enthusiasm and the artists were compelled to bow their acknowledgments. They again did so at the conclusion of the last allegro, a piece of breezy, assertive humor which brought an end to a pleasure that we would fain experience more often.

A genuine organ concerto, in the highest sense of the word, is rarely met with. In the composition heard yesterday Rheinberger unites his unusual scholarship and constructive power with dignity and worth of thematic material and a fine sonority in the scoring. It is a great work and would be worthy of the most respectful consideration if only by reason of the masterly handling of the organ in combination with the various groups of instruments. But more, it is sheer music, direct and concise in development, without a weak or extraneous passage in its broadly melodic measures. The impressive motif that opens the first movement is a figure that dominates the composition in a striking manner and which adds to its force and coherence. The festive finale brings to a stirring conclusion a work that is not only excellent organ music but a masterpiece in the form of a concerto. Here Mr. Goodrich played with the utmost enthusiasm and authority. He was ably seconded in his efforts by the orchestra and there was again, to a still greater degree, demonstrative approval of a brilliant interpretation.

The "Redemption" was composed in the period immediately following the Franco-Prussian war. The symphonic piece given yesterday, which divides the work into two parts, was introduced at a later date. The score bears the inscription: "The ages pass. The joy of the world which is transformed by the words of Christ."

There are Wagnerian moments in this excerpt, but the scheme of key color, the instrumentation, the contour of the phrases and the lucid working out of the motifs, above all the subtle, intangible atmosphere that pervades each measure, are all Franck's own and they made a lasting impression.

Franck is said to have lacked dramatic instinct and this is undoubtedly true to a large degree. Such a side, however, must have existed in the character of the man, though by reason of his quiet life translated into fervid mysticism and priestly eloquence. There are passages in many of his works which, if not dramatic in the theatrical sense of the term, are certainly fraught with strong emotional significance, passages where his speech becomes exceedingly poignant and impressive. Recall, for instance, that mighty coden of the last movement of the D minor symphony, where the themes that have been heard before reappear, one by one, in response to the majestic summons of the trombones, and pass by in superb processional, a never-to-be forgotten page. This orchestral interlude from the Redemption, is it not a soul-drama? After pages of supreme beauty, of touching simplicity and naive adoration, that later swells into triumphant praise, the pontifical proclamation by the brass is a searching voice, a moving experience. The music, by virtue of its solid structure and throbbing modern color, came as a worthy sequel to the other numbers of the programme, and it left an ineffaceable memory.

Friday afternoon at 2:30, and Saturday evening at 8, the 11th public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. Mme. Teresa Carreno pianiste, will be soloist on this occasion, and she will play MacDowell's second piano concerto, Op. 23, in D minor, the greatest work which has yet been written in this form by an American composer. The novelty of the programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, a young German composer, a resident of Munich and a pupil of Richard Strauss. The work is one of large dimensions and unusual difficulty. Rehearsals in its preparation have been in order for some weeks, and it is said to have required more painstaking labor than Strauss' "Domestica" when the latter work was given last season. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture concludes the programme.

...certo, and soli by Mr. ...

Monday evening ... in Potter Hall the Longy Club of players on ... struments will give its second ... the season. The item of chief ... will be a "Sinfonia da Camera" by Wolf-Ferrari, one of the youngest and most promising composers of the Italo-German school, a native of Venice, and now director of the Liceo Benedetto Marcello of that city. This work was to have been given by the Boston Symphony Quartet last winter, with Dr. Muck as pianist, but the time required for its preparation could not be found. The "Sinfonia" is scored for piano, strings, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. Mr. K. Keller, double bass, and the Theodorowicz string quartet will assist in the performance. Other items of the programme will be a symphonic poem by Gustave Bumcke, "Der Spaziergang," for flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons and a harp; and the Trio des Ismalites, from Berlioz, "Infancy of Christ," for two flutes and harp. Mr. Heinrich Schuecker will be harpist.

N. Y. AMERICAN

DEC 24 1907

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concert master pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World

BULLETIN

From ...

PHILADELPHIA, PA

Address ...

DEC 21 1907

Date ...

Campanari in the cast.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.

...ork, 1884

RECORD

m ...

PHILADELPHIA, PA

ress ...

e DEC 22 1907

...will be played by Hyman Cohen.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Madame Teresa Carreno.

...Mus. London, 1881; New York, 1884

...paper Cutting Bureau in the World

TELEGRAPH

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 21 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianiste.

...shed: London, 1881; New York, 1884

PUBLIC LEDGER

ess ...

PHILADELPHIA, PA

DEC 22 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6th. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Madame Teresa Carreno.

...blished: London, 1881; New York, 188

STAR.

...INGTON, D. C

DEC 22 1907

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7. The soloists will be Mme. Teresa Carreno.

The last appearance of Paderewski in Boston this year will be at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Paderewski with his well-known generosity gives his services to the orchestra, and redeems the promise which he was unable to fulfil three years ago, when he was last in America. With the orchestra he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, commonly known as the "Emperor." The orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the performance of which under Dr. Muck made such a profound impression last spring. The program has been purposely made short, as it is realized that Mr. Paderewski will probably be asked to play several encores.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The soloist at the eleventh public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, Jan. 3 and Saturday evening, Jan. 4, will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who has returned to this country after an absence of several years. Mme. Carreno came to America from Australia, where she had spent several months, and she has already played several times in the Middle West. Accounts seem to agree that she still is the great piannst of former times, and that her art is as brilliant as ever. She will play MacDowell's concerto for D minor, No. 2, op. 23. The novelty on the program will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. Bischoff is a young German, a resident of Munich and a pupil of Richard Strauss. The work is one of very large dimensions and of enormous difficulty. Dr. Muck and the orchestra have been at work on it for the past two weeks, and the amount of preparation necessary for its performance exceeds that which was given to Strauss' "Symfonia Domestica." The other work on the program will be Dvorak's "Carnival" overture.

LONGY CLUB CONCERT

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall Monday evening, at 8.15 o'clock. The item of chief interest on the program will be a Sinfonia da Camara by Wolf-Ferrari, who is one of the youngest and one of the most promising composers of the Italo-German school. A year ago Professor Willy Hess had it on his prospectus as one of the novelties to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Quartet, and Dr. Muck was to have played the piano part, but the required time to prepare it was not found, and this year Mr. Longy will bring it out. It calls for piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. In this the Longy Club will have the assistance of Mr. K. Keller, bass; and the Theodorowicz String Quartet, comprising Messrs. Theodorowicz, Ribarsch, Gietzen, and J. Keller. The first number will be a symphonic poem by Gustav Bumcke, entitled "Der Spaziergang," for flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons and harp, and the second number will be the Trio des Ismaelites, from the "Infancy of Christ," for two flutes and a harp. Mr. Heinrich Schuecker will be the harpist.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
BULLETIN
m ... PHILADELPHIA, PA
dress ...
te ... DEC 21 1907

The active interest which the women of this country are taking in musical affairs is illustrated by the fact that during the coming Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra five concerts will be given under the local direction of women, all of whom are taking large risks in bringing to their respective cities so expensive an organization. These five concerts are in Buffalo, Indianapolis, Columbus, and two in Cincinnati. Local management of musical affairs has opened up a wide field of usefulness to many women in all parts of the country, and it is said that very few of them make failures of their undertakings.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
om ...
dress PHILADELPHIA, PA
te ... DEC 22 1907

LOCAL BRIEFS

Madame Teresa Carreno will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert in the Academy on January 6.

The committee indorsing the movement looking to the organization of the people's sight-singing classes in various sections of the city are planning to start a class in Roxborough early in January for residents of Wissahickon, Manayunk and Falls of Schuylkill and another in Frankford for those who reside in that vicinity.

INQUIRER.
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 22 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Madame Teresa Carreno.

Monday evening at 8:15 in Potter Hall the Longy Club of players on wind instruments will give its second concert of the season. The item of chief interest will be a "Sinfonia da Camera" by Wolf-Ferrari, one of the youngest and most promising composers of the Italo-German school, a native of Venice, and now director of the Liceo Benedetto Marcello of that city. This work was to have been given by the Boston Symphony Quartet last winter, with Dr. Muck as pianist, but the time required for its preparation could not be found. The "Sinfonia" is scored for piano, strings, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. Mr. K. Keller, double bass, and the Theodorowicz string quartet will assist in the performance. Other items of the programme will be a symphonic poem by Gustave Bumcke, "Der Spaziergang," for flute, oboe, English horn, two clarinets, horn, two bassoons and a harp; and the Trio des Ismalites, from Berlioz, "Infancy of Christ," for two flutes and harp. Mr. Heinrich Schuecker will be harpist.

AMERICAN
DEC 24 19
The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Madame Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concert master pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.
From ...
BULLETIN.
Address ... PHILA, PA
Date ... DEC 24 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

Wallace Goodrich the Symphony Soloist.

Paderewski Will Play Tonight at Pension Fund Benefit.

Concert by Longy Club—Other Events.

The 10th Symphony program was unusually interesting for the organ figured largely in the musid, two of the four numbers utilizing the instrument, which was played by Mr Wallace Goodrich. Two selections were given for the first time at these concerts and two had their "first times" in this city. So all in all Dr Muck offered Bach, Handel, Rheinberger and Franck in particularly enjoyable forms.

The organ has lately been repaired and its prominence in the program was practically a test of its quality, for the Bach and Rheinberger numbers varied sufficiently in style to enable Mr Goodrich to exhibit the resources of the instrument quite fully. The different varieties of tone colors were clear and true, the effects of the deep pedal stops were thoroughly good and free from harshness and the many voices of the grand instrument not only sounded sweet, but the prompt and harmonious responses showed the admirable workmanship of the mechanical part of the organ.

Mr Goodrich is a thorough master of the instrument and being very familiar with this one his interpretations were of a superior order. The dynamic variations and changes of stops were made in a manner unusually quiet and his admirable style of managing pedals and stops showed little of the spasmodic violence so frequently displayed by organists.

The Bach toccata is one of many intermittent little harmonies that call for rapid finger work in the lighter registers. These Mr Goodrich fingered deftly, handling the changing stops without any fuss. These responses were prompt and the combinations blended perfectly. Of a more exacting nature was the Rheinberger concerto, played with part of the orchestra. In this the tonal pitch of instrument and the orchestra were even throughout.

Against a string orchestra and three horns the organ voices showed up brilliantly, the upper parts with the violins and the heavier voices with the deeper brasses. The grandeur of the first movement was impressively presented, and the florid finale went very smoothly, the big instrument being kept in splendid unison by Mr Goodrich. The soloist was cordially welcomed, heartily applauded and recalled several times after each selection.

In the Handel concerto, which is rather old-fashioned in form and treatment, the wind orchestras and strings for which it was written are to be credited with admirable work in the elaborate musical conversations that run through the composition. The members of the wind contingents played their difficult running phrases in the third movement so smoothly and in such fine unison that they were marked for special recognition by the audience. Dr Muck's reading of the "Redemption" poem by Franck was notably dignified and impressive.

This week's program will have for soloist Mme Teresa Carreno, the celebrated pianist, who has been absent from this country for several years. She will play the D minor concerto by Edward MacDowell, who studied with her at the beginning of his career as a pianist. There will be a novelty number, Hermann Bischoff's E major symphony, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture will close the program.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert.

The last appearance of Paderewski in Boston this year will be at the pension fund concert of the Boston symphony orchestra in Symphony hall this evening. Mr Paderewski with his well-known generosity gives his services to the orchestra, and redeems the promise which he was unable to fulfil three years ago, when he was last in America. With the orchestra he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, commonly known as the "Emperor."

The orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the performance of which under Dr Muck made such a profound impression last spring. The program has been purposely made short, as it is realized that Mr Paderewski will probably be asked to play several encores.

The Longy Club.

The second concert of the Longy club will be given in Potter hall tomorrow evening, and the item of chief interest on the program will be a "sinfonia da camera" by Wolf-Ferrail, who is one of the youngest and one of the most promising composers of the Italo-German school. A year ago Prof Willy Hess had it on his prospectus as one of the novelties to be performed by the Boston symphony orchestra quartet, and Dr Muck was to have played the piano part, but the required time to prepare it was not found, and this year Mr Longy will bring it out.

It calls for piano, two violins, viola, cello, bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. In this the Longy club will have the assistance of Mr K. Keller bass and the Theodorowicz string quartet. The other number will be a symphonic poem by Gustav Bumcke, entitled "Der Spaziergang," and trio from the "Infancy of Christ" by Berlioz, for two flutes and a harp. Mr Heinrich Schuecker will be the harpist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the 10th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Toccata for organ in D minor, Bach; concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras, Handel (arr. by G. Kogel); concerto No. I. for organ, three horns and strings, Rheinberger; symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Cesar Franck. Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich was soloist. The numbers on the programme, with the exception of the Handel concerto, two or three movements of which have been given before in a different version, were performed for the first time at these concerts.

Such a programme, devoted to a style of music that we do not hear too much of in these days, was an unusual gratification. The concertos by Handel and Rheinberger, which offered opportunities for the different divisions of the orchestra to display their capabilities, were not the least welcome features of the occasion.

Mr. Goodrich opened the concert auspiciously with the Bach toccata. It hardly seemed, at first—we are speaking of the Friday afternoon rehearsal—as if the newly-renovated organ was strictly on "good behavior," and one felt that Mr. Goodrich, having apprehensions of his own, was proceeding rather gingerly. As he progressed, however, this impression wore off. His solid musical attainments, his skill and fine taste in registration, and the glowing music that he discoursed, gained him warm applause at the conclusion of his performance.

The concerto by Handel is by no means one of the most extraordinary creations of that trenchant composer, but it is lusty, wholesome, open-air music. The five pieces played yesterday are in the nature of short "divertimenti," and they give the impression of having been penned with the haste so characteristic of one of the most rapid music makers of any generation. A fine, healthy vigor courses through the measures, which at their least point never fail to be entertaining. "Pomposo" is not a bad title applied to the first movement, with its vigorous stride. The third, where the wind players gave a wonderful exhibition of their impeccable virtuosity, roused much friendly enthusiasm and the artists were compelled to bow their acknowledgments. They again did so at the conclusion of the last allegro, a piece of breezy, assertive humor which brought an end to a pleasure that we would fain experience more often.

A genuine organ concerto, in the highest sense of the word, is rarely met with. In the composition heard yesterday Rheinberger unites his unusual scholarship and constructive power with dignity and worth of thematic material and a fine sonority in the scoring. It is a great work and would be worthy of the most respectful consideration if only by reason of the masterly handling of the organ in combination with the various groups of instruments. But more, it is sheer music, direct and concise in development, without a weak or extraneous passage in its broadly melodic measures. The impressive motif that opens the first movement is a figure that dominates the composition in a striking manner and which adds to its force and coherence. The festive finale brings to a stirring conclusion a work that is not only excellent organ music but a masterpiece in the form of a concerto. Here Mr. Goodrich played with the utmost enthusiasm and authority. He was ably seconded in his efforts by the orchestra and there was again, to a still greater degree, demonstrative approval of a brilliant interpretation.

The "Redemption" was composed in the period immediately following the Franco-Prussian war. The symphonic piece given yesterday, which divides the work into two parts, was introduced at a later date. The score bears the inscription: "The ages pass. The joy of the world which is transformed by the words of Christ."

There are Wagnerian moments in this excerpt, but the scheme of key color, the instrumentation, the contour of the phrases and the lucid working out of the motifs, above all the subtle, intangible atmosphere that pervades each measure, are all Franck's own and they made a lasting impression.

Franck is said to have lacked dramatic instinct and this is undoubtedly true to a large degree. Such a side, however, must have existed in the character of the man, though by reason of his quiet life translated into fervid mysticism and priestly eloquence. There are passages in many of his works which, if not dramatic in the theatrical sense of the term, are certainly fraught with strong emotional significance, passages where his speech becomes exceedingly poignant and impressive. Recall, for instance, that mighty coden of the last movement of the D minor symphony, where the themes that have been heard before reappear, one by one, in response to the majestic summons of the trombones, and pass by in superb processional, a never-to-be forgotten page. This orchestral interlude from the Redemption, is it not a soul-drama? After pages of supreme beauty, of touching simplicity and naive adoration, that later swells into triumphant praise, the pontifical proclamation by the brass is a searching voice, a moving experience. The music, by virtue of its solid structure and throbbing modern color, came as a worthy sequel to the other numbers of the programme, and it left an ineffaceable memory.

Friday afternoon at 2:30, and Saturday evening at 8, the 11th public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. Mme. Teresa Carreno pianiste, will be soloist on this occasion, and she will play MacDowell's second piano concerto, Op. 23, in D minor, the greatest work which has yet been written in this form by an American composer. The novelty of the programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, a young German composer, a resident of Munich and a pupil of Richard Strauss. The work is one of large dimensions and unusual difficulty. Rehearsals in its preparation have been in order for some weeks, and it is said to have required more painstaking labor than Strauss' "Domestica" when the latter work was given last season. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture concludes the programme.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST DECEMBER 29, 1907
SYMPHONY CONCERT
The programme of the 10th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Toccata for organ in D minor, Bach; concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras, Handel (arr. by G. Kogel); concerto No. I. for organ, three horns and strings, Rheinberger; symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Cesar Franck. Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich was soloist. The numbers on the programme, with the exception of the Handel concerto, two or three movements of which have been given before in a different version, were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Such a programme, devoted to a style of music that we do not hear too much of in these days, was an unusual gratification. The concertos by Handel and Rheinberger, which offered opportunities for the different divisions of the orchestra to display their capabilities, were not the least welcome features of the occasion.
Mr. Goodrich opened the concert auspiciously with the Bach toccata. It hardly seemed, at first—we are speaking of the Friday afternoon rehearsal—as if the newly-renovated organ was strictly on "good behavior," and one felt that Mr. Goodrich, having apprehensions of his own, was proceeding rather gingerly. As he progressed, however, this impression wore off. His solid musical attainments, his skill and fine taste in registration, and the glowing music that he discoursed, gained him warm applause at the conclusion of his performance.
The concerto by Handel is by no means one of the most extraordinary creations of that trenchant composer, but it is lusty, wholesome, open-air music. The five pieces played yesterday are in the nature of short "divertimenti," and they give the impression of having been penned with the haste so characteristic of one of the most rapid music makers of any generation. A fine, healthy vigor courses through the measures, which at their least point never fail to be entertaining. "Pomposo" is not a bad title applied to the first movement, with its vigorous stride. The third, where the wind players gave a wonderful exhibition of their impeccable virtuosity, roused much friendly enthusiasm and the artists were compelled to bow their acknowledgments. They again did so at the conclusion of the last allegro, a piece of breezy, assertive humor which brought an end to a pleasure that we would fain experience more often.
A genuine organ concerto, in the highest sense of the word, is rarely met with. In the composition heard yesterday Rheinberger unites his unusual scholarship and constructive power with dignity and worth of thematic material and a fine sonority in the scoring. It is a great work and would be worthy of the most respectful consideration if only by reason of the masterly handling of the organ in combination with the various groups of instruments. But more, it is sheer music, direct and concise in development, without a weak or extraneous passage in its broadly melodic measures. The impressive motif that opens the first movement is a figure that dominates the composition in a striking manner and which adds to its force and coherence. The festive finale brings to a stirring conclusion a work that is not only excellent organ music but a masterpiece in the form of a concerto. Here Mr. Goodrich played with the utmost enthusiasm and authority. He was ably seconded in his efforts by the orchestra and there was again, to a still greater degree, demonstrative approval of a brilliant interpretation.
The "Redemption" was composed in the period immediately following the Franco-Prussian war. The symphonic piece given yesterday, which divides the work into two parts, was introduced at a later date. The score bears the inscription: "The ages pass. The joy of the world which is transformed by the words of Christ."
There are Wagnerian moments in this excerpt, but the scheme of key color, the instrumentation, the contour of the phrases and the lucid working out of the motifs, above all the subtle, intangible atmosphere that pervades each measure, are all Franck's own and they made a lasting impression.
Franck is said to have lacked dramatic instinct and this is undoubtedly true to a large degree. Such a side, however, must have existed in the character of the man, though by reason of his quiet life translated into fervid mysticism and priestly eloquence. There are passages in many of his works which, if not dramatic in the theatrical sense of the term, are certainly fraught with strong emotional significance, passages where his speech becomes exceedingly poignant and impressive. Recall, for instance, that mighty coden of the last movement of the D minor symphony, where the themes that have been heard before reappear, one by one, in response to the majestic summons of the trombones, and pass by in superb processional, a never-to-be forgotten page. This orchestral interlude from the Redemption, is it not a soul-drama? After pages of supreme beauty, of touching simplicity and naive adoration, that later swells into triumphant praise, the pontifical proclamation by the brass is a searching voice, a moving experience. The music, by virtue of its solid structure and throbbing modern color, came as a worthy sequel to the other numbers of the programme, and it left an ineffaceable memory.
Friday afternoon at 2:30, and Saturday evening at 8, the 11th public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. Mme. Teresa Carreno pianiste, will be soloist on this occasion, and she will play MacDowell's second piano concerto, Op. 23, in D minor, the greatest work which has yet been written in this form by an American composer. The novelty of the programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff, a young German composer, a resident of Munich and a pupil of Richard Strauss. The work is one of large dimensions and unusual difficulty. Rehearsals in its preparation have been in order for some weeks, and it is said to have required more painstaking labor than Strauss' "Domestica" when the latter work was given last season. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture concludes the programme.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Campanari in the cast.
The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Mme. Teresa Carreno.
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TELEGRAPH
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 21 1907
The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, pianiste.
PHILADELPHIA, PA
DEC 22 1907
The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 6th. The soloist will be the distinguished pianist, Madame Teresa Carreno.
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 7. The soloists will be Mme. Teresa Carreno.

FINE PROGRAMME AT 10TH SYMPHONY

Organ Music by Bach and Rheinberger Is Played by Goodrich.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Toccata in D minor for organ.....Bach
Concerto for strings and two wind choirs..
.....Handel
Concerto in F major for organ, strings and three horns.....Rheinberger
Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"...
.....Cesar Franck

Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras was played here under Mr. Nikisch in the Christmas week of 1891. Last night Dr. Muck presented a version of movements of this work arranged and edited by Gustav R. Kogel, but he in turn edited Kogel's arrangement, in some instances returning to Handel's text, as in the Largo, where Kogel had without warrant given certain passages to a solo violin.

Kogel took five of the original eight movements and an unfinished ninth. And five are enough, for as the music was performed last night there was a desire for more of it. The first movement, "Pomposo," recalled Mr. Runciman's admirable characterization, "Mr. George Frideric Handel is by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music." The hearer had the same feeling listening a few years ago to the opening movement of one of Handel's piano suites as played by Mr. Bauer. This pride of wig and clouded cane is peculiar to Handel among all composers.

There is also a massive directness, a haughty sturdiness that we do not find elsewhere. There is sea-coal, beef and ale in this music. Nor do we find in other composers of his period the lovely melodic quality that distinguishes the Largo in this concerto. It is hard to say whether this movement or the preceding one, in which the chief oboe parts were played exceedingly well by Messrs. Longy and Mueller, gave the more pleasure. The whole concerto was played finely and also with amazing gusto. Would that we could hear more of Handel's music! At present he is known in this country as the composer of "The Messiah," the variations entitled "The Harmonious Blacksmith" and the monstrous perversion of a simple operatic air dignified, forsooth, by the title "Handel's Largo."

The Symphonic Piece from Cesar Franck's poem symphony, "The Redemption," was performed here for the first time. It was meet and fitting that it was played in Christmas week, for the motto of the composition is as follows: "The ages pass. The joy of the world transformed and made radiant by the words of Christ." Some of the thematic material is taken from motives that preceded; a Christmas song, the Archangel's air; but the chief theme was found by Franck for this second version of the Symphonic Piece, and the theme is, indeed, of a celestial character, nor was Chabrier extravagant when he called the theme "music itself."

Only the second theme in the slow movement of the Ninth Symphony can be compared with it for its serenity, and yet deep emotion. The other themes in the Symphonic Piece have decided character, and the suggestion of the Angelic Host is almost overpowering in its simple grandeur, but this chief motive slowly elaborated and always wonderfully sonorous is the dominating feature of the composition. In bringing out the full beauty of such music the first problem of all is to take as though instinctively the proper, the only pace for the chief melodic thought. Dr. Muck was singularly fortunate in this, and on this foundation he reared a stately cathedral of tonal devotion.

Mr. Goodrich played the toccata and fugue that is known to concert-goers through Tausig's thunderous transcription for the piano. It is one of the most dramatic of Bach's works, a virtuoso piece after the manner of Buxtehude. The first section has a fine extravagance, and the spirit is demoniacal in its fire and energy. The fugue section is of less sustained interest, and in order to keep the attention of the hearer the pace should be maintained with inexorable rigor. Mr. Goodrich gave an excellent performance, especially of the opening and closing sections.

The fugue might perhaps have been performed with more sustained fury. Mr. Goodrich's registration was judicious. It was not belittling through an attempt after infinite variety; it was not dry and monotonous through mistaken and ignorant conservatism.

Rheinberger's organ concerto was also played for the first time at these concerts. The composer was unusually successful in this: in the establishment of a blend of his orchestra and the organ which are apt to stand apart, the one distrustful or jealous of the other, or to quarrel openly. Rheinberger is often called a pedant, and it is not to be denied that in his teaching as in much of his music he displayed knowledge rather than inspiration; but with all his narrowness he had a romantic streak in his nature. This is shown in some of his organ sonatas, in the beautifully melancholy little organ fugue written on Bach's name, and in this concerto, which as performed by Mr. Goodrich and the orchestra gave immediate pleasure and marked impression.

New York Times.
DEC 22 1907

[illegible] pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, now concert master pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

[illegible] YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG
dress
te DEC 22 1907

Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters sind für den 9. Januar-Abend und 11. Januar-Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall angesetzt. Im erstgenannten Konzert wird Frau Theresa Carrenno MacDowell's zweites Pianoforte-Konzert spielen, im Samstagkonzert wirkt Herr Carl Wendling, Konzertmeister des Bostoner Orchesters, solistisch mit, und zwar wird er wahrscheinlich Mozart's A-Dur-Violin-Konzert spielen. Die Oratoriengesellschaft kündigt für kommenden Donnerstag Abend und kommenden Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall die üblichen Darbietungen von Händel's „Messias" unter der Leitung von Herrn Frank Damrosch an. Als Solisten fungiren die Damen: Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Sopran, Margaret, Keyes, Alt, Evelyn Fogg, Alt, sowie die Herren Dan Beddoe, Tenor, und David Bispham, Bariton. — Das neue New Yorker Trio, bestehend aus den Herren Alexander Saslawsky, Violinist, Henry Bramsen, Cellist, und Paolo Gallico, Pianist, werden sich dem New Yorker Publikum am nächsten Freitag Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall mit folgendem Programm vorstellen: Schubert, Trio, Op. 100, Mozart, Sonate XII für Violine und Piano, und Tschaikowsky, Trio Op. 50. — Das Olive Mead-Quartett in seiner jetzigen Zusammensetzung aus den Damen Olive Mead, Gladys North, Lillian Littlehales und Helen Reynolds bestehend, spielt in dieser Saison zum erstenmal am 2. Januar Abends in Mendelssohn Hall unter Mitwirkung des Herrn Arthur Whiting. — Der erste Quartett-Abend des Flonzaley-Quartetts findet am 14. Januar Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall statt. — Die Cellistin Fräulein May Mukle wird ihr erstes Rezital am 3. Januar in Mendelssohn Hall geben. — Herr Karl Grienauer und die Pianistin Frl. Wynni Pyle veranstalten am 9. Januar Abends in Mendelssohn Hall ein gemeinsames Rezital unter Mitwirkung von Frau Karl Grienauer, welche die Pianobegleitung besorgt, und der jugendlichen Cellistinnen Frl. Helen Scholder und Goldie Grok.

[illegible] TRIBUNE.
dress
ate 1907

GENERAL NOTES.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artists will be Mme. Teresa Carreño, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concertmaster pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

Few persons not directly interested have any idea of the important part that women are taking in this country in the business side of music. Illustrative of this is the coming Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the last week of January. The orchestra will give six concerts on six successive days, one each in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus and two in Cincinnati. Five of these concerts are under the local direction of women, all of whom are taking large risks in bringing to their respective cities so expensive an organization. Local management of musical affairs has opened up a wide field of usefulness to many women in all parts of the country, and few of them have made failures of their undertakings.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.
te DEC 22 1907

Few people not directly interested have any idea of the important part that women are taking in the business side of music in this country. Managers having artists to place do at least half their local business with women, and most satisfactorily is it done, as a general rule. Illustrative of this is the coming Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the last week of January. The orchestra will give concerts on successive days in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. These concerts are under the local direction of women, all of whom are taking large risks in bringing to their respective cities so expensive an organization.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 19, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concertmaster pro tem of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as a soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)
dress
DEC 20 1907

HEINRICH CONRIED WILL NOT RESIGN

Directors of Metropolitan Opera House Deny Rumor That Impresario Will Leave Company.

After a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Metropolitan Opera House with Heinrich Conried, all the old rumors about the impresario's retirement were revived in the neighborhood of the big house at Broadway and Thirty-ninth street. A member of the Board of Directors, when asked about the truth of these rumors, was emphatic in his denial.

"The meeting had nothing whatever to do with Mr. Conried," he said, "and his coming or going was not in any way touched upon. There was absolutely no talk about finding a successor for him."

Another director said practically the same thing, adding:—

"I am sure that no change of any sort is contemplated for some years to come in connection with the directorship of the Metropolitan.

"The reports are unfounded which mention such candidates for the position as C. E. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony; Andreas Dippel, one of the opera house tenors; Tito Riccordi, head of the Italian music publishing house, and Ernest Goerlitz, present assistant director. None of these men has made application for the position."

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)
Idress
ite DEC. 24 1907

Dr. Karl Muck on Boston.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Monday.—Boston's Symphony audiences, "the best listeners to music in the world," may be surprised to hear that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the orchestra, has said:—"Nowhere in Europe would it be possible to find so disrespectful an audience as that which throngs Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon. I have conducted in many cities in Europe, and never have I played before audiences that persist in leaving their seats before the orchestra finishes, as here in Boston."

1884

From
Address
Date DEC 21 1907

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concert master pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

[illegible]
dress NEW YORK EV'G POST
te DEC 21 1907

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Tere[illegible] reño, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concert-master, pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his début in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 26. 1907

At the Symphony Concerts of Jan. 3 and 4, Dr. Muck and the orchestra will play for the first time in America a symphony in E major by Herman Bischoff, one of the youngest of the newer German composers and a pupil and disciple of Richard Strauss. The symphony came to hearing at one of the musical festivals of last summer, and now it is going the rounds of German and Austrian concerts. It is long, difficult, fantastic and frankly programme music—the largest new piece Dr. Muck has yet undertaken this season.

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

(See Mr. Elson's Criticism in The Daily Advertiser.)

The first of these was the regular concert of Saturday. Yet it was not quite as "regular" as usual, as the following list may show:—

PROGRAMME.

Bach—Toccata for Organ alone. D minor.
Handel—Concerto in F, for strings and two wind orchestras.
Rheinberger—Concerto in F, for Organ, three horns and strings.
Franck—Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption.

Soloist, Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

It will be seen that this was a concert of peculiar, but very successful combinations. The opening number was not orchestral but an organ solo. Mr. Wallace Goodrich was warmly greeted as he came forward to the Console. He immediately justified this reception by giving a very brilliant interpretation of Bach's great Toccata, which has been heard frequently in its piano transcription, which we think only distorts it. Almost all Bostonians know how effective the organ is in Symphony Hall. The brilliant solo with its fugal culmination was only a foretaste of a still better display of the instrument combined with orchestra. At the close of the Toccata, Mr. Goodrich was much applauded and recalled.

His playing of Bach is modern and attractive. In this he follows the French idea. It may seem strange to state but one can often hear Bach played better in Paris than in Germany, because the French do not treat him in a pedantic manner but employ shading and contrasts as in works of the more modern school, in which they are quite right. The Germans often make Bach pedantic and dry in their performance of his works.

The second of the concerts was given last night in aid of the Pension Fund. The printed list of works was of the shortest.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky.....Symphonic Pathetique
Beethoven.....Piano Concerto in E flat, No. 5

Soloist, Ignaz Paderewski.

Let no one suppose that this was a brief concert because of the brevity of the above list. In the first place the two works above mentioned are each of them long in themselves. In the next place Mr. Paderewski is generous in giving encores and sometimes gives a "Postscript Concert" which is in itself of considerable length. In this case it was devoted to Chopin's compositions.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1907.

THE last appearance of Paderewski in Boston this year will be at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, this evening, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Paderewski, with his well-known generosity, gives his services to the orchestra, and redeems the promise which he was unable to fulfill three years ago, when he was last in America. With the orchestra he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, commonly known as the "Emperor." The orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the performance of which under Dr. Muck made such a profound impression last spring. The programme has been purposely made short, as it is realized that Mr. Paderewski will probably be asked to play several encores.

Harold Bauer, the pianist, is once more on this side of the Atlantic, having arrived back from Europe after a two years' absence, a few days ago. He is beginning his fifth transcontinental tour on Thursday afternoon next, with a recital at Jordan Hall, when he will undoubtedly be given a very hearty greeting by his many Boston admirers.

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall Monday evening. The item of chief interest on the programme will be a Sinfonia da Camara by Wolf-Ferrari, who is one of the youngest and one of the most promising composers of the Italo-German school.

The soloist at the 11th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who has returned to this country after an absence of several years. She will play MacDowell's concerto for D minor, No. 2, op. 23. The novelty on the programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. Bischoff is a young German, a resident of Munich and a pupil of Richard Strauss.

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL, DECEM

Second Symphony Programme. — De Gogorza's Recital.—Among the Local Studios.

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive programme for the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 31. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's, commonly known as the "Pathetic." Dr. Muck played this in Boston last season and his reading of this highly wrought, emotional work was one of the sensations of the year. It is on the programme for the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concerts on Sunday evening, the 29th. Another work of great interest on the programme is a new overture by Englebert Humperdinck, the composer of "Hansel and Gretel." It is an overture to an opera entitled "Heirath wider Willen," or the "Forced Marriage." The opera is based on Dumas's work, "The Ladies of St. Cyr." The soloist will be Carl Wendling, the concert-master of the orchestra. He will play Mozart's fifth concerto for violin and orchestra, in A major. The sale of seats opens at Steinert's on Saturday, Dec. 28.

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE
TUESDAY EVE., DEC. 31, at 8:15.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
DR. KARL MUCK, Conductor
Soloist
CARL WENDLING

[illegible] Humperdinck [illegible] "Heirath

HERALD — BOSTON,
DECEMBER 29, 1907.

FINE PROGRAMME AT 10TH SYMPHONY

Organ Music by Bach and Rheinberger Is Played by Goodrich.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Toccata in D minor for organ.....Bach
Concerto for strings and two wind choirs..Handel
Concerto in F major for organ, strings and three horns.....Rheinberger
Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"..Cesar Franck

Handel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras was played here under Mr. Nikisch in the Christmas week of 1891. Last night Dr. Muck presented a version of movements of this work arranged and edited by Gustav F. Kogel, but he in turn edited Kogel's arrangement, in some instances returning to Handel's text, as in the Largo, where Kogel had without warrant given certain passages to a solo violin.

Kogel took five of the original eight movements and an unfinished ninth. And five are enough, for as the music was performed last night there was a desire for more of it. The first movement, "Pomposo," recalled Mr. Runciman's admirable characterization, "Mr. George Frideric Handel is by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music." The hearer had the same feeling listening a few years ago to the opening movement of one of Handel's piano suites as played by Mr. Bauer. This pride of wig and clouded cane is peculiar to Handel among all composers.

There is also a massive directness, a haughty sturdiness that we do not find elsewhere. There is sea-coal, beef and ale in this music. Nor do we find in other composers of his period the lovely melodic quality that distinguishes the Largo in this concerto. It is hard to say whether this movement or the preceding one, in which the chief oboe parts were played exceedingly well by Messrs. Longy and Mueller, gave the more pleasure. The whole concerto was played finely and also with amazing gusto. Would that we could hear more of Handel's music! At present he is known in this country as the composer of "The Messiah," the variations entitled "The Harmonious Blacksmith" and the monstrous perversion of a simple operatic air dignified, forsooth, by the title "Handel's Largo."

The Symphonic Piece from Cesar Franck's poem symphony, "The Redemption," was performed here for the first time. It was meet and fitting that it was played in Christmas week, for the motto of the composition is as follows: "The ages pass. The joy of the world transformed and made radiant by the words of Christ." Some of the thematic material is taken from motives that preceded; a Christmas song, the Archangel's air; but the chief theme was found by Franck for this second version of the Symphonic Piece, and the theme is, indeed, of a celestial character, nor was Chabrier extravagant when he called the theme "music itself."

Only the second theme in the slow movement of the Ninth Symphony can be compared with it for its serenity, and yet deep emotion. The other themes in the Symphonic Piece have decided character, and the suggestion of the Angelic Host is almost overpowering in its simple grandeur, but this chief motive slowly elaborated and always wonderfully sonorous is the dominating feature of the composition. In bringing out the full beauty of such music the first problem of all is to take as though instinctively the proper the only pace for the chief melodic thought. Dr. Muck was singularly fortunate in this, and on this foundation he reared a stately cathedral of tonal devotion.

Mr. Goodrich played the toccata and fugue that is known to concert-goers through Tausig's thunderous transcription for the piano. It is one of the most dramatic of Bach's works, a virtuoso piece after the manner of Buxtehude. The first section has a fine extravagance, and the spirit is demoniacal in its fire and energy. The fugue section is of less sustained interest, and in order to keep the attention of the hearer the pace should be maintained with inexorable rigor. Mr. Goodrich gave an excellent performance, especially of the opening and closing sections.

The fugue might perhaps have been performed with more sustained fury. Mr. Goodrich's registration was judicious. It was not belittling through an attempt after infinite variety; it was not dry and monotonous through mistaken and ignorant conservatism.

Rheinberger's organ concerto was also played for the first time at these concerts. The composer was unusually successful in this: in the establishment of a blend of his orchestra and the organ which are apt to stand apart, the one distrustful or jealous of the other, or to quarrel openly. Rheinberger is often called a pedant, and it is not to be denied that in his teaching as in much of his music he displayed knowledge rather than inspiration; but with all his narrowness he had a romantic streak in his nature. This is shown in some of his organ sonatas, in the beautifully melancholy little organ fugue written on Fesca's name, and in this concerto, which as performed by Mr. Goodrich and the orchestra gave immediate pleasure and made a marked impression.

New York Times.

DEC 29 1907

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 11. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, now concert master of the orchestra, will make his début in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A

om .....

dress .....

te DEC 22 1907

— Die nächsten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters sind für den 9. Januar-Abend und 11. Januar-Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall angesetzt. Im erstgenannten Konzert wird Frau Theresa Carrenno MacDowell's zweites Pianoforte-Konzert spielen, im Samstagkonzert wirkt Herr Carl Wendling, Konzertmeister des Bostoner Orchesters, solistisch mit, und zwar wird er wahrscheinlich Mozart's A-Dur-Violin-Konzert spielen. Die Oratoriengesellschaft kündigt für kommenden Donnerstag Abend und kommenden Samstag Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall die üblichen Darbietungen von Händel's „Messias" unter der Leitung von Herrn Frank Damrosch an. Als Solisten fungiren die Damen: Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Sopran, Margaret, Keyes, Alt, Evelyn Fogg, Alt, sowie die Herren Dan Beddoe, Tenor, und David Bispham, Bariton. — Das neue New Yorker Trio, bestehend aus den Herren Alexander Saslavsky, Violinist, Henry Bramsen, Cellist, und Paolo Gallico, Pianist, werden sich dem New Yorker Publikum am nächsten Freitag Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall mit folgendem Programm vorstellen: Schubert, Trio, Op. 100, Mozart, Sonate XII für Violine und Piano, und Tschaikowsky, Trio Op. 50. — Das Olive Mead-Quartett in seiner jetzigen Zusammensetzung aus den Damen Olive Mead, Gladys North, Lillian Littlehales und Helen Reynolds bestehend, spielt in dieser Saison zum erstenmal am 2. Januar Abends in Mendelssohn Hall unter Mitwirkung des Herrn Arthur Whiting. — Der erste Quartett-Abend des Flonzaley-Quartetts findet am 14. Januar Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall statt. — Die Cellistin Fräulein May Mukle wird ihr erstes Rezital am 3. Januar in Mendelssohn Hall geben. — Herr Karl Grienauer und die Pianistin Frl. Wynni Pyle veranstalten am 9. Januar Abends in Mendelssohn Hall ein gemeinsames Rezital unter Mitwirkung von Frau Karl Grienauer, welche die Pianobegleitung besorgt, und der jugendlichen Cellistinnen Frl. Helen Scholder und Goldie Grok.

om .....

dress .....

ate .....

GENERAL NOTES.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artists will be Mme. Teresa Carreño, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concertmaster pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

Few persons not directly interested have any idea of the important part that women are taking in this country in the business side of music. Illustrative of this is the coming Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the last week of January. The orchestra will give six concerts on six successive days, one each in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis and Columbus and two in Cincinnati. Five of these concerts are under the local direction of women, all of whom are taking large risks in bringing to their respective cities so expensive an organization. Local management of musical affairs has opened up a wide field of usefulness to many women in all parts of the country, and few of them have made failures of their undertakings.

The New York Press
NEW YORK CITY.

te DEC 29 1907

Few people not directly interested have any idea of the important part that women are taking in the business side of music in this country. Managers having artists to place do at least half their local business with women, and most satisfactorily is it done, as a general rule. Illustrative of this is the coming Western trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be made in the last week of January. The orchestra will give concerts on successive days in Buffalo, Detroit, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati. These concerts are under the local direction of women, all of whom are taking large risks in bringing to their respective cities so expensive an organization.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 19, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concertmaster pro tem of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as a soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

NEW YORK EVENING TELEGRAM
(See other side.)

dress .....

te DEC 20 1907

HEINRICH CONRIED WILL NOT RESIGN

Directors of Metropolitan Opera House Deny Rumor That Impresario Will Leave Company.

After a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Metropolitan Opera House with Heinrich Conried, all the old rumors about the impresario's retirement were revived in the neighborhood of the big house at Broadway and Thirty-ninth street. A member of the Board of Directors, when asked about the truth of these rumors, was emphatic in his denial.

"The meeting had nothing whatever to do with Mr. Conried," he said, "and his coming or going was not in any way touched upon. There was absolutely no talk about finding a successor for him."

Another director said practically the same thing, adding:—

"I am sure that no change of any sort is contemplated for some years to come in connection with the directorship of the Metropolitan.

"The reports are unfounded which mention such candidates for the position as C. E. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony; Andreas Dippel, one of the opera house tenors; Tito Riccordi, head of the Italian music publishing house, and Ernest Goerlitz, present assistant director. None of these men has made application for the position."

NEW YORK HERALD
(See other side.)

ldress .....

ate. DEC 24 1907

Dr. Karl Muck on Boston.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Monday.—Boston's Symphony audiences, "the best listeners to music in the world," may be surprised to hear that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the orchestra, has said:—"Nowhere in Europe would it be possible to find so disrespectful an audience as that which throngs Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon. I have conducted in many cities in Europe, and never have I played before audiences that persist in leaving their seats before the orchestra finishes, as here in Boston."

From .....

Address .....

Date DEC 21 1907

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concert master pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

om NEW YORK EV'G POST

dress .....

te DEC 21 1907

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 9, and Saturday afternoon, January 11. On Thursday evening the solo artist will be Teresa Carreno, who will play MacDowell's second concerto for pianoforte. On Saturday afternoon Carl Wendling, concert-master, pro tem. of the orchestra, will make his début in New York as soloist. He will probably play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, DECEMBER 26. 1907

At the Symphony Concerts of Jan. 3 and 4, Dr. Muck and the orchestra will play for the first time in America a symphony in E major by Herman Bischoff, one of the youngest of the newer German composers and a pupil and disciple of Richard Strauss. The symphony came to hearing at one of the musical festivals of last summer, and now it is going the rounds of German and Austrian concerts. It is long, difficult, fantastic and frankly programme music—the largest new piece Dr. Muck has yet undertaken this season.

[95]

RE... MONDAY,
...BER 30, 1907

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

(From Mr. Elson's Criticism in The Daily Advertiser.)

The first of these was the regular concert of Saturday. Yet it was not quite as "regular" as usual, as the following list may show:—

PROGRAMME.

Bach—Toccata for Organ alone, D minor.
Handel—Concerto in F, for strings and two wind orchestras.
Rheinberger—Concerto in F, for Organ, three horns and strings.
Franck—Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption.

Soloist, Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

It will be seen that this was a concert of peculiar, but very successful combinations. The opening number was not orchestral but an organ solo. Mr. Wallace Goodrich was warmly greeted as he came forward to the Console. He immediately justified this reception by giving a very brilliant interpretation of Bach's great Toccata, which has been heard frequently in its piano transcription, which we think only distorts it. Almost all Bostonians know how effective the organ is in Symphony Hall. The brilliant solo with its fugal culmination was only a foretaste of a still better display of the instrument combined with orchestra. At the close of the Toccata, Mr. Goodrich was much applauded and recalled.

His playing of Bach is modern and attractive. In this he follows the French idea. It may seem strange to state but one can often hear Bach played better in Paris than in Germany, because the French do not treat him in a pedantic manner but employ shading and contrasts as in works of the more modern school, in which they are quite right. The Germans often make Bach pedantic and dry in their performance of his works.

The second of the concerts was given last night in aid of the Pension Fund. The printed list of works was of the shortest.

PROGRAMME.

Tschaikowsky.....Symphonic Pathetique
Beethoven.....Piano Concerto in E flat, No. 5

Soloist, Ignaz Paderewski.

Let no one suppose that this was a brief concert because of the brevity of the above list. In the first place the two works above mentioned are each of them long in themselves. In the next place Mr. Paderewski is generous in giving encores and sometimes gives a "Postscript Concert" which is in itself of considerable length. In this case it was devoted to Chopin's compositions.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1907.

THE last appearance of Paderewski in Boston this year will be at the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, this evening, at 8 o'clock. Mr. Paderewski, with his well-known generosity, gives his services to the orchestra, and redeems the promise which he was unable to fulfill three years ago, when he was last in America. With the orchestra he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat major, commonly known as the "Emperor." The orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the performance of which under Dr. Muck made such a profound impression last spring. The programme has been purposely made short, as it is realized that Mr. Paderewski will probably be asked to play several encores.

Harold Bauer, the pianist, is once more on this side of the Atlantic, having arrived back from Europe after a two years' absence, a few days ago. He is beginning his fifth transcontinental tour on Thursday afternoon next, with a recital at Jordan Hall, when he will undoubtedly be given a very hearty greeting by his many Boston admirers.

The second concert of the Longy Club will be given in Potter Hall Monday evening. The item of chief interest on the programme will be a Sinfonia da Camara by Wolf-Ferrari, who is one of the youngest and one of the most promising composers of the Italo-German school.

The soloist at the 11th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, who has returned to this country after an absence of several years. She will play MacDowell's concerto for D minor, No. 2, op. 23. The novelty on the programme will be a symphony in E major by Hermann Bischoff. Bischoff is a young German, a resident of Munich and a pupil of Richard Strauss.

PROVIDENCE SUNDAY JOURNAL, DECEMBER 29, 1907.

Second Symphony Programme. — De Gogorza's Recital.—Among the Local Studios.

Dr. Muck has arranged a most attractive programme for the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 31. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's, commonly known as the "Pathetic." Dr. Muck played this in Boston last season and his reading of this highly wrought, emotional work was one of the sensations of the year. It is on the programme for the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund concerts on Sunday evening, the 29th. Another work of great interest on the programme is a new overture by Englebert Humperdinck, the composer of "Hansel and Gretel." It is an overture to an opera entitled "Heirath wider Willen," or the "Forced Marriage." The opera is based on Dumas's work, "The Ladies of St. Cyr." The soloist will be Carl Wendling, the concert master of the orchestra. He will play Mozart's fifth concerto for violin and orchestra, in A major. The sale of seats opens at Steinert's on Saturday, Dec. 28.

INFANTRY HALL PROVIDENCE
TUESDAY EVE., DEC. 31, at 8:15.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
DR. KARL MUCK, Conductor.
Soloist
CARL WENDLING
Programme—Humperdinck, Overture "Heirath wider Willen"; Mozart, Violin Concerto No. 5, A major; Tschaikowsky, 6th Symphony (Pathetic).
Seats on sale at Steinert's, 327 Westminster st., Saturday, Dec. 28.

DECEMBER

The Symphony Concert

Czerwonky found as warm favor with audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday night as he had won with that of Friday afternoon, and his second playing of d'Ambrosio's concerto gave a calmer pleasure than did his first. On Friday his hearers could not help sharing his nervous session over his work. They entered in a measure into his fine excitement. On Saturday Mr. Czerwonky knew that what he had done once he could do again, and he led his listeners the more securely. That he thus put them at one with him on either occasion is clear proof that he is the born virtuoso. A kind Fate has given him the communicating and the sympathetic gift that is the secret and the life of virtuosity, without which it is only a mechanical perfection. To such an audience returns only a dry appreciation. The virtuoso must have in him and in his playing that sympathetic and stirring quality that gradually persuades, interests, charms and then engrosses an audience. He must alternately woo and command it. He must seem rapt and they must enter into his rapture. His playing must seem to have an emotional life of its own into which for the moment he is bidding his hearers. He must always be vivid. By many a token these traits are in Mr. Czerwonky and on the way to ripening.

Again, as well, Dr. Muck brought Humperdinck's overture to his opéra-comique "The Forced Marriage" to brilliant performance. It is easy to say that it is artificial music, but how could it be other, how should it rightly be other, when it was written for an artificial comedy cast in the still more artificial form of opéra-comique. Its artifice makes, rather, a part of its fitness, charm, and atmosphere. The other new piece, Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi," bore a second hearing as agreeably, but again there was cause for wonder in the non-Italian character of the music. So far as its quality goes, Bossi might have been of Bremen as plausibly as of Bologna, there is none too much of the Goldonian spirit in the intermezzi; and oftenest it is of the Goldoni who wrote elegant pieces à la Marivaux in Paris than the Goldoni who began at Italian theatres for popular Italian audiences. Somehow, when an Italian composer forswears the opera that should be his natural expression and cultivates the orchestral and choral forms as Sgambati and Bossi have done, he first and sedulously strips off his Latin characteristics. The less Latin he can sound apparently, the more he pleases himself. Yet there is no reason in the world why there should not be an Italian orchestral music as there is a German, or French, or a Russian—except that the Italian orchestral composer, when he writes, looks not in his heart, but in his music books.

An Episode and a Moral

To the Editor of the Transcript:

At last the just and well-merited rebuke has come, too long deferred, and heartily welcomed by the musical portion of the Symphony rehearsal audience. The sharp rap of Dr. Muck's baton, stopping the orchestra, was a rap which struck elsewhere than on the conductor's desk, and let us earnestly hope its effect will be taken to heart by that restless element which, constantly increasing and a source of disturbing annoyance to others, seems unable or unwilling to stay out a concert, whether it ends punctually at four or is prolonged a few minutes. This disturbing departure is most unfair and discourteous to a conductor, and cannot fail to upset his equilibrium, unless he be absolutely phlegmatic and lacking in temperament. If I am not much at fault in memory this untimely exodus occurred in marked degree at Dr. Muck's very first concert, and was certainly not an act of consideration toward a newcomer, nor one calculated to establish his faith in either our musical culture our courtesy or our consideration.

Dec. 20. F. S. STURGIS

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE

DEC 27 1907

CARL MEISEL DEAD.

He Was Famed as Violinist.—Original Member of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Dec. 27.—Carl Meisel, widely known as a master of the violin, as soloist and teacher, for nearly half a century, and one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died yesterday morning in his winter apartments at 466 Massachusetts avenue, from heart failure superinduced by an attack of the grip, from which he had suffered about four weeks. He lacked less than three months of being 80 years old.

The funeral will be held at the chapel at 2:30 p. m.

Mr. Meisel was born in Germany. At the age of 23 years he came to Boston where he made his home during the greater part of the rest of his life. He came of a highly musical family, though it is said he obtained greater fame than his father or any of his ancestors.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE

PROVIDENCE, R. I

DEC 28

Symphony Concert.

The sale of seats for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, tomorrow morning. The soloist will be Carl Wendling, concert-master of the orchestra. He will play Mozart's concerto [illegible]

WRACKS SYMPHONY AUDIENCES

"Such Disrespect Not Found in Europe," Says Dr. Muck

Boston Symphony audiences, who have been called "the best listeners to music in the world," may be surprised to hear that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the orchestra, says that "nowhere in Europe would it be possible to find as disrespectful an audience as that which throngs to Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon."

"LEAVE BEFORE FINISH"

Dr. Muck, who reads but does not speak English, said last night, his wife acting as interpreter, that last Friday he had been forced to stop the orchestra in the middle of a symphony because of the noise that was being made by people leaving their seats before the piece was finished.

"I have conducted in many of the music-loving cities of Europe," continued Dr. Muck, "and never have I played before audiences that persist in leaving their seats before the orchestra finishes, as here in Boston.

"The evening audiences are far superior and have given me little cause of complaint. But the afternoon audiences have been troublesome since the first of the season, and the tumult became so noticeable last Friday that I had to stop the orchestra until the hall was quiet."

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1907.

Charlotte Patti and Teresa Carreno
Rare Photo - Taken in 1882

Teresa Carreno, who comes to Boston as soloist for the Symphony concerts on Jan. 3 and 4, has had an interesting and picturesque career. When she was very young she became an intimate friend of Carlotta Patti, a sister of the great singer, Adeline Patti, so intimate that the two were photographed together. Her musical career began before she was 20 and she has been a favorite ever since. She has been four times wedded, her present husband being Arthur Tagliepetra, a brother of her second husband.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS DEMOCRAT.

PROVIDENCE, R. I

DEC 27 1907

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT TUESDAY EVENING

The sale of seats for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry hall on next Tuesday evening, opens at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, tomorrow (Saturday) morning. The soloist will be Carl Wendling, concert-master of the orchestra. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. The other works will be Humperdinck's overture [illegible]

[96]

A new symphony by a new composer makes the chief item on the programme of the next pair of Symphony Concerts. The composer, Hermann Bischoff, is one of the younger Germans of the "advanced" group of Munich, and he is frankly a disciple and pupil of Richard Strauss. His symphony in E major is long, intricate, ultra-modern and provided with an elaborate programme. It was first heard in Germany last summer, and now it is going from concert to concert. The symphony begins the programme, and then follows MacDowell's concerto for piano in E minor with Mme. Teresa Carreno, returning after long absence and in the fullness of her powers, to play the solo part. For ending comes Dvorák's bright "Carneval" overture.

Tomorrow, Sunday evening, at eight o'clock in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert for the current season for the increase of its Pension Fund, and Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, will appear with it, and probably for the last time in Boston during his present American tour. The chief orchestral number of the programme is Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, memorably performed by Dr. Muck last winter. Then follows Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Paderewski playing the piano part. Thereafter the pianist will add as many and as various solo pieces as please him.

The Longy Club of virtuosi upon wind instruments will give the second concert in its current series on Monday evening, at 8.15, in Potter Hall, and as usual much new music stands on the programme. The particularly notable piece is a "Chamber Symphony" by Wolf-Ferrari, the young composer of Latin blood and Teutonic training, who is beginning to be an important figure in German concert rooms. It enlists a little band of twelve instruments—piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, double bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. The other new piece is a tone-poem "Der Spaziergang" for a choir of wind instruments with an added harp and written by Gustav Bumcke. Between the two is the "Ishmaelites' Trio" for two flutes and harp from Berlioz's neglected oratorio "The Childhood of Christ." To perform this music, the club will have the assistance of several members of the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Schuecker, the harpist; Mr. Keller, the double bass player and the string quartet that Mr. Theodorowicz has lately formed. The other members are Messrs. Ribarsch, Gietzen and Keller.

GLOBE—MONDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1907

PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

Crowds Willing to Stand in Symphony Hall.

Great Artist at His Best and Never in Happier Mood.

If the city of Boston is lucky to have its Symphony orchestra, then the Symphony orchestra is no less lucky to have the aid of Jan Ignace Paderewski in its pension fund concert. It may have been his presence last night at the piano, or it may have been a real appreciation of the fact that the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," was to be played; at any rate, every seat in the vast hall was sold, and the people stood packed like herring under the balconies.

Paderewsky was on the program only to play the piano part in the Beethoven concerto in E flat major (No. 5, opus 73), but this was almost the least of his playing. The piano solo in that work is comparatively simple, and not tremendously dramatic or moving; the orchestra, which had been playing with great spirit and fire in the Tschaikowsky symphony, could barely meet the attack of the great virtuoso, so impetuous was he, and the concerto was played magnificently. But then, in response to applause that would not cease, Paderewski generously played a Chopin ballade in A flat, a beautiful mazourka, and thrice more before he finally refused to play again and sent the people home glowing.

The charge that Paderewski has been "banging" lately would have been easily disposed of last night, for never was there more clean-cut, delicate shading. As a matter of fact, most of the "banging" has been due to the position of hearers in the hall, and not to the pianist's methods at all. He was Paderewski still; there was the spell-weaving, the sentimental holding of the phrase, the mannerism, the hypnotic spell; but never was the player in happier mood. His playing of the ballade was beauty itself; one forgot technique, shading, execution, and fell into the spell of Chopin himself. And the first movement of the concerto—how delicate the touch, how bell-like the notes! There was a feeling of tenseness, to be sure; there was suppression, as though the player would be glad to loose his emotion in a flood of sound though forbidden by the score. And the swing and beat of the final movement, the delicious square-cornered, clean harmony of Beethoven, how Paderewski did give it to us without affectation and without pretentiousness!

The Tschaikowsky work was played with incredible force and color; Dr Muck's reading fairly took one's breath away. The deliciously sweet melody which forms the leading motive in the first movement, the snappy, Slavic march of the third, the storms of the finale, all seemed fresh and new; unheard before, so "vividly" was the symphony played.

As the concerto was finished Dr Muck and Paderewski shook hands warmly, and a huge wreath of laurel [illegible]

PADEREWSKI HERO AT PENSION FUND CONCERT

Great Pianist Gives Gratuitous Recital After Symphony Orchestra Concert—Organ as Solo Instrument at Regular Performance.

The dying year was sent on its way into history by two memorable concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra one the regular or tenth of the season on Saturday night, another the pension fund concert last night. At the first Wallace Goodrich, organist, was soloist; at the second, J. J. Paderewski, pianist, was the attraction.

The pension fund concert was a rare treat from every point of view. Not only was the artist in the best of humor but the orchestra was in record making mood and the combination of the world's greatest pianist and best orchestra produced a result at once satisfactory and inspiring.

The audience last night in Symphony Hall was limited by the walls of the building. Every seat was occupied when Dr. Muck raised his baton and along the aisles on the boundaries patrons stood three deep throughout the evening. The result of the evening is the swelling of the pension fund by exactly $4000.

Pays Own Expenses.

Mr. Paderewski donated his services, paying all of his expenses coming from a middle West tour, the ninety-nine members of the orchestra of course contributing their time and talent and Dr. Muck donating his.

The program was attractive. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and Beethoven's concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat major, "The Emperor." The symphony, as a whole, has been performed more satisfactorily under Mr. Gericke, especially in the first, second and last movements, but never before was the allegro molto vivace, the third, played with such nobleness. Its martial message was given with an artistry that commanded attention and commanded everybody to sit up and notice. It showed the extreme virtuosity of the strings, of the entire band for that matter, and Dr. Muck made the men acknowledge the applause, giving them credit.

Delightfully Informal.

Paderewski was in the best of humor and played the somewhat familiar concerto with the culture of interpretation for which he is justly renowned. He was delightfully informal turning to the audience in the second movement while reciting the theme and bowing graciously to Mr. and Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, who sat near the stage. At the conclusion of the allegro he left the stool and grasped Dr. Muck's hand, shaking it vigorously and bowing to the players. He repeated the act at the conclusion of the concerto. The orchestra remained seated and led the applause, and the artist after a wait returned to the instrument and played Chopin's "Ballade" in A major. Then one of Chopin's mazurkas and the "Etude," op. 25, and finished with the military polonaise in A.

The instrument used did not respond even to his wizard touch with the tone produced at other performances by the master, but any tonal defects were more than covered by the exquisite technique of the performer. Especially noticeable were the shortcoming of the instrument in the forte passages.

ORGAN MUSIC AT REGULAR CONCERT

Novelties and most acceptable novelties at that were offered at the regular concert by the Symphony Orchestra Saturday night. The big organ was the solo instrument of the evening, and used without the orchestra and with it Bach's toccata in D minor, the Peters edition, was the first number. Mr Goodrich demonstrated his superiority in organ playing by his superb pedal technique, although there might be room for doubt of his judgment in registration. The number was a most welcome variation. Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras (Kogel's arrangement) was the second number in this, especially in the third movement, the public had opportunity to observe a reason why the orchestra occupies first place among musical organizations. A passage for oboes, a duet seemingly impossible of performance, was played with an artistry and ease that challenged the world and brought forth such applause that Dr. Muck directed the artists, Mr. Longy and Mr. Lenom to acknowledge the demonstration.

Rheinberger's concerto in F for organ, three horns and strings was the third number, played for the first time at a Symphony concert. Mr. Goodrich was a pupil of the author and gave a scholarly interpretation of the work which, by the way, is most fascinating. Franck's symphonic poem, "The Redemption," played for the first time here, closed a most satisfactory concert.

The eleventh concert will be given Jan. 3, with Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. The program will include Bischoff's symphony in E, its first performance; McDowell's concerto for pianoforte No. 2, and Dvorak's overture, "Carneval."

TIMES.

WASHINGTON, D. C

DEC 29 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony will begin Tuesday afternoon, January 7.

TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1907

The Symphony Concert

Mr. Czerwonky found as warm favor with the audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday night as he had won with that of Friday afternoon, and his second playing of d'Ambrosio's concerto gave a calmer pleasure than did his first. On Friday his hearers could not help sharing his nervous tension over his work. They entered in a measure into his fine excitement. On Saturday Mr. Czerwonky knew that what he had done once he could do again, and he led his listeners the more securely. That he thus put them at one with him on either occasion is clear proof that he is the born virtuoso. A kind Fate has given him the communicating and the sympathetic gift that is the secret and the life of virtuosity, without which it is only a mechanical perfection. To such an audience returns only a dry appreciation. The virtuoso must have in him and in his playing that sympathetic and stirring quality that gradually persuades, interests, charms and then engrosses an audience. He must alternately woo and command it. He must seem rapt and they must enter into his rapture. His playing must seem to have an emotional life of its own into which for the moment he is bidding his hearers. He must always be vivid. By many a token these traits are in Mr. Czerwonky and on the way to ripening.

Again, as well, Dr. Muck brought Humperdinck's overture to his opéra-comique "The Forced Marriage" to brilliant performance. It is easy to say that it is artificial music, but how could it be other, how should it rightly be other, when it was written for an artificial comedy cast in the still more artificial form of opéra-comique. Its artifice makes, rather, a part of its fitness, charm, and atmosphere. The other new piece, Bossi's "Goldonian Intermezzi," bore a second hearing as agreeably, but again there was cause for wonder in the non-Italian character of the music. So far as its quality goes, Bossi might have been of Bremen as plausibly as of Bologna, there is none too much of the Goldonian spirit in the intermezzi; and oftenest it is of the Goldoni who wrote elegant pieces à la Marivaux in Paris than the Goldoni who began at Italian theatres for popular Italian audiences. Somehow, when an Italian composer forswears the opera that should be his natural expression and cultivates the orchestral and choral forms as Sgambati and Bossi have done, he first and sedulously strips off his Latin characteristics. The less Latin he can sound apparently, the more he pleases himself. Yet there is no reason in the world why there should not be an Italian orchestral music as there is a German, or French, or a Russian—except that the Italian orchestral composer, when he writes, looks not in his heart, but in his music books.

An Episode and a Moral

To the Editor of the Transcript:

At last the just and well-merited rebuke has come, too long deferred, and heartily welcomed by the musical portion of the Symphony rehearsal audience. The sharp rap of Dr. Muck's baton, stopping the orchestra, was a rap which struck elsewhere than on the conductor's desk, and let us earnestly hope its effect will be taken to heart by that restless element which, constantly increasing and a source of disturbing annoyance to others, seems unable or unwilling to stay out a concert, whether it ends punctually at four or is prolonged a few minutes. This disturbing departure is most unfair and discourteous to a conductor, and cannot fail to upset his equilibrium, unless he be absolutely phlegmatic and lacking in temperament. If I am not much at fault in memory this untimely exodus occurred in marked degree at Dr. Muck's very first concert, and was certainly not an act of consideration toward a newcomer, nor one calculated to establish his faith in either our musical culture our courtesy or our consideration.

Dec. 20. F. S. STURGIS.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

te .....

CARL MEISEL DEAD.

He Was Famed as Violinist.—Original Member of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Dec. 27.—Carl Meisel, widely known as a master of the violin, as soloist and teacher, for nearly half a century, and one of the original members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died yesterday morning in his winter apartments at 466 Massachusetts avenue, from heart failure superinduced by an attack of the grip, from which he had suffered about four weeks. He lacked less than three months of being 80 years old.

The funeral will be held at the chapel at 2:30 p. m.

Mr. Meisel was born in Germany. At the age of 23 years he came to Boston, where he made his home during the greater part of the rest of his life. He came of a highly musical family, though it is said he obtained greater fame than his father or any of his ancestors.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

Symphony Concert.

The sale of seats for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, will open at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, tomorrow morning. The soloist will be Carl Wendling, concert-master of the orchestra. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. The other works will be Humperdinck's overture, "Heirath wider Willen," which will be heard here for the first time, and [illegible] "Pathetic" symphony.

POST, TUESDAY.

WHACKS SYMPHONY AUDIENCES

"Such Disrespect Not Found in Europe," Says Dr. Muck

Boston Symphony audiences, who have been called "the best listeners to music in the world," may be surprised to hear that Dr. Karl Muck, leader of the orchestra, says that "nowhere in Europe would it be possible to find as disrespectful an audience as that which throngs to Symphony Hall each Friday afternoon."

"LEAVE BEFORE FINISH"

Dr. Muck, who reads but does not speak English, said last night, his wife acting as interpreter, that last Friday he had been forced to stop the orchestra in the middle of a symphony because of the noise that was being made by people leaving their seats before the piece was finished.

"I have conducted in many of the music-loving cities of Europe," continued Dr. Muck, "and never have I played before audiences that persist in leaving their seats before the orchestra finishes, as here in Boston.

"The evening audiences are far superior and have given me little cause of complaint. But the afternoon audiences have been troublesome since the first of the season, and the tumult became so noticeable last Friday that I had to stop the orchestra until the hall was quiet."

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1907.

Charlotte Patti and Theresa Carreno Rare Photo - Taken in 1882. —

Teresa Carreno, who comes to Boston as soloist for the Symphony concerts on Jan. 3 and 4, has had an interesting and picturesque career. When she was very young she became an intimate friend of Carlotta Patti, a sister of the great singer, Adeline Patti, so intimate that the two were photographed together. Her musical career began before she was 20 and she has been a favorite ever since. She has been four times wedded, her present husband being Arthur Tagliepetra, a brother of her second husband.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

ress .....

e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY NEXT TUESDAY EVENING

The sale of seats for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Infantry hall on next Tuesday evening, opens at Steinert's music store, 327 Westminster street, tomorrow (Saturday) morning. The soloist will be Carl Wendling, concert-master of the orchestra. He will play Mozart's concerto for violin in A major, No. 5. The other works will be Humperdinck's overture "Heirath Wider Willen," which will be heard here for the first time, and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony.

[96]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1907

A new symphony by a new composer makes the chief item on the programme of the next pair of Symphony Concerts. The composer, Hermann Bischoff, is one of the younger Germans of the "advanced" group of Munich, and he is frankly a disciple and pupil of Richard Strauss. His symphony in E major is long, intricate, ultra-modern and provided with an elaborate programme. It was first heard in Germany last summer, and now it is going from concert to concert. The symphony begins the programme, and then follows MacDowell's concerto for piano in E minor with Mme. Teresa Carreno, returning after long absence and in the fullness of her powers, to play the solo part. For ending comes Dvorák's bright "Carneval" overture.

Tomorrow, Sunday evening, at eight o'clock in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert for the current season for the increase of its Pension Fund, and Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, will appear with it, and probably for the last time in Boston during his present American tour. The chief orchestral number of the programme is Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, memorably performed by Dr. Muck last winter. Then follows Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Paderewski playing the piano part. Thereafter the pianist will add as many and as various solo pieces as please him.

The Longy Club of virtuosi upon wind instruments will give the second concert in its current series on Monday evening, at 8.15, in Potter Hall, and as usual much new music stands on the programme. The particularly notable piece is a "Chamber Symphony" by Wolf-Ferrari, the young composer of Latin blood and Teutonic training, who is beginning to be an important figure in German concert rooms. It enlists a little band of twelve instruments—piano, two violins, viola, 'cello, double bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, horn and bassoon. The other new piece is a tone-poem "Der Spaziergang" for a choir of wind instruments with an added harp and written by Gustav Bumcke. Between the two is the "Ishmaelites' Trio" for two flutes and harp from Berlioz's neglected oratorio "The Childhood of Christ." To perform this music, the club will have the assistance of several members of the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Schuecker, the harpist; Mr. Keller, the double bass player and the string quartet that Mr. Theodorowicz has lately formed. The other members are Messrs. Ribarsch, Gietzen and Keller.

GLOBE—MONDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1907

PADEREWSKI PLAYS.

Crowds Willing to Stand in Symphony Hall.

Great Artist at His Best and Never in Happier Mood.

If the city of Boston is lucky to have its Symphony orchestra, then the Symphony orchestra is no less lucky to have the aid of Jan Ignace Paderewski in its pension fund concert. It may have been his presence last night at the piano, or it may have been a real appreciation of the fact that the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," was to be played; at any rate, every seat in the vast hall was sold, and the people stood packed like herring under the balconies.

Paderewsky was on the program only to play the piano part in the Beethoven concerto in E flat major (No. 5, opus 78), but this was almost the least of his playing. The piano solo in that work is comparatively simple, and not tremendously dramatic or moving; the orchestra, which had been playing with great spirit and fire in the Tschaikowsky symphony, could barely meet the attack of the great virtuoso, so impetuous was he, and the concerto was played magnificently. But then, in response to applause that would not cease, Paderewski generously played a Chopin ballade in A flat, a beautiful mazourka, and thrice more before he finally refused to play again and sent the people home glowing.

The charge that Paderewski has been "banging" lately would have been easily disposed of last night, for never was there more clean-cut, delicate shading. As a matter of fact, most of the "banging" has been due to the position of hearers in the hall, and not to the pianist's methods at all. He was Paderewski still; there was the spell-weaving, the sentimental holding of the phrase, the mannerism, the hypnotic spell; but never was the player in happier mood. His playing of the ballade was beauty itself; one forgot technique, shading, execution, and fell into the spell of Chopin himself. And the first movement of the concerto—how delicate the touch, how bell-like the notes! There was a feeling of tenseness, to be sure; there was suppression, as though the player would be glad to loose his emotion in a flood of sound though forbidden by the score. And the swing and beat of the final movement, the delicious square-cornered, clean harmony of Beethoven, how Paderewski did give it to us without affectation and without pretentiousness!

The Tschaikowsky work was played with incredible force and color; Dr Muck's reading fairly took one's breath away. The deliciously sweet melody which forms the leading motive in the first movement, the snappy, Slavic march of the third, the storms of the finale, all seemed fresh and new; unheard before, so "vividly" was the symphony played.

As the concerto was finished Dr Muck and Paderewski shook hands warmly, and a huge wreath of laurel, in the shape of a heart, was brought to the platform.

JOURNAL—MONDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1907

PADEREWSKI HERO AT PENSION FUND CONCERT

Great Pianist Gives Gratuitous Recital After Symphony Orchestra Concert—Organ as Solo Instrument at Regular Performance.

The dying year was sent on its way into history by two memorable concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra one, the regular or tenth of the season on Saturday night, another the pension fund concert last night. At the first Wallace Goodrich, organist, was soloist; at the second, I. J. Paderewski, pianist, was the attraction.

The pension fund concert was a rare treat from every point of view. Not only was the artist in the best of humor but the orchestra was in record making mood and the combination of the world's greatest pianist and best orchestra produced a result at once satisfactory and inspiring.

The audience last night in Symphony Hall was limited by the walls of the building. Every seat was occupied when Dr. Muck raised his baton and along the aisles on the boundaries patrons stood three deep throughout the evening. The result of the evening is the swelling of the pension fund by exactly $4000.

Pays Own Expenses.

Mr. Paderewski donated his services, paying all of his expenses coming from a middle West tour, the ninety-nine members of the orchestra of course contributing their time and talent and Dr. Muck donating his.

The program was attractive. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and Beethoven's concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat major, "The Emperor." The symphony, as a whole, has been performed more satisfactorily under Mr. Gericke, especially in the first, second and last movements, but never before was the allegro molto vivace, the third, played with such nobleness. Its martial message was given with an artistry that commanded attention and commanded everybody to sit up and notice. It showed the extreme virtuosity of the strings, of the entire band for that matter, and Dr. Muck made the men acknowledge the applause, giving them credit.

Delightfully Informal.

Paderewski was in the best of humor and played the somewhat familiar concerto with the culture of interpretation for which he is justly renowned. He was delightfully informal turning to the audience in the second movement while reciting the theme and bowing graciously to Mr. and Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, who sat near the stage. At the conclusion of the allegro he left the stool and grasped Dr. Muck's hand, shaking it vigorously and bowing to the players. He repeated the act at the conclusion of the concerto. The orchestra remained seated and led the applause, and the artist after a wait returned to the instrument and played Chopin's "Ballade" in A major. Then one of Chopin's mazurkas and the "Etude," op. 25, and finished with the military polonaise in A.

The instrument used did not respond even to his wizard touch with the tone produced at other performances by the master, but any tonal defects were more than covered by the exquisite technique of the performer. Especially noticeable were the shortcoming of the instrument in the forte passages.

ORGAN MUSIC AT REGULAR CONCERT

Novelties and most acceptable novelties at that were offered at the regular concert by the Symphony Orchestra Saturday night. The big organ was the solo instrument of the evening, and used without the orchestra and with it. Bach's toccata in D minor, the Peters' edition, was the first number. Mr. Goodrich demonstrated his superiority in organ playing by his superb pedal technique, although there might be room for doubt of his judgment in registration. The number was a most welcome variation. Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind orchestras (Kogel's arrangement) was the second number. In this, especially in the third movement, the public had opportunity to observe a reason why the orchestra occupies first place among musical organizations. A passage for oboes, a duet seemingly impossible of performance, was played with an artistry and ease that challenged the world and brought forth such applause that Dr. Muck directed the artists, Mr. Longy and Mr. Lenom to acknowledge the demonstration.

Rheinberger's concerto in F for organ, three horns and strings was the third number, played for the first time at a Symphony concert. Mr. Goodrich was a pupil of the author and gave a scholarly interpretation of the work which, by the way, is most fascinating. Franck's symphonic poem, "The Redemption," played for the first time here, closed a most satisfactory concert.

The eleventh concert will be given Jan. 3, with Madame Teresa Carreno as soloist. The program will include: Bischoff's symphony in E, its first performance; McDowell's concerto for pianoforte No. 2, and Dvorak's overture, "Carneval."

TIMES,

DEC 30 1907

The third concert of the Boston Symphony will begin Tuesday afternoon, January 7.

ADVERTISER, MONDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 30, 1907

MUSICAL MATTERS

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The first of these was the regular concert of Saturday. Yet it was not quite as "regular" as usual, as the following list may show:—

PROGRAMME.

Bach—Toccata for Organ alone. D minor.
Handel—Concerto in F, for strings and two wind orchestras.
Rheinberger—Concerto in F, for Organ, three horns and strings.
Franck—Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption."

Soloist, Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

It will be seen that this was a concert of peculiar, but very successful combinations. The opening number was not orchestral but an organ solo. Mr. Wallace Goodrich was warmly greeted as he came forward to the Console. He immediately justified this reception by giving a very brilliant interpretation of Bach's great Toccata, which has been heard frequently in its piano transcription, which we think only distorts it. Almost all Bostonians know how effective the organ is in Symphony Hall. The brilliant solo with its fugal culmination was only a foretaste of a still better display of the instrument combined with orchestra. At the close of the Toccata, Mr. Goodrich was much applauded and recalled.

His playing of Bach is modern and attractive. In this he follows the French idea. It may seem strange to state but one can often hear Bach played better in Paris than in Germany, because the French do not treat him in a pedantic manner but employ shading and contrasts as in works of the more modern school, in which they are quite right. The Germans often make Bach pedantic and dry in their performance of his works.

Handel's Concerto was a splendid example of the old form. It had been revised twice, once by Kogel and once by Dr. Muck, both times in a faithful spirit, preserving all the old-fashioned pomp and power of the original.

The horns had some fine work to do in the second movement and they were perfect in performance. In this connection it may be remembered that Handel, more than any other composer, was responsible for the introduction of the horn into the English orchestras. The Briton held the horn to be an out-door affair and criticised Handel roundly for using "such a rough instrument" in orchestral works.

The third movement had that troublesome mark—"A Tempo Ordinario". This is scarcely to be translated as a modern "Moderato"; Dr. Muck took it as an "Allegretto". What a pity it is that Bach and Handel did not avail themselves of the pendulum invention of the Frenchman, Etienne Loulie, and mark their tempi by a string of varying length with a bullet at the end of it, as "Half-notes, 36 inches", "Eighth-notes, 10 inches", etc. It would have saved modern conductors an endless amount of trouble.

But this third movement was remarkable for a most brilliant duet for two oboes, so well-played by Messrs. Longy and Mueller that they were obliged to bow their acknowledgments of the appreciation of the audience over and over again.

The finale again gave the horns good opportunities and again they played excellently. The whole work was successful and the old-fashioned style of it was not its least attractive feature.

Another success followed in this very remarkable concert,—an organ concerto of beautiful construction. Organ concertos are rare matters in modern concerts. Few composers can blend the two elements, organ and orchestra, successfully. Guilmant has done so in works which lean somewhat to the sentimental side, but are very deftly made nevertheless. But this concerto of Rheinberger's was sturdy and manly, piquant and well-contrasted. It had an abundance of melody and of course the old conservative avoided modern ugliness and mystification.

